THE DEBATES

OF THE

SENATE OF CANADA

IN THE

THIRD SESSION OF THE EIGHTH PARLIAMENT OF CANADA, APPOINTED TO MEET FOR DESPATCH OF BUSINESS ON THURSDAY, THE THIRD DAY OF FEBRUARY, IN THE SIXTY-FIRST YEAR OF THE REIGN OF

HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Thursday, 3rd Feb., 1898.

The Senate met at 2.30 p.m.

PRAYERS.

NEW SENATOR.

Hon. RAOUL DANDURAND was introduced and took his seat.

THE SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

His Excellency the Right Honourable Sir John Campbell Hamilton-Gordon, Earl of Aberdeen; Viscount Formartine, Baron Haddo, Methlic, Tarves and Kellie, in the Peerage of Scotland; Viscount Gordon of Aberdeen, County of Aberdeen, in the Peerage of the United Kingdom; Baronet of Nova Scotia; Knight Grand Cross of Our Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, &c., &c., Governor General of Canada, being seated on the Throne,

The Speaker commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to proceed to the House of Commons and acquaint that House,—"It is His Excellency's pleasure they attend him immediately in this House."

Who being come with their Speaker,

His Excellency the Governor General was then pleased to open the Session by a gracious Speech to both Houses.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I have observed with great pleasure the remarkable advance in the political importance and material prosperity of Canada during the year which has just closed.

The loan recently effected has shown that the credit of Canada has never stood so high in European markets, and affords reasonable ground for expecting that the burthens of the people will, in the near future, be materially reduced by the substitution of a much lower rate of interest on our indebtedness than that which now exists.

I congratulate you upon the exceedingly cordial reception accorded to the representatives of Canada at the jubilee ceremonials, and also upon the warm appreciation manifested everywhere throughout the mother country in reference to the conduct of Canada in materially reducing the rate of duty upon goods imported from the United Kingdom into the Dominion.

The action of the Imperial Government in denouncing the treaties with Germany and Belgium also affords most satisfactory evidence of their desire to facilitate your efforts to promote the closest possible commercial relations between Canada and the remainder of the Empire, and will, I trust, contribute materially to the development of imperial trade.

The extraordinary gold discoveries recently made upon the Yukon and its tributaries, appear likely to result in an enormous influx of people into that region, and have compelled the government to take prompt action for the preservation of law and order in that district and almost inaccessible locality; measures will be laid before you for that purpose.

A contract has been entered into, subject to your approval, for the completion at the earliest possible moment of a system of rail and river communication through Canadian territory with the Klondike and principal gold fields, which it is expected will secure to Canada the larger portion of the lucrative traffic of that country.

The bountiful harvest with which we have been favoured by a benevolent Providence has contributed greatly to the increase of our prosperity, and I am glad to note that the trade and commerce of the Dominion, and more especially the amount and values of her principal exports, have increased greatly during the past eighteen months, and there is good reason to believe that this improvement may be maintained if not augmented, during the remainder of the present year.

I observe with pleasure that certain government contracts recently let contain provisions calculated to suppress the evils of the sweating system.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The accounts of the past year will be laid before you.

The Estimates for the succeeding year will likewise be placed upon the Table at an early date.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

Measures will be submitted to you respecting Superannuation, the repeal of the present Franchise Act, and a plebiscite on the question of prohibition.

These and other measures I commend to your earnest consideration, invoking the Divine blessings upon the important labours on which you are again entering.

His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire, and the House of Commons withdrew.

BILL INTRODUCED.

"An Act relating to Railways."—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

THE STIKINE-TESLIN RAILWAY CONTRACT.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to ask the leader of the House when we may expect to have laid before us the agreement or contract for the construction of the Stikine Railway referred to in the Speech from the Throne. The subject is agitating the public mind, and the contract should be submitted to Parliament without delay. It is impossible to discuss intelligently a question of such magnitude without having the details of the agreement before us.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It will be laid upon the Table at the earliest possible moment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—May we expect it to be laid upon the Table before the debate on the Address takes place?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, I think it will be.

The Senate then adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Monday, 7th February, 1898.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at Eight O'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

NEW SENATOR.

Hon. Mr. FISET was introduced and took his seat.

THE ADDRESS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. KING moved:

That the following Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, to offer the humble thanks of this House to His Excellency for the gracious Speech which he has been pleased to make to both Houses of Parliament, namely:

To HIS EXCELLENCY the Right Honourable Sir JOHN CAMPBELL HAMILTON-GORDON, Earl of Aberdeen; Viscount Formartine, Baron Haddo, Methlic, Traves and Kellie, in the Peerage of Scotland; Viscount Gordon of Aberdeen, County of Aberdeen, in the Peerage of the United Kingdom; Baronet of Nova Scotia; Knight Grand Cross of the Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, etc., etc., Governor General of Canada.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY:

We, Her Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Senate of Canada in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious Speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both Houses of Parliament.

He said:—In rising to move the address in reply to the speech of His Excellency the Governor General, delivered at the opening of this session of Parliament, I may be permitted to say that I would have been much better pleased had the task, which has been assigned to me on this occasion, been placed in the hands of some person more capable of discharging the duty devolving upon me than I find myself to be. I am encouraged, however, by the thought that while there are, in the speech to which I propose to refer, some subjects which may be open to honest and fair criticism, on the whole I believe that there is not much that is calculated to meet with strong opposition. So far as the political importance of Canada is concerned, I think I am safe in saying to-night that Canada stands upon a higher plane than she ever stood before. To say that Canada is better known in the outside world than she was heretofore is saying very little. I might go further and say that Canada is exerting an influence outside and among the nations of the world greater than she ever exerted before, I might even say as great as some of the independent powers. Then, again, with regard to her material prosperity. We have evidence on every hand that Canada to-day is prosperous. No man in this country willing to work need go idle. If we refer to the trade returns and to the reports of our banking institutions, we shall be forced to conclude that the business of Canada to-day is in a sound and healthy condition. That the credit of Canada is steadily improving, I am sure will be admitted on all hands. As a fact, the last loan effected in the English market was placed on better terms than any loan heretofore offered. Although identified with the minority in this House, I am not disposed to claim all the credit for the improved conditions of this country for the party to which I belong, but, hon. gentlemen, I may be permitted to go this far and remind this hon. House that the predictions which were made and sent broadcast through this country previous to the change of administration, that a change of government meant desolation and ruin to Canada, have not been fulfilled. When I last had the honour of addressing this House on an occasion similar to the present, Canada had been invited to send representatives to what is known as the Diamond Jubilee, and I took occasion then to express my belief that in the person of the hon. Premier of this Dominion, Canada would find a representative who would do her credit and would ably represent all classes and all creeds within our borders. I may claim to-night that in that respect our expectations have not been disappointed, because not only in this chamber, but outside of it, throughout the length and breadth of Canada, even the political opponents of the Hon. Sir Wilfred Laurier are generous enough to admit that his conduct and his course at that great gathering in London was such as to reflect credit upon himself and honour upon Great Britain's greatest colony. I am not to-night going to discuss the subjects referred to in the speech with reference to the denouncement of the German and Belgian treaties, but without considering the effect of that step on the part of the mother land I have this to say—and we have great reason, I think, to be proud of being able to congratulate ourselves upon the fact—that the government of Great Britain so appreciated our effort here in Canada in the matter of the preferential tariff as to at once remove the only obstacle that stood in the way of giving effect to that tariff. Last year, when Parliament was in session, we were congratulating ourselves upon the fact that we possessed in British Columbia great wealth in mines, as well as in the other provinces of the Dominion. At that time the words "Klondike" and "Yukon" were scarcely known. To-day they are household words, not in Canada alone, but throughout the civilized world, and capital by millions is seeking investment to-day in British Columbia, in Klondike and elsewhere. The government who are called upon to administer the affairs of this Dominion at the present time are face to face with a condition of things which is, so far as I know without parallel in the history of mining elsewhere in the world. Before it was possible to get reliable information with regard to that Klondike country, miners began to flock there by thousands, and it is said to-day that there are at the present time in the vicinity of Dawson City, or in the Klondike country, from five to ten thousand people, and if we are to take the opinion of gentlemen who ought to know, strong doubts are entertained at this moment as to whether their diminishing food supply will be sufficient to see them through until their stores can be replenished on the opening of navigation. That is not all. In the face of insurmountable difficulties at this inclement season of the year—shall I say hundreds—I think I am safe in saying thousands are wending their way to that country. It is estimated that this very year not less than one hundred thousand people will obtain a foothold in the Klondike mining regions. Some persons, perhaps not quite so conservative and not so careful, estimate the number far in advance of the figures I have given, and it is true I think that, railroad or no railroad, the chances are that these people will work their way into that country. I may be mistaken, if I am mistaken I am subject to correction, but I believe that the Klondike country is a country which produces nothing in the way of substantial food. I have heard it said, and I have not very much doubt myself upon the subject, that the Klondike would not grow a Lapland turnip, and it must be apparent to all that every pound of food, all the supplies required for the maintenance of that large population, must be brought into that county from outside. I hope and trust that the largest portion of it may go in from Canada; but let me say this, that unless we are prepared to start ourselves; unless we are prepared to put forth herculean efforts, the chances are that in the coming year we shall not reap the harvest, but some one else will who is not so well entitled to it as we are. I do not suppose that it is possible for us to intelligently discuss what is known as the Yukon Railway contract as the papers are not before the House. I do not know that the matter has been referred to very much upon the floor of Parliament during this session, but it is a well known fact that the press outside are dealing with the question from day to day, and that there are different opinions with regard to the propriety of the conduct of the government with reference to this matter. I am prepared to speak on this question to-night as I understand it, simply from the reports which have come to me through the same sources through which they must have reached the ears of hon. gentlemen. If when the papers are brought down and the contract is laid before Parliament, I discover anything in it which I believe is not in the interests of Canada, I shall be prepared to disapprove of it, notwithstanding what I may say to-night. As I understand it, a contract has been entered into by the government of Canada with a firm of contractors. I think they must be responsible contractors, when I take into account the fact that they have already put up $250,000 by way of security for the completion of the work which they have undertaken. The gentlemen, Messrs. Mann & McKenzie, have undertaken to build a road from the Stikine River navigation to Teslin Lake, estimated at 150 miles. In addition to that, they have undertaken to provide a sled road as early as the month of March to facilitate communication with that country. Then, the price they are to get is 3,750,000 acres of land in alternate lots in the Klondike, or the mineral region. Besides that, the government have agreed, I believe, that no aid or encouragement is to be given for five years to any line from the Pacific coast to go into that country. As I am informed, and as I believe, the general consensus of opinion is that the government have selected the best route in the interests of all Canada. There is no difference of opinion on that score. If there is, I so far have not been made aware of it. I think it is admitted on all hands that in the selection of that route the government are following the policy of keeping Canada for the Canadians; but there are objections to that contract. First among them is this: it is said that the contract was made privately—that tenders should have been called for. Ordinarily, I admit that that would be the correct course to pursue, and there would be nothing to justify a departure from that course, save the emergency with which the government is confronted at this moment. The loss of a few weeks now might imperil, not merely the completion of that work, but so interfere with the construction of the road as to render it useless for another year. If the country is what we suppose it to be, we cannot afford to take any chances. If we had it there now it would be a great boon to Canada; if we can have it before the first of September, it will be a great boon to Canada. If we fail I am satisfied it will be a great loss to Canada. The chances are that next year we will have a population, in that country, ten times—I might say twenty times—greater than we have this year. Then again, it is said that the government should have paid cash and should not have given land. It does seem to me that if there is one provision in that contract which is likely to commend itself to the people of, shall I say all Canada—to the people, at all events, of the older provinces of Canada—it is that particular feature. I do not believe that it is right to tax the people who have no direct interest in that country continually for the purpose of opening it up, when there is a possibility of avoiding it, and I am pleased to-night to be able to say that at last the government of this country have found a portion of the far west which is able to develop itself without adding to the burdens of the taxpayers of the older provinces.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—To the extent of 150 miles ?

Hon. Mr. KING—I am not to-night going to cry over spilt milk. I am not going to complain of the moneys that have been expended in the past in the west, but I am satisfied that the people of Canada, as a whole, will be glad to know, as I have said, that even the lands in the Klondike are of sufficient value to induce the construction of a railway for the purpose of developing the mining interests in that country. It is said that the Government should have given cash—

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Who says that ?

Hon. Mr. KING—I have heard it said in a great many places—I hear it every day.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Not authoritatively by anybody—merely a rumour.

Hon. Mr. KING—It is said that the land which the syndicate gets could have been placed on the market and millions more than what the railway is to cost would have been realized. That is an old story and one I think that will not bear repeating. I have a vivid recollection myself of hearing similar statements made with regard to the construction of another great work in this country. I heard the hon. gentlemen who were charged with the administration of the government of this country going so far as to predict that before 1891 Canada would have received from the sales of land in the North-west a sum of money sufficiently large to recoup it for all the expenses connected with the building of the C. P. R. I think it will not be denied that down to the present time—I may be wrong, and if so, I am subject to correction—the receipts from sales of land in the North-west have been scarcely sufficient to pay the cost of surveys and management.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—They have been given away.

Hon. Mr. KING—I believe that the government should take no chances in this matter. We all hope that the prospects in the Klondike country may continue to grow brighter and brighter, but none of us know what may happen in a year or two from now. We do know that the inducements at the present time are sufficiently strong to warrant capitalists outside of Canada, commanding large amounts of wealth, to invest it in that country, but we do not know how long placer mining in the Yukon is likely to hold out, nor do we know what value there may be in the land which the government purposes to give to the syndicate for building that road. It is said that the contractors for this railway have got a five years monopoly. To a certain extent I admit that is true—a monopoly so far as the building of railways from the coast into that district is concerned, but I shall be greatly surprised if there is any provision in the contract which prevents the building of roads from this side of the Yukon into the Yukon district.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. KING—Then again, I may be wrong, but I think that when the navigation of the Yukon is open, it will be possible to transport supplies by way of the Yukon as they have been going heretofore, and so far as monopoly is concerned, I have not a shadow of a doubt in my mind that when it can be demonstrated, in a year or even less time, that the business of that country will warrant the construction of railways from points available on this side of the mountains in our own North-west Territories, that capital will be found in sufficient amounts to undertake them. It must not be supposed for a moment that all the people in Canada live on the Pacific coast. If I am not greatly mistaken 95 per cent of them live south and east of the Yukon River, and we on this side of the continent have an interest in getting into that district without going to Vancouver, up the coast, along the Stikine River, and by Teslin Lake to the Yukon. I expect that long before the five years expire, if the trade of that country will warrant it, capitalists will be found who will at once begin the construction of railways at points in our own North-west Territories, and the monopoly will soon have passed away. In doing this we shall also provide a market for our workshops and factories in Canada. We shall provide a market for the products of Canadian farms, and if the Klondike turns out to be what we hope it will, it would mean something of consequence to Canada, because the amount of supplies and provisions that would be required to provide for the wants of even one hundred thousand miners in the Klondike region would be a very considerable item in the interprovincial trade of the Dominion. I am not an expert in railroading, and do not profess to know very much about the construction of railways, especially in a country such as the one in which this road is to be built; but the probable cost of that road is variously estimated. In some cases it is as low as $15,000 per mile. Well, it may be possible to construct a road in that country for a sum so small as that, but I must say I do not believe that that would be an adequate remuneration for the contractor undertaking that burden. In the first place every one must admit that the time limit will add materially to the cost of work. All the supplies, and all the material necessary for the construction of that road, or a large proportion at any rate, will have to be transported across the continent and find its way up there at an extremely heavy cost. Then in addition to that, the gentlemen who have that contract I fear will be subjected to serious competition with the employers of labour in the mining country, and, further than that, I imagine there is danger that the employees of that syndicate when they discover that that company is compelled to complete the road by the 1st day of September, or forfeit the quarter of a million, will in all probability be ready to take advantage of that condition of things. Therefore I say that the company undertaking a work of this kind requires more than the ordinary price in a settled country for constructing a railway. One would think to read some of the newspapers which are dealing with this question that the syndicate who are building this railway are likely to become millionaires at once. They may be now for aught I know. They have, it is true, a large area of country under this contract, but I do not believe that it is possible for them or anybody else yet to determine the value of it. That has to be proved. Gold in that country is not got without digging for it. You would suppose to hear some people talk about it, that all the syndicate had to do when they got their railway through and got down to the Klondike, or the mining country, was simply to load up their steamers and ballast cars, and bring millions out of that region. But mining cannot be carried on, even in Klondike, without considerable cost. As I said before, with regard to the building of railways, I am not an expert, or an authority, but I had the pleasure of listening to an address delivered in another place not long since, by a gentleman who was deeply interested, who was the manager, I think, of one of the English syndicates seeking to invest capital in that country. That gentleman said, if I understood him correctly, that to produce $22,500 worth of gold would require an expenditure of labour amounting to $20,000. So that if Messrs. Mann & McKenzie should be so fortunate as to take out of these large tracts of land a good many millions, 90 per cent at least would be expended for labour, according to the calculation I heard the other day, from which certainly the government must derive a considerable benefit. I think that the limited time at the disposal of the government justifies their hasty and energetic action, and I have no doubt if that contract is completed in the time specified, the people of Canada from one end to the other will be prepared to appreciate and endorse the conduct of the administration which made that contract. I do not propose to refer to all the matters contained in the speech, but there is one particular question with reference to which I do intend to say a word before resuming my seat. The government have announced through the speech of His Excellency, that it is their intention to introduce a measure this year looking toward a plebiscite, or a vote on the question of prohibition in Canada. As a temperance man and prohibitionist, I have to say that I trust that the measure will receive a majority of the vote in both Houses of Parliament; and when the people at the polls are called upon to pronounce upon it, I trust also that the majority may be decisive in favour of a prohibitory law,—a law that will prohibit in Canada the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors. But I have also to say that unless the majority is a decisive one in favour of it, I would rather that it be decisive the other way.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND (in French) Before adding some comments to the remarks which have fallen from the hon. gentleman from Queen's (Mr. King), my hon. colleagues will permit me to thank the administration for the honour which they have done me in calling me to a seat in this House, a position which I prize all the more highly because it comes to me at an age which gives me an absolute right to claim your kind indulgence. The government no doubt said to themselves that if youth is inexperienced, it is sufficiently pliable to acquire quickly the two qualities, the two essential virtues of wisdom and impartiality, which alone can obtain for us pardon and lead the public to forget our immovability and our irresponsibility. I have searched the reports of your debates for the past 20 years to find lessons and examples, and I have found the sound traditions and the customs which appear to have had for their foundation a constant respect for the popular will. I intend faithfully to follow the road which you have so well marked out, and in which I am certain we shall not cease to touch elbows. The representative of the Crown has spoken to us of the prosperity of the country. I shall content myself with congratulating the government on whatever share they have had in bringing about general improvement of business. Throughout the country confidence has been restored. Traders and merchants and bankers admit unanimously the improvement in the situation of the finances of the country. Canada has taken a place in the eyes of Europe that the most optimistic could not have dreamed of our holding for at least fifty years to come. The personal influence of the Premier, "the Hon. Mr. Laurier," has been a considerable cause in producing such splendid results. His journey across Europe, thanks to the talents with which he is endowed, had a considerable and beneficial effect for our country. The denunciation of the Belgian and German treaties showed to the astounded world, the power which an autonomous colony is able to exercise when it is guided by a politician who despises the old beaten roads. The placing of our bonds at 2½ per cent, following this event, has shown that the pretentious title given to our country in 1867 was not merely a vain word, and that we are commencing really to be the "Puissance" of Canada. Our Minister of Finance took a momentous step when he presented himself before the financial market of Europe to ask for the same terms as the richest nations. The stock quotation is the barometer of the confidence in which a country is held. I recall the outburst of enthusiasm provoked in France, in the home of the richest nation of the world, by the news that their 3 per cent bonds for the first time in this century had touched par. That was two years ago. To-day the 3 per cent French bonds are at a premium. That indicates that confidence is absolute, that, thank God, the republic is seated upon a rock, that the republican form of government can no more be questioned—that the republic is immortal. The prosperity of our country cannot fail to grow, now that the European immigrant knows its value, and now above all, that our gold is attracting attention in all countries. It is important that those who come to our country should proceed to the Klondike through our territory; that they should traverse our country to reach Dawson City, and I congratulate the government on having promptly taken the necessary measures to render the Canadian route the easiest. There is a threefold interest in our having the gold seekers pass through our North-west to reach Alaska. Circumstances have given the United States possession of the mouths of our rivers, and the coast of our territories bordering on Alaska. The immigrant who passes that way is subject to all sorts of exactions if his outfit which he takes with him has not been purchased in the United States. Here is what Mr. Carruthers, of the Pacific coast, says on that subject, indicating the state of feeling in the Pacific coast cities on the Klondike outfitting question :

> The Klondike is in Canada; it is most easily reached via Canadian railways and Canadian ports: "Canadian merchants should receive the greatest benefit from the trade that is to be done with the new gold fields. But to reach these fields travellers have to pass over a strip of territory belonging to the United States. The customs exactions enforced there are so onerous, and the cost involved so large, where travellers with Canadian outfits are concerned, that it pays better to purchase supplies in United States cities, and pay the Canadian duty, than to carry through Canadian goods and pay the "bonding" exactions of the United States officials.

If the intending settler chooses the Canadian route, the country will derive a profit from the moneys which he will have to distribute on his way. I want the stranger to have an opportunity to see our North-west plains in order that the prediction, not yet fulfilled, of Sir Charles Tupper may be realized under the present government, and that the thousands of disappointed gold-seekers returning from the Klondike (for all will not find fortune there) may people Manitoba and our North-west Territories. While it is desirable that the government should interest themselves in our young provinces, it is also well that they should think of redressing the wrongs from which the older provinces suffer as well as the younger provinces. One grievance from which our population has suffered will disappear by the repeal of the present Dominion Franchise Act. A part from the exorbitant cost of preparing the electoral lists, I am personally aware of the trouble, the injustices and the inconveniences to which the people of the Dominion have been subjected in the application of that law, and I shall be happy to see and to vote for its repeal. With great pleasure I second the motion which the hon. gentleman from Queen's has submitted for your consideration.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to call the attention of the leader of the house to the promise that he made at the opening of the session when I asked the question whether the terms of the contract for the Yukon Railway would be laid upon the table before the discussion upon the address took place. I understood the hon. gentleman to say at that time that the contract would be laid upon the table prior to this discussion, and I find that it has not been done.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I did not tell the hon. gentleman that the contract would be laid upon the table. I said I would lay it upon the table if possible. I did not find it possible to do so. I should have been very glad indeed to have met the desire of my hon. friend, but I have found it impossible to do so up to this evening.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I must confess I am not disappointed, and under the circumstances I move the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

DELAYED RETURNS.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved that the House do now adjourn.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the House adjourns I should like to call the attention of the Secretary of State to the promise that he made before the close of the last session of parliament. I think there can be no mistake this time as to the actual promise which was then made. He will remember that I moved for a certain return on the 9th April. On the 5th May I called the attention of the House to the fact that it had not yet been laid upon the table. On the 7th I asked if there was any information as to when the return would be submitted, and on the 7th June I again asked when the return would be laid before us, and the Secretary of State made the following statement :

> I had a letter from one of the ministers saying that it appeared to be quite impossible to bring it down in any reasonable time. A large amount of the information is not in the department at all. The proceedings before the commissioners have not in many instances been terminated, and the names of the witnesses are not within the knowledge of the departments and the names of the attorneys who may be retained by the parties charged is not within our knowledge. There is a vast amount of information which we cannot get.

> Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I shall be satisfied if we can get it by the opening of the next session, provided the hon. gentleman will add to the return the number of dismissals and the reasons and the commissions appointed since the date of the address for which I moved and up to the date at which the return is presented to this House which would make it complete.

> Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

> Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is that the understanding ?

> Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

> Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That you will bring it down the first day of next session.

> Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I hope so.

May I ask the hon. gentleman whether he is prepared after seven or eight months cogitation over this matter to comply with the promise that he made in reference to information which we desire as contained in the address for which I asked ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman is quite right in stating I hoped to be able to bring down the return by the first of the session. It is one of those returns that has been growing steadily.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am very sorry to hear that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I at one time offered to bring down all that was prepared. I am still prepared to bring down the list, if he will accept it in that way. I have pressed on my colleagues the importance of having it here, and I still hope to have it early in the session. I think I have a return from all the departments but two. There are two delinquents yet. I suppose the hon. gentleman would prefer to wait until I can get the returns from those two departments.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have no desire to unduly press the government. I am very sorry to hear that the return has become voluminous, or will be more voluminous now than it was at prorogation last session. The government have had seven months in which to prepare this return. I can easily understand why the return has not been completed, after the statement made by the hon. Secretary of State, that is, that the list is growing continually, which means that the government is continually dismissing officials, and that they are continually appointing commissions to investigate charges, or assumed charges, against the officials, in order to make room for others. If the hon. Secretary of State can say within any reasonable time this session—I mean before parliament rises, or a few weeks or a month.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT.—The hon. gentleman is quite aware, having been a member of the government, of the difficulty there is sometimes in getting those returns from some departments. Several departments have been overworked. I have written repeatedly to two or three departments which have been in arrears with these returns, pressing on them the necessity of it. I shall further press them, and hope to accomplish it within a reasonable time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We shall wait a week or two.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Tuesday, 8th February, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE ADDRESS.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In rising to address the House upon the subject of the Speech from the Throne, I take this the first opportunity of congratulating my hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, upon what I consider, from a party standpoint, the just promotion which he has received. He has been long in the political harness. It has been my good fortune to have known him since Confederation. We have battled, not together, but we have engaged in political warfare in opposition to each other for now over a quarter of a century; and I say this, and say it in all sincerity, that the longer I have known the hon. gentleman the higher opinion I have formed of him, and have no doubt he will perform the duties pertaining to his office in a manner that will be satisfactory at least to his own party, if not to the country generally. I must also be permitted to congratulate the hon. Secretary of State on the fact of having been for the second time relieved from the onerous duties of leader of the government in this House. He occupied the enviable position which I now occupy for some 17 or 18 years—as leader of the opposition. Whether he performed that duty to the satisfaction of his party can be best judged, from the fact that they have upon two occasions promoted those who have recently been brought into the Senate over his head to lead this House. However, I know that he will appreciate that kindness from the fact that he is relieved from the great responsibility which would otherwise rest upon his shoulders. Referring to the Address before the House, I think we might very properly comment upon what it does not contain rather than what is contained in it. I expected to see a reference to the Drummond County Railway, setting forth the fact that they had entered into an arrangement with that company, and that great results were following the agreement which had been made. But if newspaper reports be true, the government are about as far from accomplishing the object which they desired to force upon the country during the last session as they were at that period. It is evident to me, and must be to every hon. gentleman in this House, from the position in which they find themselves and the position in which that road is at the present moment, that the Senate performed one of its wisest acts when it rejected the proposition which was laid before it during last session. I also entertained the hope that we should have had some reference to that for which we have been all looking with a great deal of anxiety, the establishment of a fast line of steamers between Canada and Great Britain. A short time ago the press was filled with the boastings of the premier, and others, over the fact that they had entered into an agreement with wealthy gentlemen in England —that the money had been deposited and that the ships would soon be upon the ocean, and that we should be reaping the benefits which we believe would flow from the establishment of a line like that. However, there is no reference to that, and if whisperings be true, there does not appear to be the slightest probability of any success with the present contractors, and the country will look with regret and suspicion upon the action of the government in not carrying out the arrangements which had been made by the late government prior to their vacation of office. Then, again, there is that very important question of cable communication between this continent and the Australasian colonies. I have always looked upon that scheme and that proposition as one of absolute necessity, in order to accomplish that which all British statesmen at the present moment are desirous of accomplishing, and that is, the unity of the Empire to the fullest possible extent. Until that communication has been established, so that it will be exclusively British, instead of having to pass through two or three foreign countries, just so long will we be deprived of the advantages of that trade which is rapidly growing between the islands of the Pacific and the Dominion of Canada. Perhaps, however, when my hon. friend rises to address the House, he will be able to give us some satisfactory information upon these points. It will be accepted, I know, with gratitude, by those who have taken an interest in this great enterprise. There has been a conference in England during the past year between the representatives of the Australasian colonies and Canada. The Hon. Mr. Jones and Sir Donald Smith acted on behalf of Canada, with Mr., now Sir Sanford Fleming assisting them at that conference. Why these papers have not been laid upon the Table, and why we have received no information on the subject is a matter which is incomprehensible to me; and I hope that before long we shall have the information which is absolutely necessary in order to keep us informed of what is really being done on these important questions. I know it is the custom to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address. I do not know that it is necessary that I should particularly extend that courtesy to an old member of the Commons and also of the Senate, a gentleman who had already spoken in this House. Still I must compliment him on the very lucid speech which he gave to the House in endeavouring to sustain the policy of the government on one or two of the great questions which are referred to in the Speech. I am sorry the hon. gentleman, the seconder of the address (Mr. Dandurand), is not present. We must all welcome that hon. gentleman to a seat in this House. His readiness of speech, in fact, his eloquence, was enough to captivate us, more particularly those who understand the language. My limited knowledge of French was not such as to enable me to form such a correct opinion of his remarks as will his own countrymen and those who do understand the language. However, I understand sufficient to find that he, like many others who have entered this Chamber, materially change their opinions and views upon the question of the existence of a second chamber. We have observed during the past few years that this chamber has been threatened with annihilation or at least reformation, by politicians and by newspapers. We had the late Minister of Justice, when he condescended to accept a seat in the cabinet, telling his chief the present premier, that he would accept it with the understanding and condition that he was to reform the Senate. You will all remember the eulogy which he passed upon the composition of this House and the necessity for its existence. Since that, however, the Senate has had the courage of its convictions, and it has been honest enough to express them, not only in word but in deed, and by its votes. That has brought down the condemnation of those who have been denouncing the Senate as a useless body, and at the same time condemning them for exercising their own opinions and judgments upon important questions affecting the great and material interests of the country. Within a short time we had an utterance from the hon. Minister of Public Works. I have no doubt it was very interesting to the members of the Senate, but if I read it, I trust it will not frighten them and that they will not be under any apprehension as to what is to follow. At a dinner given in the city of Montreal to the Minister of Public Works, referring to the Senate, he says :

> You can rely upon our good will and we must count equally on yours.

That is speaking to the people.

> We have eminent men in the House of Commons and in the Cabinet.

Of course we would expect that, knowing that the hon. gentleman was there himself.

> And in the Senate the majority are not worth the rope to hang them. Reforms are necessary and to accomplish them we can depend on your good will and unity.

The hon. Premier, who spoke immediately after the Minister of Public Works, used this language :—

> You appreciate him, (that is the Hon. Mr. Tarte) and so do I.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—So did Mercier.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And he further says :—

> I think I have known him longer than you have.

And consequently, he knew better how to appreciate him. Then we have La Patrie, that $30,000 organ of the party, throwing out its threat that if the Senate dared to express opinions upon some questions and to reject certain measures which it foreshadow may be brought before it, that we must be annihilated. The Globe, the other day, uttered its warning voice against us if we dared to reject the Yukon Railway deal, as we had rejected the Drummond County deal. The Hamilton Times has also been muttering its threats against the Senate if we dare to have any such opinions ; but after all, when we think of the utterances of the hon. seconder of the motion for the adoption of the address, and particularly after his utterances at a dinner party in Montreal as to how he, among others, was to use his power and influence in reforming this body, we may rest safely for at least a time. If I understood the hon. gentleman's language when he addressed the House, he said :

> The history of the Senate showed that it had always acted with wisdom, prudence, and a due responsibility to the popular will, and for this the public was disposed to forgive it for being a non-representative and irresponsible body.

I may have misunderstood the hon. gentleman, but that is what I understood him to say; and what, I think, has been reported. Still, we may rest content since he has given us a certificate of character of acting with wisdom and prudence, and it only proves to me that the moment an hon. gentleman enters the Senate, it appears that the benign influences by which he is surrounded, and the general company in which he finds himself, and the conservative character of the Senate, so mollifies his opinion that he becomes as mild as a suckling dove—one of ourselves. Then I have, in addition to that, and I desire to put this matter on record, the opinion of the present Minister of Justice, and I frankly confess that when I read the remarks of the hon. gentleman at a demonstration given in his honour when accepting that important portfolio which he now holds, I read it with pleasure, though I have no recollection during the 25 or 30 years I have known him, of ever hearing him speak of abolishing the Upper House. The hon. gentleman, the Minister of Justice, said in his speech delivered at Ridgetown, on the 26th November last :

> It is sometimes argued that we ought to have but one House. He did not accept that view, and he was free to say after he had become for the time being, at all events (I do not know whether that indicates that the hon. gentleman intends to descend to the other House), a member of another Chamber, what he had said before he entered it, that it would be a very dangerous experiment where a government had large questions to deal with—and every government would have such questions from time to time to solve, and in times of excitement that government should be entirely under the control of one Chamber, if the whole power is in the hands of one Assembly, and that Assembly had behind it an excited public, there would be no guarantee of justice and fair dealing. The great advantage of two Houses is this, that it leaves upon the members of the House that is dominant the ever present impression that it cannot do wholly as it pleases.

With those sentiments I am sure there is not a conservative member of this House, nor a conservative in Canada, who will not be heartily and fully in accord. I trust I may be pardoned for these introductory remarks, but I was anxious that these sentiments that had been uttered by different members of the House, and the change which has taken place in their sentiments since they became senators should be put upon record, in order, that at least we may know what their opinions really are. I could not help reflecting upon times gone by when I heard the speech of my hon. friend who moved the address. I fancy that I heard his dulcet tones ringing through the chamber of the House of Commons in denunciation of the national policy and protection, as having brought ruin and misery on every poor man in the country, and on the farmers in particular. But what a change has come over his dream. Why he had nothing but praise for the government and their whole policy, so far as he ventured an opinion. It is true he said that he would not express an opinion upon what might be called the Yukon railway deal, until he had seen the terms of it, but unfortunately for him, the greater part of his half hour's speech was devoted to approving of that of which he said he knew nothing. It is enough for an old politician like himself to know that the party that he follows had enunciated a certain policy and he was prepared to support it. He also, with a good deal of pleasure, referred to the political importance and material prosperity of Canada, referring to the prosperous state of the country and also to the increase in its business, particularly the imports and exports of the country. There is not a man in Canada who does not join hands in rejoicing over any prosperity that may exist, but when, by inference, it is pretended to show that that is the result of the policy of the present Government, then it becomes an assertion which will be doubted by any one who has studied the question. If our exports have increased during the past year from 16,000,000 to 17,000,000 of dollars has that been the result of the policy of this, or any other Government? It has been the result of better harvest in Canada, more particularly in the North-west Territories, and in Manitoba. It has been caused to a great extent by the fact of a scarcity of provisions, more particularly of cereals in other countries. If the present government and its policy are to be credited with the prosperity which has existed in this particular line, then I suppose they are also responsible for the causes which created the increase in the value of our cereals. There was a famine in India; are they responsible for that? There was a shortage in the crop of the Australian Colonies to such an extent that millions of bushels of grain had to be shipped to that country. The wheat crop in the Argentine Republic was also a failure, and so it was almost over the whole world, except, fortunately, in the Dominion of Canada. That failure in other portions of the word, opened a market for every bushel of grain and every pound of beef that we could send out of the country. Prices rose and we have reaped a benefit thereby. If you look at the trend of trade in this country you will find that it is tending almost entirely towards England. I have pointed out in former addresses to this House how from 1868 up to last year, the percentage of trade from the United States had fallen off, and that there had been a great increase in the export trade to England. The present preferential tariff, as it is called, however, has had this result: while England has furnished a market for all that we could possibly send her, the importations from Great Britain have fallen off over 3 millions of dollars during the last 9 months. Statistics give us these facts, and if that be the case what becomes of this boasted preferential arrangement, which it is said the present government has adopted in order to increase our trade with England and reduce our trade with other sections of the world? Has the tariff been preferential in its character? Is it not precisely what we pointed out it was during the last session of this House? It was denied then by the government that the preference was given to other nations. However, if my recollection serves me right, I must give the late Minister of Justice credit for this: I have no recollection of hearing that hon. gentleman giving an opinion, as Minister of Justice, upon the disputed point as to the effect of the German, Belgian, and other treaties, containing favoured nations clauses. He studiously avoided that, if my memory serves me right. The furthest I heard him go was to say "Our government contends that those treaties do not affect us," and beyond that the hon. gentleman did not go. Great Britain accepted the statement made by the Premier and by other members of the cabinet that it was a preferential arrangement to specially benefit the mother country, but as its operations became known to the mercantile community of England, they began to change their mind and asked themselves this question: If this be the case, how is it, that our exportations to Canada are falling off while those from the United States to Canada are increasing? If you look at the tariff you can understand why that has been the result. While the hon. gentlemen opposite have professed free trade principles—that is before the election—and while they re-echoed them in England, their tariff is not a free trade tariff, nor is it what is known as a revenue tariff; and I am quite satisfied that my hon. friend who sits opposite me (Mr. Mills) will not attempt to prove or even to state that it is one or the other. All you have to do is to look at the rates of duty to convince you that it is not a free trade tariff. Let me give you a few figures in order to sustain this portion of my argument. If you refer to the tariff you will find that the old rate of duty on pig iron was $4, under the present tariff it is $2.50, but bear in mind, that they adopted a principle which they had, when in opposition, in the strongest possible language condemned as vicious, that of increasing the bounties, so that a greater protection was given to the manufacturer of iron than they had enjoyed under the old regime, while the reduction of the duty was a loss to the revenue. No doubt my hon. friends opposite will argue that that was for the benefit of the consumer. The following are the old rates compared with those in the new list:—

—	Former Duty.	Present Duty.
	$ cts.	$ cts.
Pig iron per ton	4 00	2 50
Coal, per ton	0 60	0 53
Corn, per bush	0 7½	Free.
Bar iron, per ton	10 00	7 00
Wheat, per bush	0 15	0 12½
Flour, per bbl	0 75	0 60
Corn meal	0 40	0 25

I have selected those items to show that wherever the duties affected the trade from the United States, they have been lowered, and the consequence is that larger importations have taken place from the United States during the last nine months than at any previous period. So far, therefore, as preference in the new tariff is concerned, it was in favour of the United States rather than of Great Britain. Now, let us look at the importations from the mother country and see how far the hon. gentlemen opposite have carried out the principle of free trade. Here are the duties imposed upon a number of articles which are principally imported from Great Britain with the 12½ per cent deducted:—

—	Former Duty.	Present Duty.
	p. c.	p. c.
Carpets	30	30⅝
Shawls	25	26¼
Linen	30	30⅝
Doylies	30	30⅝
Dress goods	22½	21⅞
Sewing thread	12½	13⅛
Cotton fabrics	30	30⅝
Laces	30	30⅝
Braids	30	30⅝
Musical instruments	25	26¼
Cutlery	25	26¼

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Is the hon. gentleman giving our rate of duty on English goods or on goods generally?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am speaking of the tariff as it exists, with the 12½ off, and that applies to the world, but what I want to point is that the duties have been decreased on importations from the United States while on those from Great Britain the duties have been actually increased. Is it any wonder that the manufacturers of this country say that the present tariff is as good for them as the old one in many respects? Is it any wonder that the late election in Centre Toronto was carried more on a personal issue than on party lines by the election of one of the strongest protectionists in that city—by the election of a gentleman who boasted that he had supervised every single item in the tariff, and more particularly the iron duties, and the manufactures of machinery in which he is himself engaged.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—There is the 12½ per cent reduction.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am aware of that. There will be a 12½ per cent reduction on goods until the first of July.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Not on goods imported from the United States.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Allow me to make my own statement: 12½ per cent until the first of July, and after that an additionnal 12½ per cent, upon goods imported into this country under what is termed the preferential tariff. That will not apply to any country, the United States among them, except they reduce their tariffs, but it is open to be taken advantage of by the United States, or any country that may think proper to reduce their tariff, not to a level with ours, but in the words of the resolution, to a level, on the whole, equal to ours; hence the clause does not apply to England exclusively; it applies to every country in the world that has any tariff regulation which is as low as the Canadian tariff The best evidence of that is that the preference has been extended to many countries—I think some 15 or 20, outside those countries which are governed in their commercial relations with England and her colonies, by what is known as the favoured nations clause. If any one has taken the trouble to look at the different tariffs throughout the world in the smaller principalities and smaller countries, outside of France and Germany, and some portions of Austria, and one of the Australian colonies in particular, he will find that all their tariffs are lower than the Canadian tariff, and consequently they come within the meaning of the resolution which provides for the reduction of the duties. I will not weary the House with other figures upon this point. But it has been also stated that the government have adopted a free-trade policy, and I was a little astonished in reading the newspapers to find in the reported speech of the mover of the address—I suppose I can refer to what appeared in the newspapers, it is public property—in which he said that the Liberal party never pledged itself to remove every vestige of protection or of adopting free trade. I do not know how the present tariff will meet the approval and approbation of my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Boulton), particularly when you look at its operations, and the effect that it is having upon the trade of the country generally. I will even, at the risk of wearying the House for a few moments, refer to some of the utterances of the party in power, in order that we may judge of the correctness of that statement. I may say that one would be a little surprised, in reading the debates of the other House and the utterances of ministers, to find that they never attempt to justify the non-fulfilment of the professions which they made before they came into office, and yet you hear members of the party justifying the actions of the government in continuing the tariff as it is. Speaking from a personal standpoint, according to the views I hold upon the question of the fiscal policy of this country, more particularly with reference to protection, I do not find any fault with the course they have pursued; but when we are told, as we have been told by the mover of the address, that the predictions made before the elections of the destruction of our industries had not been fulfilled, but that everything was prosperous, why then we can only reply that the people of this country were dolts enough to believe that the professions which public men had made would be honestly carried out. In the language of Mr. Bertram the other day in the House, had the policy indicated in their speeches been carried out, we would have seen the destruction of our industries, and the prostration of trade in the country. I am going to read a few extracts in order that they may be placed in a succinct manner before the people and upon record, to show how grossly the men at present in power have violated every promise that they have made when they were in opposition. I read in a paper a short time ago a very eloquent lecture delivered by the Hon. Geo. Washington Ross, Minister of Education for Ontario, in which he made this declaration:

> In Canada the conditions are such—and I know of no liberal who took any other ground—that free trade is impracticable.

That is a very good sentiment, but it sounds strange coming from the lips of a leader in the Liberal party, after our experience of the last ten or fifteen years. Then we have the mover of the address in the Commons the other day declaring that the Liberal party never pledged themselves to adopt free trade principles. Let us see what some of them said. Mr. Laurier, the present premier, at the Ottawa conference in 1893, made this declaration:

> We shall never rest until it (protection) is wiped out entirely.

In Peel the same gentlemen said :

I propose that we shall follow England's example and open our ports to the products of the world.

In Ottawa at the convention he said :

I preach to you the gospel of absolute destruction to protection ; not a vestige shall remain.

Mr. Laurier at Waterloo, in July, 1893, said :

The Liberal party proposed to tax for revenue only, and not one cent for the protected manufacturer.

At Victoria, B.C., in 1894, he said :

If the Liberals were successful they would cut off the head of protection at once and trample on its body.

I have given these quotations from their speeches in 1890, 1891, 1892, 1893, 1894, 1895, and up to the present time to show how consistent they were in their advocacy of that which they say now they never did advocate. Let me continue. In Montreal, in July, 1895, the Hon. Mr. Laurier said :

In the next place I will assert that, so far as Canada is concerned, the system of protection has been the bane and the curse of Canada.

At Quebec, he said :

Gentlemen, the only way in which Quebec can recover its old time prosperity as a maritime city is by adopting a policy of freedom of trade as it exists in the mother country, Old England. Such is the end we have in view and, as you all know, we are exceptionally well situated to carry on a maritime trade.

In Ottawa, in 1893, he again said :

They (the Conservatives) want to reform the tariff and still retain the principle of protection, but I submit to you that the ideal system is the British system of free trade. Let it be well understood that from this moment we have a distinct issue with the party in power. Their ideal is protection ; our ideal is free trade.

In Waterloo, in 1893, in addressing the electors, that hon. gentleman said :

"I denounce to you the policy of protection as bondage ; yes, bondage ; and I refer to bondage in the same manner in which American slavery was bondage. Sir, our policy is freedom of trade as it exists in England, such as is practised in Great Britain. I propose we should follow England's example, and open our ports to the products of the world."

Mr. Laurier at Newmarket, Sept., 1893, (Globe's Report)—

I will not be satisfied till the last vestige of protection has been removed from the soil of Canada. That is the end to which we are progressing, and the aim which we have in view, and we will not rest till we have achieved that object. When that will be I do not profess to know, but at all events I say that the Reformers of Canada have reforms to carry out, but that our great reform is to put away from the soil of Canada the last vestige of protection.

Mr. Laurier at Winnipeg, as reported in the Toronto Globe of Sept. 4, 1894 :

And now I will ask you, what is the policy of the Liberal party ? I refer to freedom of trade such as exists in England, freedom of trade such as is practised in Great Britain, freedom of trade as it was in vogue at the time of Cobden and Bright. We shall give you free trade, and although it will be a hard fight, we shall not give in one inch, or retrace one step, until we shall have reached the goal, and that goal is the same policy of free trade as it exists in England to-day.

Mr. Laurier at Waterloo, 1893 :

We will tax for revenue, but not one cent for protection. Taxation is an evil that nothing but the requirements of the government can justify. When we are in power—and I don't want to sell the skin of the bear till the bear is shot, yet I think the Tory bear is about to be skinned—we will relieve the people of protection, which is a fraud and a delusion and a robbery. For it is a robbery to take money from one man and give it to another. It is not right that the farmers should be taxed to give workingmen employment in the cities. It is not just to tax workingmen in order to appreciate the prices of farm products.

Mr. Laurier, at the village of Arthur, in North Wellington, on Sept. 17, 1895 :

It was claimed that protection was a benefit to Canada, but it was the bane and curse of the country. Again : Sir John Thompson, at Montreal, said that the tariff would be reformed, but that they would keep to the principle of protection. This, Mr. Laurier went on to say, was no reform whatever. The system was wrong from top to bottom..... The Liberals are opposed to the system. They declare it to be a fraud and a robbery upon the people of Canada. The goal of the Liberal party is freedom of trade such as exists on the other side of the water in the motherland.

Is it any wonder that when Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the Premier of Canada, uttered sentiments similar to those in England, that they should have been accepted ? and is it a wonder that they believed that he had authority and permission from this country, after the elections, to give utterance to sentiments such as characterized his speech upon his arrival ? I noticed in one of the speeches from a member in the opposition in the Lower House the other day, it was stated that he had no mandate from Canada to give utterance to free trade sentiments. I differ from that and take issue with him on that point. I think that from the utterances and from the results of the elections, the people of England had a right to believe that the Premier was honest in his opinions and honest in his declarations, and that he would carry them out as the Conservative party did in 1878, when they adopted the National Policy. I never forgot a remark made to me by a leading member of the Liberal party after Sir L. Tilley had made his first speech in 1879, the session called immediately after the elections of 1878. I was met in the lobby of the House by one of those gentlemen, and he said, "Well, Bowell, you have gone the whole hog." I said, "What do you mean by that"? He said, "You have adopted protection in its entirety." I replied, "Did we not tell the people of Canada that if we were elected we would do so?" "Ah," said he, "I never believed you would." "Well," I said "That is just the difference between you and the party to which I belong." We have had an illustration of the truth of that statement, 18 years afterwards. They went to the people pledged to a certain policy, pledged to the very hilt, that if they were elected they would give free trade to this country the moment they got into power. They adopted the very policy which Sir John Thompson said should be adopted, and would be carried out by the Conservative party, of reforming the tariff—very slightly though, only to the extent in a great measure of removing the specific duties, a point which I will not discuss now, and adopting the ad valorem system, but on the lines of protecting, every industry in this country excepting two, binder twine, on which now some Liberals are trying to have the duty restored, and barbed wire. Now, is the Right Hon. the Premier the only man who made utterances in this way? Why, we have the mild and genial Minister of Trade and Commerce, Sir Richard Cartwright, who never uses, as we all know, strong language. He said, in reference to the protective policy:

The National Policy is worse than war, pestilence and famine.

He also again said:

When we get into power there will be no half measures; we will destroy this policy root and branch. These men and their bonused manufacturers are scoundrels great and scoundrels small.

Then in Montreal, the same gentleman said:

There is no Canadian manufacturer who need be afraid to face the competition of the whole world. Our policy is death to protection.

He also said, see Hansard, page 714, in 1893:

Our policy, first to last, has been to destroy this villainous protective system, which has been grinding out the vitals of this country.

Sir Richard Cartwright—

I, for my part, would be sorry to see the issue dwindled down to a mere question of revenue tariff. This is a very good thing in its way, but very much more than this can be got.

Sir Richard Cartwright's tariff speech, 1894:

Sir, we strike, and we strike for liberty and freedom from this system of protective taxation. I tell the hon. gentlemen that we will not rest until the slavery that they have imposed upon us has become a thing of the past.

Sir Richard Cartwright at Ingersoll:

There are some people of the Liberal party who are there for their fleshpots, and their stock of cotton and some other stock, who did him the justice to believe that he would do what he promised, and that he would not be satisfied with half measures.

One more extract from Sir Richard Cartwright's free trade utterances, see Hansard page 336, 1894:

Sir, they demand our policy. Well, sir, they shall have our policy, and I believe I do speak for my hon. friends beside me. Our policy is death to protection and war to the knife to corruption. Sir, we strike, and we will strike for liberty and freedom from this system of protective taxation. I tell the hon. gentlemen that we will not rest until the slavery that they have imposed upon us has become a thing of the past.

Well, they, like many Conservatives, believed his utterances at that time, as well as those of his colleagues on the trade platform. Then (Mr. now Sir Louis Davies) uttered the same sentiments particularly in the maritime provinces, where he denounced protection as a system "accursed of God and man."

At Middleton, P. E. I., the same gentleman in 1893, declared that:

Whatever doubts or difficulties there may have been about understanding our trade policy in times past, there is none now. Our platform is clear and definite. To-day the people stand face to face with such an issue, and the next contest is to be one between free trade and protection. The policy of the Liberal party is the reform of the tariff by the elimination from it of every vestige of protection.

Columns could be filled, and I could occupy your time for hours in reading extracts to show what the professions of these men were when they were in opposition, I would then ask you to compare those sentiments and those utterances with their deeds since they have been in power. I do not know that I can close this part of my remarks without giving you two lines of their campaign song:

Join together, heart and hand,
Liberals for free trade shall stand.

I do not commend the metre, nor particularly the sentiments, but the opinion is expressed in this doggerel of two lines just as fully as if I had quoted for an hour. If it will not weary the House I should like very much to place on record the opinion which people at a distance have formed of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's tariff and of the present government and their fiscal policy. Pass over the old world and proceed some ten thousand miles away from home into the Australian colonies, for instance, and you will find the newspapers there diagnosing the tariff as correctly as any man could possible do who has watched it from its inception. I have here a tolerably long article, but it is worth reading. It is from the Australian Star, published in Sydney, New South Wales. It was a protectionist colony when I was there a few years ago, but since then they had an election. Hon. Mr. Reed, the present premier, was then leading the opposition, and they had a contest there just as we had an election in this country with Sir Wilfrid Laurier leading the opposition, both upon the same lines exactly. Mr. Reed is an out and out Cobdenite, a free trader pure and simple. He told the people of Australia that if he was elected and Sir George Dibbs was defeated, he would introduce the principle of free trade in its entirety in parliament; and unlike the free traders in Canada he acted up to his promise. The moment the legislature met he abolished the protective principle altogether, placed the taxes upon lands and incomes; and adopted, in fact, a free trade policy pure and simple. That gentleman, when he was in England, might and did very properly, when Lord Hartington, the present Duke of Devonshire, suggested the question of preferential trade with the colonies, repudiate the whole thing. He was honest in his professions. He had carried them out to the letter. He did more than that; he was opposed to what our present premier once designated as "tin-pot titles," he refused to accept any, and went home to Australia as plain Mr. Reed. I instance this to show the difference between the two parties, one in Australia professing free trade principles, and the free trade party in this country. The Australian Star in discussing this question recently, used the following language:

When Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Premier of Canada, recently jubilated in England, he was welcomed there, it will be remembered, with unexampled effusion by the free traders as the true apostle of the gospel according to Cobden. The Cobdenites presented him with a gold medal, as the outward and visible sign of his inward and spiritual free trade grace, and otherwise worshipped at his shrine. And Sir Wilfrid received the acclamations of the faithful with the proud humility of one who knows adoration is his due. He seemed to stand there, the most solitary figure in the empire, outside of Great Britain, lifting his voice and testimony in favour of the only true fiscal faith. He might suffer political martyrdom, but he was strong to do and dare in the sacred cause of free trade. Only a few months previously a general election in Canada had taken place; whilst the main issue in that contest was a dispute about the teaching of religion in the public schools in the province of Manitoba, it was well known that Sir Wilfrid also denounced the fiscal system in operation in the country, and declared that if his party came into office they would sweep away protection.

This accursing thing was stifling the energies of the people, and preventing the proper development of trade and industry, and therefore it was only right that it should be destroyed. At the time Sir Wilfrid Laurier was in London to take part in the Jubilee festivities the English people probably did not know to what extent he had fulfilled the promise to establish free trade in the Dominion, for the newspapers published in Great Britain did not give much information on the subject. They knew, however, that the Canadian parliament had included to the new Tariff Act an admirable provision by which the manufacturers in the mother country were given certain advantages in trading in Canada over manufacturers belonging to foreign lands, and this provision so excited their imagination that they apparently did not take the trouble of ascertaining whether the other provisions in the act were equally liberal from their point of view, or whether, indeed, any real advance beyond the reciprocity arrangement had been made in Canada in the direction of free trade.

The new Tariff Act has recently come into our hands and it is a revelation to us as it must be to the people of England.

As we read its pages the pathetic figure of Free Trade Apostle Laurier fades and is lost alike to imagination and sight. The best that can said of him is "The voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau." For, in truth, Sir Wilfrid Laurier deceived the Cobden Club and obtained its gold medal by using the voice of free trade, while, as for his tariff, no protectionist in this province (New South Wales) even in the wildest of his dreams ever conjured up or ever desired a tariff so thoroughly protectionist as that of the Dominion of "Free Trade" Canada. Examine the schedule of that tariff where you will, from initial "ale" to final "unenumerated goods," and you find a high scale of duties, such as regards New South Wales at least, it has hardly entered into the heart of man to conceive. There is, it is true, a schedule of "free goods"—"articles for the use of the Governor General," "travellers' baggage," "Admiralty charts," "communion plate when imported for the use of the churches," "curling stones," "fossils," and cognate articles not producible in Canada, and certain wares, such as indecent photographs and oleomargarine are prohibited, but with these and a few other exceptions every article imported into that "free-trade" Dominion has to pay heavy duties. Take a few instances: Canned meats, etc., pay 25 per cent ad valorem; mutton and lamb, fresh, pay 35 per cent; paraffine wax candles, 30 per cent; condensed coffee, etc., 30 per cent; apples, 40 per cent; pickles, 35 per cent; books, 30 per cent; buggies, etc., 35 per cent; cotton fabrics, coloured, 35 per cent; ready-made clothing, wholly or in part of wool, 35 per cent, and so on. These, of course, are merely a few instances taken at random of the free trade tariff of Cobden's Canadian disciple, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. These are some of the services to the cause of free trade which have earned him the gold medal of the Cobden Society, the plaudits of English free traders and the profound admiration of "right-thinking" free traders throughout the world.

But the Canadian tariff is not, as no doubt our foreign trade friends would, with their usual ingenuity, like to attempt to represent, a tariff framed in the interests of the greedy manufacturer. It is designed for the benefit of the people. Whenever the Governor in Council has reason to believe that with regard to any article of commerce there exists a ring among manufacturers or dealers to unduly enhance the price of such articles has (the Governor in Council) may empower any judge of the Supreme Court to make summary inquiry and report whether such combination or ring exists.

If the judge reports in the affirmative, and, "if it appears to the Governor in Council that such disadvantage to the consumers is facilitated by the duties of customs imposed on a like article when imported, then the Governor in Council shall place such article on the free list, or so reduce the duty on it as to give to the public the benefit of reasonable competition in such article." It is unnecessary to add that this provision gives the death-blow to selfish combinations, not only of manufacturers, but of retailers, and conclusively shows that the tariff is designed to foster local industries, not at the cost of the consumer, but at that of the employers of cheap labour in Europe and the Orient. Our free trade apologists have, therefore, a great deal to explain away in connection with Canadian trade and commerce and Canada's fiscal system. They must first explain away the tartff; next they must show how this most drastic description of tariff has injured or will injure Canadian manufacturers, or the Canadian consumer, and if they cannot do this, and they cannot with truth, it will be necessary for them to demonstrate how a very much lighter tariff can, with provisos similar to those of the Dominion, which we have quoted, injure either the manufacturers or the cousumers of this province. Finally they may feel it incumbent upon them to explain how Sir Wilfrid Laurier, with his own inflexible fiscal policy, staring him in the face, could by any stretch of truth or of imagination, even, style himself, when in England, a free trader. For our part, we are free to confess that the practice of the Canadian premier seems to be infinitely better and more honest than his precept. At the same time perfect honesty of profession, combined with protection, would never have procured him the gold medal of that eccentric organization, the Cobden Club. We hope, however, that after this exposure we shall hear no more nonsense about Canada being a free trade country, and that no further attempts in this direction will be made to deceive the people of New South Wales.

Now, let us look at the premier's conduct when he came back to Canada. His first speech on his return was made in Montreal. In it he assured the manufacturers in as plain language as he could use, that their industries would not be destroyed, that they would adopt, as far as possible, a permanency of tariff, and in adopting a permanency of tariff the protective principle, upon the lines that had been suggested by Sir John Thompson, which they have adopted, would be carried out. Then, he found that there was a strong sentiment of disapproval of his utterances in England, particularly when he declared that they did not want any preference, though they had professed it by their tariff. When he got to Toronto he made the astounding statement that he had to adopt that principle of diplomacy in order to obtain the denunication of the German and Belgium treaties; or, in other words, he had to swallow at one gulp, all his professions to the people of Canada the moment he set foot upon English soil. In order to what?—to humbug the people of England and lead them to believe that they would adopt every principle which they had professed in regard to the fiscal policy of the country by adopting free trade; and when the olive branch was held out by the Duke of Devonshire (one of the most important Liberals in England, of a family of Whigs and Liberals of a whole life time—now it is true joined with Lord Salisbury, more particularly on account of the Home Rule question) and still further by Mr. Chamberlain—that was rejected by Sir Wilfrid Laurier on the part of Canada, and that, too, in the face of the professions that he had made during the last eight or ten years. Well, he says, I could not obtain the denunciation of these treaties unless I had taken that course. Why, it seems to me a diplomat would have held his tongue! There was no necessity for his rejecting a proposition, however remote it may have been, however indefinite it may have been, the moment he set his foot on the shores of England. All that was necessary for him to do, when the intimation was given that England was prepared to adopt a more liberal policy, and to give something in return for the opening of our markets to their manufacturers, was certainly to have either thanked them for it, or given such an answer as would have left it open for the future, when the conference met, to discuss the question.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What proposition am I to understand the Duke of Devonshire made?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not say a proposition was made, I said the olive branch was held out by the Duke of Devonshire that a preferential trade with England could be adopted.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—On what basis? It makes a great difference.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It does, if any basis was suggested; but no basis was suggested.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—But was it a protective basis or a free trade basis?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Why ask that question? Have I not already said there was no basis suggested? The premier had said, and he reiterated it the other day, and it was stated by the Globe that the proposition of Mr. Chamberlain was free trade, pure and simple, between England and her colonies; and then he asked this question: Are you prepared, said the premier, to adopt that policy? The answer is that the London Times took exception to that statement. The London Times said, in reviewing the article that was in the Globe, that Mr. Chamberlain was a sensible man, and he would never make such a proposition, and we have no evidence that he did make such a proposition. On the contrary, the record shows what Mr. Chamberlain proposed at that conference, and he makes no such proposition there. When asked the other day what took place at that conference, the premier said his lips were sealed, because he was not permitted to give to the public the proceedings of that conference. May we not naturally ask, how it is that the Globe got possession of that information unless it was given for the purpose of the election at that moment, or concoted by the writer? If the premier took upon himself the responsibility of informing the Globe's editorial writer that such a proposition was made, then his mouth should be open to tell this country the whole of the proceedings that took place in reference to that conference; otherwise it is a a gross breach of faith on the part of the premier to those who formed that conference. Every man who reflects will come to the conclusion, that he made the grievous mistake of his life when he took the position that he did in his first speech in Liverpool, reiterated through the whole of England wherever he had an opportunity of speaking. Any one who has watched current events and has followed the policy which Mr. Chamberlain has carried out ever since he has been in office, knows that it has been one having for its object the unity of the empire and was prepared to fight our battle with the people of England upon this very question. And had it not been for Sir Wilfrid Laurier's declarations, backed by those of the premier of New South Wales, I doubt not we should be rapidly on the road towards receiving something like a preference in the market of England, such a preference as was indicated by the Hon. Wilfrid Laurier in his speech in London before he left for England, when he declared in the strongest possible language that he was in favour of preferential trade, that every man in Canada was in favour of a preference in the English market; and then he said this: If we had a preference in the English market for our wheat and meat and cheese, of what inestimable value it would be for the commerce of this country.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does the hon. member say Mr. Chamberlain was ready to give us preferential trade?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Well, I must say this, that question is very much like drawing a herring across the trail. It has nothing to do whatever with the point I was making. What I say is, Mr. Chamberlain's whole policy has been that of colonial preference, and he stated himself that, after the declaration of Mr. Laurier, he would not touch the question with a pair of tongs, that it was hard enough to fight the free traders of England on that question, even with the approval and consent of the whole of the colonies at his back; but they, having deserted him, and saying they did not want it, he was not going to run his head against a stone wall. That was the position of Mr. Chamberlain, and no one knows better than my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Mills) that Mr. Chamberlain's whole policy has been more liberal towards the colonies than that of any colonial minister that has existed in his and my day: that he has done everything he possibly could to cement the union between the different parts of the empire. Preferential trade was one of the grandest schemes that could possibly have been devised; and I believe that the people of England were beginning to realize that fact, but when Lord Rosebery said, in view of what had taken place and what had been uttered by the two premiers of the two premier provinces, Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Reed, the question was out of the range of practical politics at the present day. And so it is. But what I was saying is this, that Mr. Laurier enunciated certain views at London, Canada, where he pointed out the great advantage that preferential trade would be to Canada, and at the very moment he set his foot on English soil he denounced the policy of preferential trade, declaring that Canada did not want it. I have occupied more time than I intended on this point. There are one or two others, however, to which I desire to call the attention of the House before I sit down. I notice in the address a reference to the giving of contracts by which the sweating system is to be abolished. I confess I am at a loss to understand what that means. Am I to understand that in giving out contracts for the manufacturing of articles for the government, that there is a clause in the contract instructing the contractor whom he shall employ, how many hours the workmen shall be employed and the wages they shall receive? We all know that the sweating system in manufacturing centres, both in the United States and Europe, is vicious in principle. How has that been adopted here? When did we hear of this before except through the press? And why is it of such importance that a reference to it is put in the Governor General's mouth in opening parliament? Now, I have it from the best authority that in some manufacturing establishments in Canada which have received contracts lately for the manufacture of police and militia clothing, and other things, there is no such restriction—that the contractors can employ women at all hours, make the girls work for starvation wages, and carry out in fact and in practice, that which is denounced as the sweating system. Am I correct in this, or does my hon. friend know, or is it one of those little dodges to get a little cheap popularity? We had announced in flaming letters during the Centre Toronto election that the foreign postage was reduced from five to three cents. Well, there was another evidence that those who were administering the affairs of the country had as little knowledge of what was contained in the Berne Postal Convention, as the Finance Minister and all the ministers of that day, had as to what would be the effect of the German and Belgian treaties upon the preferential tariff. It turned out that they knew nothing about it, until they announced the fact, and their attention was called to it by the Colonial Secretary informing them they had no power; and then they had to do in that as in the preferential trade—back down most ignominiously. Is this sweating paragraph of a similar character? If not, I shall be glad to know what it means. But we have heard a great deal about paternal government. My hon. friend opposite has a dislike to paternal government. He thinks we have no right to interfere with the manner in which people should carry on their business. But here is a system without the warrant of law, as far as I know, I know of no law which justifies interference by the government with any man's manner of carrying on his business. There is, however, one important paragraph which reads as follows:

> The extraordinary gold discoveries recently made upon the Yukon and its tributaries, appear likely to result in an enormous influx of people into that region, and we are glad to hear that the government has taken prompt action for the preservation of law and order in that distant and almost inaccessible locality; and we assure His Excellency that any measures laid before us for that purpose—

What those measures are it is impossible to tell, but any one who reads this paragraph will come to the conclusion that the present government were entitled to all the credit for taking steps to preserve peace and order in that country. It is on a par with most of their other professions. Before I left the late government and while I was president of the Privy Council and had the police force under my control, I took steps to send the first contingent of police into that country to preserve law and order, and looking at what might possibly occur, we took those steps for which the present government now claim credit and consider it of sufficient importance to put it into the Governor's speech. They have, it is true, gone a little further. They have sent an additional force of police to preserve law and order. How far that law and order will be preserved, with their gold regulations to be enforced, remains to be seen in the future, but they are not very likely to preserve law and order if the denunciation of the Liberal press in the North-west Territories and in British Columbia are to be taken as an index of the feeling of the people.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does my hon. friend object to those regulations?

Hon Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I will tell my hon. friend when that question is under consideration. I am not discussing the regulations; I am discussing the modesty of my hon. friends in arrogating to themselves the credit for carrying out the same policy as their predecessors did, and which it is not very likely will accomplish the end in view if the statements of the Liberal press in the North-west and British Columbia are any indications of public feeling. The next matter is with reference to the contract which is to be laid before the House. The contract was placed in my hands after I had commenced speaking; the Senate I think will excuse me if I do not discuss this question as intelligently as I might have done if I had had a few minutes to read it. But I have this to say with reference to the policy of the government, that it is another evidence of the total abandonment of the principles they had advocated for years. We have been told over and over again that entering into contracts by Order in Council was a vicious principle. We have been told over and over again, that all contracts should be given out by tender, but we are told in this case that urgency necessitated taking a different course. I read in the government organ of this city, a day or two before I came to Ottawa, a statement of this kind, and I was rather surprised, because it was written in a chuckling and glorifying style. It went on to say that the government had entered into a contract for the construction of a road in order to enable produce to be carried into the Yukon district at the earliest possible moment, and that passengers could get there; and that it had been a great disappointment to many people who have spent large amounts of money in investigating the feasibility of building a road, and that there were over thirty people applying for charters in order to obtain power to enter that country, and that fully half a million of money—you will find it in the Free Press of a few days ago—had been spent by these gentlemen in order to ascertain whether they would be justified in investing money in constructing the road, and that they went away chopfallen because, without their knowledge, a contract had been secretly entered into with two gentlemen, to give them that whole country. Whether that is justice to the outsiders or not I am not going to argue just now. It has been said also that this road is to be built without the expenditure of one dollar of public money. That was well illustrated by a little paragraph I saw. A farmer went home and told his wife he had bought her a very expensive piano. "Well, my dear," she said, "You should not have done that, we cannot afford it." "Don't trouble yourself about that, I never gave a dollar for it. I gave the farm for it." While we don't give any cash subsidy we give away an enormous territory which is supposed to be worth hundreds of millions of dollars. If the reports of Mr. Ogilvie and those who have been in that country, and the investigations of prospectors are to be relied upon, then we have given millions. But why was it necessary to take this step? Parliament was to meet within five or six days after the date when this contract was being entered into. But nobody knew; it was kept a profound secret. Contrast the course of hon. gentlemen opposite with the conduct of the government of Western Australia when they were placed in a precisely similar position. About four or five years ago gold was discovered in Western Australia. There was just such clamouring for railways into that country, about 120 or 130 miles, as there is now for railways into the Yukon district. Did the Australian government, with Sir John Forest as governor, adopt the policy that has been pursued by this government? Not at all. They asked for tenders. There were scores of people waiting for it, and they made this provision: "We will give you a contract for the construction of this road into the gold territories," and time being the essence of the contract, they limited them to a certain period within which it should be completed, but they added this addendum "you shall have the use of that road from the time of its completion until the time provided in the contract." The moneyed men went to work; they built the road at about one-half the ordinary cost for the construction of roads, and for the seven or eight or nine months that they had that road under their own control to collect the revenues from freight and passengers, they collected more than paid for the construction of the whole road, and retired wealthy men. Of course, I admit the difference between the climates. I admit the difficulties in the Yukon country, which they will say, no doubt, are almost insurmountable. They are not insurmountable, because if the reports be true that road can be built at $25,000 a mile ; that is the report of those who have been over the road. If that be so, a policy similar to that adopted in Western Australia could be followed here. You might have extended the time ; you might have said : You shall have ten or fifteen months to complete that road, and we will give you a monopoly of the proceeds of passengers, traffic or trade for one, or two, or even three years, if you like ; and if you had given it to them for five years, the country would have been in an infinitely better position than under the bargain which has been made. Then, there is another point. If the contractors for the construction of the Western Australia Railway into the gold fields could construct that road and be paid by the government very little more than half its actual cost, and could by the passenger fares and the freight enrich themselves in a very few months, comparatively speaking, in a country where the population is as small as it is in Western Australia, what would be the result if this is to be the main line to the Yukon district with a country like ours. We have the whole of British Columbia, we have the whole population of the Dominion. We have the mining population, and those who enter into these speculations of 65,000,000 in the United States, who are rushing there by the tens of thousands, so that in three or four years the owners of that 150 miles could have retired millionaires, simply from the freights and passenger rates alone. Instead of that, you give them a charter to build a road and give them a monoply of the whole country for five years, and you give them 3,750,000 acres of gold land. It is true you may say, formerly it was considered to be worth nothing, but it has been known for the last quarter of a century that gold existed in this country, and if you want any evidence of that, read an extract from one of Sir John Macdonald's letters contained in his history by Mr. Joseph Pope, when he was writing to Lord Strathcona on this very important question, in which the then Sir Donald Smith pointed out the necessity of securing, under the Washington treaty, the navigation of the Yukon and Stikine Rivers, because, he says, that is looked upon as a gold country. The Hudson Bay people I suppose, had discovered the fact that there was gold in that country, but acting on their policy they never gave the information to the public. But that is not all. Contractors are to receive some $375,000 from the British Columbian Government to aid in its construction. So that you have all these advantages granted to a couple of gentlemen who are undertaking this contract. Personally, I have the highest esteem and greatest respect for these gentlemen and I do not blame them for entering into the contract obtaining the charter for 150 miles for which they are to receive 3,750,000 acres of land and $375,000 from British Columbia and a monopoly of the carrying trade into that country for five years at least, and I believe there is something about a ten year concession in the contract of which I cannot speak now, because I am not aware of the actual contents of the document which has been placed in my hands. What I ask is this : whether, with a proposition of that kind, this House or this country would be justified in adopting it and in placing the law upon the statute-book. Urgency, I know, is all that can be said in its favour. Urgency existed in Australia at the time I refer to. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) shakes his head, but the fact that they made time the essence of the contract is the best possible answer to that wise shake of the head of the hon. Minister of Justice, that urgency induced the government to take the course they did, and I do not hesitate to say that a more extravagant and indefensible contract—perhaps I may change my mind after I read the terms—so far as it has been made public, could not be conceived by any person, nor can I understand how any government could enter into such an arrangement secretly on the eve of meeting parliament. Would it not have been as easy to have said to all these gentlemen seeking charters "We want this road built immediately, it is urgent that it should be constructed in order to keep the people who go into that country from starving, and what are the terms upon which you will build the road?" I believe the road could have been built without the granting of one single dollar of money or one single acre of land. The traffic over that section of the road will be sufficient to justify the expenditure of any amount of money in order to enable them to construct it When the measure comes up I shall take the trouble to go more fully into this whole question, because then I hope to be better informed upon the subject ; but in the meantime I cannot believe that this country will justify the adoption of any contract involving the sequestration of so large an amount of the public domain, and that too of a kind and character out of which it is believed millions of dollars can be made. My hon. friend asked me a moment ago if I approved of the regulations. This I do know, that if the public statements be true, this favoured company is to pay a royalty of one per cent upon the products of the different mines which they may sell, or which they may operate, while the hard working miner has to pay ten per cent. The man who goes there, and develops the industry, the man who discovers it would have to pay ten per cent, while this favoured company, with its four million acres of land supposed to be gold producing, would have to pay only one per cent. I leave that question at present until the whole statement comes up before us. There are three other matters referred to in the speech, superannuation, the plebiscite, and the franchise. I am glad to see that the government intend to make some changes in the Superannuation Act. That is like many of their other principles. Some of the ministry in 1869 were its strongest supporters—not to say adherents—of a Superannuation Act. Being at that time in the House of Commons, I voted against it, for reasons which it is not necessary to repeat now, but the manner in which the Superannuation Act has been abused within the last twelve months, should induce its strongest advocate to suggest some changes. I shall take occasion to bring before the House one illustration at least in my own city of the manner in which the Superannuation Act has, to my mind, been most grossly abused, and I question whether they have acted in accordance with the law. The plebiscite I have already expressed my opinion upon. I am opposed to the principle in toto. I believe it is an abnegation of the functions of parliament. I believe it to be the duty of a government, under our responsible system, to come down to parliament, if they believe prohibition to be right, with a well defined scheme, and ask the approval of parliament, and if parliament disapproves, to go the people and ask them to sanction it, and stand or fall by what they consider to be a great moral principle. Whether it be moral or immoral, it is the duty of the government, to my mind, to have opinions upon the subject, to have a policy upon the subject, and to come down to parliament and ask for its verification, or not to touch it at all. Is it anything but a shirking of responsibility for the government to go to the people and say: "If you want so and so we will do so and so." Is that the principle of responsible government? If they had gone to the country upon the question of prohibition and taken their political lives in their hands, individually and collectively, upon that question, then it would be quite right, quite proper to come down to parliament, and either propose or reject it. And so it is with the whole system. I believe it to be a violation of the principles of responsible government, the shirking of a responsibility which devolves upon the Ministers of the Crown. I do not mean that offensively, although it may, perhaps, sound offensive. As to the franchise, I am in favour of a uniform franchise. I care very little what it is at present, but I have never been in favour in my life of what you call manhood suffrage or universal suffrage. But when we consider the extent to which the suffrage has been extended to the people of the Dominion, it is a grave question whether it would not be better to have one uniform system over the whole Dominion, with manhood suffrage with certain restrictions as to age and residence, rather than have a franchise different in each province.. I believe it is universal suffrage in P.E.I. and the same in British Columbia, with restricted suffrage in the province of Quebec and a complicated suffrage in the province of Ontario, and so on throughout the whole Dominion. I am speaking for myself and not for any other party. I have come to this conclusion, that it would be much better, and particularly for the Dominion Parliament, where every young man pays into the treasury of the country in proportion to his consumption of imported goods, or the consumption of excise goods, and where every man is subject, under certain ages, to military duty in defence of the Dominion and of the empire. The principle, to my mind, is not so strong when you apply it to the provinces, because their taxation is based upon property and income, almost exclusively, and many of the younger men pay no taxes at all, they having no property or income sufficient to tax. So that the principle as applied to the Dominion is quite different from that applied to the different provinces. There are many other points to which I would very much like to allude from a political standpoint, but I think I have said quite enough to show at least the opinions that I hold in reference to the policy of the government, their abnegation of principle, their total disregard of all promises that they ever made; and we must look forward in the future, I suppose, to a continuance of something of the same kind. I hope they will never adopt their free trade doctrines in this country, but I would like them to be honest and straightforward and admit that they have changed their opinions and know that it cannot be carried out, and that they will continue to protect all industries in this country to the fullest possible extent.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will begin my observations to-day like my hon. friend opposite, by congratulating the mover and seconder of the address in reply to His Excellency's speech upon the very lucid and clear statements which they have made with regard to the public policy foreshadowed in that speech. These hon. gentlemen have acquitted themselves with credit in the addresses which they have delivered to this House, but they have done precisely what I had no doubt they would do when they undertook the honourable and dignified task of replying to his Excellency's speech. I may say that I thank my hon. friend for the very kind observation which he he has addressed to this assembly in respect to myself. As leader of this House I shall endeavour to discharge my duties in a way consistent with the duties and functions of this dignified chamber, and I trust that I shall receive, and I have no doubt I shall receive from hon. gentlemen, that consideration and that fair treatment which they, I am sure, will be always ready to bestow upon one who relies upon them for a support for those measures which he believes to be in the public interest. Now my hon. friend, while he said some kind things with regard to myself, nevertheless said some very hard things with regard to the government of which I am a member, and in respect to a policy for which I with my colleagues am responsible. The hon. gentleman thinks that we are rather a dishonest group of persons, at all events politically, and that there is nothing that he can say of us that is worse than we merit. Now, I do not agree with my hon. friend in that particular. I am sure that this hon. assembly will not be surprised at my dissent, and I think I shall be able to show that the hon. gentleman has taken rather a jaundiced view of the position of the government, and that they are not chargeable with all those inconsistencies and with all those derelictions of duty which the hon. gentleman has with so much force, attributed to us. The hon. gentleman complains of what is in the speech and he complains of what is not there. The hon. gentleman reminded me, in the address which he delivered to the House, of a sermon that was preached by a western minister many years ago, in which he said his subject naturally divided itself into three parts, and he would discuss them. In the first place he would tell them what they knew and he did not know, and in the second place he would tell them what he knew and they did not know, and in the third place he would tell them what neither of them knew. Now the hon. gentleman has made a division, not simply of the policy of the government foreshadowed in the speech, the work of the session, but he has decried everything to which he thinks the government of the day is committed, and although the policy of the administration was marked out for a period of five years, he complains that the whole work of legislation which the government has promised to undertake is not foreshadowed in the speech from the Throne and undertaken in a single session. Now this would be a heroic work for which I confess myself—and I believe my colleagues will join me in that confession—that we are altogether unable to accomplish in a single session, and I doubt very much whether my hon. friend would not think us unreasonable if he were in our places and we were to make similar demands at his hands. The hon. leader of the opposition in this House has told us that the country is prosperous. He admits that; it is idle to deny it under the circumstances. The trade and navigation returns, the state of the revenue, all proclaim the fact, but my hon. friend says the government deserves no credit for this. It is only when my hon. friend was in power; it is only when my hon. friend was associated with some of the colleagues that are here and some elsewhere that the hon. gentleman was willing to claim, or thought right to claim, credit to the administration for every good that the country received. If the prices were high for farm products, if the crop was abundant, if the season was favourable for a bountiful harvest, my hon. friend claimed that as the work of the administration, but he will not admit that the present condition of trade and commerce and the present prosperous condition of the country is in the slightest degree attributable to the government or to its policy. The hon. gentleman complained that there was nothing said in the speech from the Throne about the fast line of steamers. My hon. friend had that subject before him and, if I remember rightly, an appropriation was taken to establish a fast line of steamers many months before my hon. friend went out of office. He accomplished nothing. He tried to do something, but he did not succeed, and he must not be surprised if, under the circumstances, the negotiations which the government have undertaken, and which they have been carrying on, have not yet been completed. My hon. friend speaks of the matter of a Pacific cable and of better trade relations with the Australian colonies. I am not complaining, nor am I expressing any dissent from the views my hon. friend has addressed to this assembly in respect to these matters. I would be very far indeed from expressing any opinion that it was not important to extend our trade with the other portions of the empire, in so far as the elements for mutual exchange exist between them and us, I think it is very important that the work should be accomplished. And I am ready to go this far: I am ready to say to my hon. friend that when he succeeded in bringing about the intercolonial conference some few years ago, he did a very good thing, not only for this country but for the empire, because it brought men from the different colonies of the empire together, and the mere hearing and discussion of matters of common interest among them could not do otherwise than confer a substantial benefit upon them. The union—the common brotherhood; the union of the common interest; the importance of securing, maintaining and upholding the unity of the empire were matters of no little consequence, and I did my hon. friend full credit for having initiated that matter and for all that he accomplished. Let me say more: My hon. friend has expressed sentiments here to-day with regard to protection and with regard to the promotion of industries by a system of taxation—of burdensome taxation, and it always seemed to me extraordinary that while he fully appreciated the importance of imperial and intercolonial intercourse, he did not seem to appreciate this fact that the fiscal regulations which he was urgently advocating stood in the way of accomplishing the most beneficial results that could flow from such a system. My honourable friend's patriotism led him to decry closer relations between different portions of the empire. My honourable friend's little England view in this regard led him to erect a Chinese wall around this country as far as he could, and tended to make Canada a close preserve for one class of the community against the other classes. I am not going to follow my honourable friend in the discussion on the tariff changes. Some changes have been made and those changes are all in the direction of freer trade and less restricted intercourse. My hon. friend has spoken to-day of the importance of trade between different portions of the empire, and he has referred to views expressed by the Duke of Devonshire, and what in very vague terms would have been accomplished if Sir Joseph Chamberlain's views had been seconded and he had been encouraged to pursue the line on which he set out. But what that line is I do not precisely know, nor do I think my hon. friend is any better informed than I am. That Mr. Chamberlain would have agreed to impose duties against all the rest of the world and to establish free trade between the different portions of the empire, I do not think and I do not believe. I am of opinion that Mr. Chamberlain would be very far from making such a proposition. I believe it for this reason, that if he had made it it would have been impossible for him, in the present state of public opinion in England, to have remained in public life. He could not have maintained his position as a member of any government, whether it be a radical government such as he favoured when he first entered public life, or the government of Lord Salisbury. I do not care what government you look at in the mother country, you will find it favoured unrestricted trade. The people are unanimously in favour of such a policy, and Mr. Chamberlain, as a man not desiring to render himself wholly useless in the public opinion of the country, as it exists for the time being, could not and would not commit himself to a proposition of that kind. There was this difference between the views advocated by my hon.

friend and those associated with him, and the views that have been adopted by this government with respect to this question of trade. My hon. friend, while he maintains that it was important to establish closer trade relations between different portions of the empire, was altogether opposed to doing that without the British government would make some special concession in favour of Canadian products that were put upon the British market. That he could not get; that would not be conceded; that would seriously interfere with 85 per cent of the trade of the United Kingdom, and that being the case, the hon. gentleman was not willing to make those arrangements which we have made, and which I regard as of great political importance, apart altogether from the commercial advantages which may spring from those trade regulations. Does any man doubt that the concession of preferential trade —especially preferential trade to the United Kingdom—brought this country at once into prominence, led to a discussion of the affairs of Canada, and its relations to the empire, to Canada as a field for immigration, to Canada as a field for the investment of British capital? Does not everyone see that, apart from the question of trade, an immense impetus was given to immigration in this direction by the adoption of this policy and that it has conferred upon Canada, in the friendship which it has secured from the mother country in the sympathy which has been extended to this country in consequence of that concession, a standing and a position which it would not have enjoyed and was not likely otherwise to obtain. My hon. friend said that, so far as the second chamber is concerned, certain parties advocated its abolition. I do not know whether my hon. friend intended to point those observations at myself personally or not, but I can say this to the hon. gentleman: I have never advocated a single chamber. I have always taken the position that two chambers were essential, under our constitutional system, to the preservation of liberty and property and to the security and permanence of our political institutions.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I said distinctly that I was not aware that the hon. gentlemen had ever advocated the abolition of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—On the contrary, I have always maintained the necessity of two chambers. In appealing to the constituency that for 30 years I represented, some three years ago, when the question was put to me whether I would favour the abolition of the Senate—because that seems to be a favourite doctrine with our Patron friends—I said I would as soon think of crossing lake Erie in a canoe and expect to reach safely the other shore as to carry on the government of this country for any length of time with out a revolution if we had only a single chamber. That has been my view for years, and it is the view which I entertain to-day; but the manner in which a second chamber should be constituted I consider a fair question for public discussion, and the views that I have entertained upon the possiblitity of improving this chamber, by altering the mode of its constitution, I still entertain. My hon. friend made another statement which seems to me was scarcely candid, and let me invite his attention to it. He spoke of preferential trade with Great Britain, but he said the effect of our present tariff was merely to increase our trade with the United States and diminish our trade with Great Britain, and the hon. gentleman referred to the trade and navigation returns as an evidence of that fact. Now, I do not admit that that is any evidence of my hon. friend's proposition. In the first place, the tariff which he quoted—the general tariff—is not the tariff which is applicable between this country and Great Britain. That tariff is less, and the articles which the hon. gentleman refers to as articles upon which the duty has been diminished between this country and the United States are articles that do not come from England at all, and in regard of which there is no competition between the United States and England. The duty on coal he says was reduced from sixty to fifty cents, the duty on corn from ten cents to free corn, and that these things the United States have a preference. Now, the United States is the only country from which those articles are to any extent purchased by Canada. Take, for instance, corn. There was any amount of United States corn put upon the Canadian market a little over a year and a half ago for eight or ten cents a bushel. I am speaking now of corn unshelled, and that corn was purchased by whom?

By the farmers, throughout the west in large quantities for feeding their stock.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Does the hon. gentleman say that the United States shipped cob corn into this country?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, I have seen it in the elevators at Windsor. Although I had a considerable quantity, as a farmer, on hand, I thought of purchasing at the low rate then prevailing because it was there for sale and a great many of our farmers in the west did so. That, I think, was an advantage to the agricultural population; my hon. friend may take a different view, but after all, that is a question on which we may differ. I believe it is of very great consequence to the people of this country that they should have the opportunity of buying cheap corn.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What about the other articles?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Which other articles—coal?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, iron.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I took a note of two articles which the hon. gentleman mentioned. I am taking these as illustrations.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Taking all the items that I mentioned, I do not agree as to your deduction.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think the hon. gentleman will see that I am entirely right.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In my opinion that certainly was the view of the country, for those who purchased those articles, if they thought they were going to be injured by their purchases, would never have made them. The hon. gentleman speaks of the destruction of our industries. No one in this country, so far as I know, proposes to abolish customs duties as a means of revenue. This country is very largely in debt. It has to meet its obligations in some way or other, and a tax on importations and on commerce, fairly imposed, is perhaps as fair a way of collecting revenue as any that can, for the present, be devised, at all events in the present state of public opinion. About that there was no difference between hon. gentlemen opposite and those who are members and supporters of the present government. But when you propose to impose the tax, not for the purpose of revenue, but for the purpose of enabling some one to sell an article at the expense of his neighbour at a larger price than he otherwise could obtain, and that neighbour is compelled to take from his income and to hand it over by virtue of the operation of that law to the party who puts that article upon the market, the hon. gentleman then is using the power of taxation, not for the purpose of revenue, but for the unequal distribution of the profits of the various industries in which the people of this country are engaged. When a state of things is once established, it may be very difficult to change it. The opportunity does not always come to make an extensive change. We are bound to consider the social order of things; we are bound to take into consideration what we can accomplish by way of reform with as little disturbance as possible. It is one thing to force industries into existence by special legislation; it is another thing, when they become once established, to undertake ruthlessly to pull them up by the roots. That we cannot undertake; that we never said we would enter upon. We have said that we were in favour of a revenue tariff, and we believe that the freer you can make trade, the better it will be for the country. Let hon. gentlemen look at what would be the consequences if you were to adopt the views of my hon. friend opposite.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—But your Prime Minister says he wants free trade?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend so we do all want it, and we want many things we cannot always get, but we can aspire after them and perhaps in time will be able to accomplish them. Let us look at the condition of these things. Supposing this country were out of debt; supposing we had other means of meeting the cost of government than the imposition of customs duties more advantageous than those, then my hon. friend might say the country would be ruined because you cannot prevent the people of Canada purchasing what they require abroad, because you cannot impose any duty. You have no pretext for imposing any duty to keep those articles out, so that if the views expressed by my hon. friend opposite and those who agree with him are correct, then the government of this country —if the country were out of debt—would be in a most unfortunate condition. I do not agree with that view.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The whole of the argument of the hon. gentleman is that "if." "If ifs and ans were pots and pans what would the tinkers do?"

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend can answer that better than I can. I cannot tell what they would do. I put a hypothetical case. I say that if my hon. friend's contention is right, then the greater the burden of taxation the more certain the protection is and the greater would be the security. That is not my position at all, I say if you had started out without a public debt, with fewer public burdens; if no expenditures had taken place except those which were absolutely necessary, you would have to-day in this country some millions more of agriculturists. Would they be alone? Certainly not, for when your farmer takes up his land, there must be a blacksmith; there must be a carpenter. He requires his house to be built and furnished; he requires all those appliances which give employment to skilled labour and without which the country itself could not ex st, and it in no way depends upon the imposition of heavy burdens, nor the exclusion of goods from other portions of the world. Now, I am not saying that we should adopt heroic measures. We are anxious to carry on the government economically. We are anxious to reduce the burdens of taxation as far as the present circumstances of the country will permit, and when a still higher tide rises in the finances of this country there will be a further opportunity of making further reductions. If in the case of the settlement of the North-west regions in which gold is found you have that tide of immigration which formerly flowed towards Africa and Australia, turned in the direction of the Yukon country and the North-west and British Columbia, and you have seven or eight millions to bear the burdens which are now borne by five millions, does any man say it will be in the interest of the country to maintain the present rate of taxation? Would it not be advantageous to this country, if you had the power to further reduce taxation? I do not think that can be questioned—at all events successfully questioned, and that being so, I do not propose to accomplish the reform, nor have the government proposed to accomplish the reform that they call for in this country in a night; but we do expect, with the progress of the country, with the development of its resources that those burdens which are borne by a small population will be borne by a very much larger population at an early date.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Will no improvements be made in the meantime?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly improvements will be made where they are required, but I trust no wild or visionary expenditures will take place which add nothing to the wealth or the prosperity of the country. I wish to say a few words with regard to the measures of the government proposed during the present session. My hon. friend has criticized the proposed railway scheme into the Yukon country, and he says that this is a measure made by Order in Council. Most measures are, but this is a measure that is not yet in force. It is a measure that depends upon the will of parliament. Parliament can say whenever this measure comes before it that it is a bad measure and ought not to become law. We have not invaded the authority of parliament; we have not taken anything out of the hands of parliament. Parliament is as free to deal with this contract as it was to deal with the contract for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which also was submitted to parliament and required the ratification of parliament to bring it into being. My hon friend refers to a precedent in the history of Western Australia, to show that we ought to have advertised for tenders. I admit that ordinarily that is the correct rule; but there may be emergencies in which that cannot be done. Ordinarily we ought to ask parliament for an appropriation of public moneys when they are required, but in England they have sometimes been obliged to use money to meet an emergency which could not be foreseen, and have had to come to parliament for a indemnity. They say it is in the public interest and we throw ourselves on parliament to sustain us for taking our political lives in our hands to accomplish this result. That is the position in which we stand to-day. There is no comparison between the case of western Australia and the Klondike country. Australia has not a country of 70,000,000 people beside it which may at any moment take possession of the country. Australia has not a country beside it which may at any moment close every gate and every avenue which leads into the country which you call your own, but that is the position of Canada at this moment. We find along the whole of the Pacific coast the only avenues into our territory in the hands of our neighbours. There is a quantity of land a few miles away from Skagway that we believed they would recognize as a boundary, but you will see it stated in almost every United States periodical published on the Pacific coast that is not the boundary line; that the boundary extends ten geographical leagues inland, and that their territory reaches to that point. If it does, the Treaty of Washington gives them the right to navigate the rivers in our territory, and instead of the government of Canada holding that territory, it would be the government of the United States that would hold it, and you could not send a policeman into the territory nor a man with arms, nor make the slightest defence of your country without the will and grace of your neighbours. That is the position. That is a position on which this government has determined shall not continue, and we have undertaken to construct a railway, in the public interests, to defend Canadian rights and British interests in the North-west.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The building of a railway will not prevent the use of the Yukon by the people of the United States.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If the honourable gentleman was a little more disposed to listen fairly, instead of listening unfairly, he would see that it is vital to us that we should have means of communication with the Klondike by which we could send supplies and the police and our officers, under our own control.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is not the navigation of the Stikine River and Lake Teslin free to both countries the same as the St. Lawrence?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, I do not deny that, but the hon. gentleman knows it is only for commercial purposes, and the treaty says so. The hon. gentleman knows that under the treaty of St. Petersburg, we had the right to navigate the Yukon for all purposes, and every other river which flows into the ocean, but we lost that when the treaty of 1871 was negotiated. By the route through the Chilcoot Pass you go into a United States port, and whether you are allowed to land police there, or land arms, or send any equipment through, depends upon your neighbours. If you go to the White Pass, there is the same condition of things, and until this railway is constructed we have not the means of getting into that territory, except by the favour of our neighbour. Every hon. gentleman knows that the Edmonton route is a most desirable one, and one which it may be necessary to open at an early date, yet it is fifteen hundred miles, and the whole season would be lost if it was adopted, and at present it would be quite impossible to get the required supplies through by that route. We believe it is in the public interest that that road should be constructed. If we had delayed it could not have been built this year. The work must be carried on while the snow is upon the ground. There must be means of sending in supplies, and storing them at the head of the navigable waters of Teslin Lake. There are provisions made, as hon. gentlemen will see, that that may be accomplished, and that road, which is to be made within thirty or forty days fit for ordinary travel, is to be made a completed railway, connecting the navigable waters on the one side with the navigable waters on the other, by the 1st of September and it will be in the power of the government to send in such men as may be necessary to maintain law and order with a large population, which will be mostly foreign, and to retain that country, and to maintain the interests of Canada within it. In fact there are many things it would be most desirable to say in our defence which cannot in the public interest be said this moment, but I am satisfied that there is not one in this House no matter how strong his feelings may be, no matter how anxious he might be that there should be a change of government, if he knew the circumstances as I and my colleagues know them, who would not defend the government, even if our arrangement had been less favourable than the one which we have made.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—We should have that knowledge. We should have the papers on the table.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, the hon. gentleman should not have it, because the hon. gentleman knows that in the political relations that exist between countries it is impossible to communicate that. My hon. friend knows that as well as I know it, and so, for the time being, my hon. friend has to permit that information to remain with the government.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—What other country has the right to interfere with what we are doing on our own land? Why cannot the information be given? Why should the other country interfere?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend asks what we are doing on our own land. Take the Lynn Canal. My opinion is the boundary should be drawn at its mouth, but it is in the hands of the United States people, and Skagway and Dyea are for the present United States ports. We supposed the furthest they would claim would be the summit of the pass at Chilcoot and White Pass, but we find the United States flag was raised at Lake Bennett, far north of these places. Our flag at the present time has taken its place, and the hon. gentleman knows that out of these matters correspondence may arise which could not be communicated to the public.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I do not see why it should not be.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I venture to say my hon. friend is the only hon. gentleman in this House who thinks so.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I am sure there are others who think so.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—There are fourteen Ministers in the Cabinet, and the greater part of them married men. How can they expect the secret to be kept from the world?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think I have stated enough to show the hon. gentleman that there was urgency in undertaking this work, and undertaking it at a season when it was possible to push it with some vigour and hope of success. Another measure of the government is the Superannuation Act, which my hon. friend opposite says has been grossly abused in the last six months. My hon. friend will remember that the statement was that it had been grossly abused for the past twelve years, and we think hon. gentlemen perhaps did not make the wisest use of that law. It will be very much as it was in England when the Conservatives, or Tories as they were then called, accused the Cromwellians of desiring a standing army, and the Cromwellians accused them of desiring the same thing also, so that they both began to dislike the idea of a standing army, and got rid of it. I suppose the hon. gentleman would sooner wipe it out than see the abuse continue.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I said that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend has spoken in favour of manhood suffrage. I am not going into a discussion of manhood suffrage, nor the provisions of the Franchise Act. For eighteen years after this union was established we accepted and acted upon the franchise of the provinces, and, so far as I know, no difficulty arose, and no expenses were incurred by this parliament in the preparation of the voters' list, and no special complaint was made. Now, I am not going to defend the measure. It will be time enough for that when it is before the House. We promised that measure while we were in opposition. We advocated it for years. It was an issue when we went to the country, and the opinion of the country has been pronounced upon it; and whether the hon. gentleman thinks we kept faith with the country in regard to the tariff, we, at all events, undertake to keep faith with regard to that particular measure. Then, my hon. friend has referred to the question of the plebiscite, and says he considers it an abnegation of the principle of responsible government. I am devoted to the principle of responsible government, but I do not see that this is an abnegation. There are certain questions of a social character, and you may entertain views on them, and whether your views are practical, and whether it will be in the public interest to carry such a measure or not, will depend wholly upon the state of public opinion, and whatever you may think with regard to the propriety of prohibition, I think no one will maintain that a prohibitory measure which public opinion would not enable you to enforce, which would be disregarded, where you would have illicit distillation and private stills all over the country, and stills by persons whom you could not punish, and dare not undertake to punish, because public opinion sympathizes with them, you would have a condition very much worse indeed than anything that could possibly arise under any well regulated license system. Therefore, I think a measure of this sort, being somewhat sumptuary in its character, is a measure on which you should ascertain the state of public opinion before you undertake to legislate upon the subject. I have briefly alluded to the many points to which my hon. friend referred, and I shall not further trespass upon the indulgence of the House.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate then adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Wednesday, 9th February, 1898.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three O'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

JAPANESE IN THE YUKON COUNTRY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask the Minister of Justice if his attention has been called to the report that an invasion of the Yukon country by the Japanese is expected. I suppose under the treaty between Great Britain and Japan we cannot prevent them coming into our country, though I suppose we might tax them as we tax Chinese, but I think they should be shut out from the mineral country of the Yukon. It would be a serious thing if hordes of people from that country should come into our mines and carry off the proceeds. Of course, they are men who do not take root in our country and we do not want them as citizens of Canada.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My attention has not been called to the subject further than the announcement which I have seen in the newspapers, which I suppose attracted the attention of the hon. gentleman himself. The government have not considered the subject.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I would ask the Minister if he would have maps of the Yukon country placed on the Table of the House for the information of members. Many members have asked about the country. They know nothing at all about it and would like to have something in the nature of a map before them to refer to.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say to my hon. friend that a map is being prepared by the Minister of the Interior, and it is perhaps ready by this time. I shall inquire of the Minister and shall endeavour to comply with the hon. gentleman's request.

THE ADDRESS.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The Order of the Day being called—

Resuming the further adjourned Debate on the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech on the opening of the Third Session of the Eighth Parliament.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON rose to resume the debate.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Make it short.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Unfortunately, hon. gentlemen, if you furnish me with a great wealth of controversy here you cannot expect a very short speech, unless you discuss only one particular individual item of it. When I rise in my place to address the Senate, it is with a view of dealing with all the subjects that are put before us in the speech, and I think that every one of us will acknowledge that there is a new feature put upon a great many of the subjects formally dealt with that requires considerable care and thought and discussion, and all I hope is, should I prolong my remarks longer than your patience will permit, that you will forgive me for it, but I will try not to transgress. The speech that we have to discuss commences by saying :

I have observed with great pleasure the remarkable advance in the political importance and material prosperity of Canada during the year which has just closed.

I think that that is a perfectly legitimate matter for congratulation. There is not the slightest doubt about it, that Canada has increased in material prosperity and political importance. The more our influence is extended beyond the bounds of our own country, the more our political importance will increase. We will never have any political importance as long as we shut ourselves up, as the former government thought and did, and I am sorry to say as the present government appear to think and do, shut ourselves up and make Canada a close preserve for a small coterie of men who gather wealth under the influence of monopoly and protection, a policy which I have for a great number of years strongly opposed. The more you lessen that, the more you extend your operations and remove restrictions on trade at our seaports, the more political influence we are going to exercise and the greater prosperity we will enjoy because the field for occupation for our industrial population is going to be enlarged materially when we apply the ability and energy of the Canadian people to enter the markets of the world and compete there for the extensive trade that awaits these who take part in it. For these reasons I think the remark with which the speech opens gives me an opportunity of making these few comments. At the same time I think that while the government have for a number of years argued upon the same basis that the opening of the doors was the proper way, the very moment that they have an opportunity to pursue that policy something seems to have got hold of them and they are shutting the doors. The second paragraph in the speech is :

The loan recently effected has shown that the credit of Canada has never stood so high in European markets, and affords reasonable ground for expecting that the burthens of the people will, in the near future, be materially reduced by the substitution of a much lower rate of interest on our indebtedness than that which now exists.

I think Canada has kept pace with the rest of Britain's colonies and Great Britain herself in the credit that she has in the markets of the world. That is due very largely to the thrift of our population—to thrift in the management of our finances, no matter which government is in power. It is also very largely due to the continual lessening of the value of money. People now are very thankful indeed to get a good investment at two or two and a-half per cent, where they would have scorned it at four per cent a dozen years ago. So it is not altogether due entirely to causes within ourselves, but it is due to that cause also. I regret very much indeed to see that the public debt is still increasing and that there has been a steady increase to date. Of course, if we get a lower rate of interest every year, the burden of that increase does not bear quite so heavily as would if the rate of interest were not reduced ; still the increase of our debt annually, involves the remitting of that amount of money abroad to meet interest and necessitates the absorption of our exports in order to meet that demand, and under our present system puts the burden of maintaining the revenue upon our industrial classes. The increase of the debt during the past year has been $3,500,000. That increase may probably be due to the loan of $10,000,000 that we had to float, a portion of which went to remove former indebtedness and the other to meet additional burdens that were put on the country for some reason or other. I do not think the Crow's Nest Pass, $3,500,000, will come into the public accounts of that year, because it was only appropriated in May, and we might have an additional debt next year to add to this amount given to the Crow's Nest Pass of $3,500,000, and whatever they may give to the Grand Trunk Railway for the Drummond County Railway. All these things, of course, involve an additional debt and create an additional demand every year for the absorption of a certain portion of the exports of the country. But it is a matter of congratulation that we are able, as a nation, to maintain our credit and pay our debts regularly so that we enjoy the very lowest rates of interest going for public loans of such a nature as we have applied for and obtained. There are, however, evidences to which I will presently refer that our exports in the past year or two, have been absorbed to an alarming extent. Now, hon. gentlemen, the next clause in the address of His Excellency is : at the Jubilee ceremonials, and also upon the warm appreciation manifested everywhere throughout the mother country in reference to the conduct of Canada in materially reducing the rate of duty upon goods imported from the United Kingdom into the Dominion.

I congratulate you upon the exceedingly cordial reception accorded to the representatives of Canada

Hon. gentlemen, that is also a matter of congratulation. As you are all aware I had the honour of being included among those who took part in the military contingent that went across the Atlantic last year, and obtained the leave of the Senate in order to take part in it and leave my duties. A few remarks with regard to my visit there will probably not be out of place, in order to endeavour to show you the honourable part that Canada played in the ceremony both in connection with the visit of the premier of Canada and also the visit of the military contingent that we sent over. I may say this, that the premier, Sir Wilfred Laurier, may be congratulated upon the cordial reception that he met with. It was due to the dignity with which he upheld the character of Canada, to his own personality and to the mode in which he conducted himself and the addresses that he delivered to the people of England while there. He was placed in the highest position in the procession and in the ceremonies which took place—taking his rank next the Queen's Government; he occupied the most prominent position with Lady Laurier in the procession; and wherever he appeared before the public he was cheered, for the sake of Canada, and, as I said before, the dignity with which he conducted himself on every public occasion. The Canadian contingent went across on the steamer 200 strong, including officers and men. The journey across was not a very comfortable one, because the steamer was overloaded, and this caused a certain degree of discomfort. The return passage was not accompanied by anything like the discomfort we had experienced going over, the ship being an excellent one, and accommodation ample. When we arrived, we were met at the station by Lord Methuen, who commands the London district, and Colonel Herbert and Colonel Ward, Sir Donald A. Smith, the High Commissioner, and Mr. Colmer accompanied them. We marched to Chelsea Barracks, where we were located for the next fortnight. Chelsea barracks is in the grounds of the Chelsea Hospital, that noble pile that was designed by Sir Christopher Wren, 200 years ago, and has been the home of Britain's pensioners from that time to the present. We found General Robinson, a Canadian, in charge as deputy governor. The accommodation that was provided for us was exceedingly comfortable and the barracks that were occupied by the Guards were given over to the contingents from all parts of the empire which, together, numbered about 1,000. The officers were furnished with a mess in the gymnasium, and accommodation provided for them by temporary buildings put up in the barrack square. To Lord Roberts was assigned the command of the colonial force on public duty, with Colonel Ivor Herbert as second in command in garrison, and we were under the command of Lord Wolseley in Hyde Park. After we arrived there, our contingent paraded with all the rest of the colonial force and the gathering was one of the most remarkable sights ever seen. All colours and all hues from all parts of the world were there. The negro blacks came from Africa, East Indians and West Indians, Houssas from the Niger, native troops from Cyprus, Ceylon, Borneo, Trinidad, British Guiana, artillery from the Mauritius and Malta, Chinese from Hong Kong; Malay troops from the Strait Settlements, the Australians in strong force, Cape Mounted Rifles from South Africa, Rhodesia under Captain Gifford, Natal, New Zealand, our forces from Canada, etc., and the whole of this large force, numbering about one thousand men, were paraded and assembled together in Chelsea barracks for the purpose of being instructed in the duties we had to perform in the ceremonies, and also in conjunction with the premiers of the self-governing colonies, and heads of the Crown colonies, to show the people of London, the centre of British life, the class of men that were gathered together to illustrate the physical power and political unity of the British Empire. We took our place in the procession, and on the morning of the procession we marched to the Hotel Cecil, where the various premiers resided as the guests of the nation. We formed up there in order to give them the opportunity of falling into their respective ranks at the head of their various colonial contingents, with the Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier as premier of Canada heading the procession. We marched off in that order, and led the procession as far as St. Paul's Cathedral, passing Buckingham Palace at half past eight in the morning, and there the rest of the procession fell in after us, and we led the way to St. Paul's Cathedral, where the great religious ceremony was to be performed, and the Queen was to hold the short service that had been provided as part of the celebration, in which all the religious sects and denominations of the British Empire, and the nation's guests partook on the steps of St. Paul's Cathedral. After halting there a sufficient time for the service, we held our places, and the procession that had marched behind us, with the Queen at its head and the British troops passed us, so that we saw the whole procession in rear of us going by at St. Paul's Cathedral, and we had led the procession as far as St. Paul's Cathedral. We fell in at the rear of the procession and followed Her Majesty round across London Bridge on the Surrey side, re-crossing at Parliament Buildings, and so on back to Buckingham Palace. The multitude we passed through, a million provided with seats in every available niche, and another million on the curbstone, were in the happiest mood, and represented every class from the highest to the humblest. It was one of the most inspiring sights, I think, that has ever been seen, that great noble tribute that was paid to a sovereign upon the completion of the 60th year of her reign, not only for the wisdom and length of that reign, but of the virtues of a good woman who had governed wisely and well through the whole of that period. She was surrounded by the whole of her family, all occupying high positions, all working industriously along with the rest of the population in serving the State in their respective capacities; and if any one has reason to be proud and to think that the blessings of the Almighty rested upon her, it was the Queen upon that day. The whole world was there looking at the magnificent spectacle, 50,000 British troops brought into London to guard the way, and five and twenty thousand policemen supporting them for the same purpose, the pick of the troops in England marching in the procession, headed by the colonial forces drawn from all parts of the world. Every nation in the world sending their representatives to pay their tribute of respect. There never was a greater display of reserved physical power since the world began than was brought together from all parts; not drawn at the expense of the British Government, not forced there under the command of military discipline, but a voluntary contribution of the various outlying portions of the British Empire, that came to lay their voluntary allegiance at the feet of their sovereign, as aiding her to maintain the British constitution in its purity, and the integrity of the British Empire in its world-wide reputation and renown. It was a proud position for Canada to have occupied on that particular occasion. It was well carried out in every particular. Our troops were looked at and admired by everybody. Their physique, their conduct and everything could not be surpassed. They were received with cordiality everywhere. The volunteer corps invited us to various entertainments, the Colonial Institute, the Imperial Institute. Madame Albani gave us a concert in Albert Hall. Sir Henry Irvine had a special entertainment at his theatre. The Maxim Nordenfeld Company provided an inspection of their armouries at the Einsford ranges with a sumptuous entertainment—Lady Brassey at Normanhurst Court. Every officer was entertained most hospitably by General Lord Methuen, and the High Commissioner had a reception on Dominion day and a banquet the night after. Lord Lansdowne, Lord Derby and the Hon. Mr. Chamberlain specially entertained the nations' guests. Every theatre was thrown open to them free; invitations forced upon both officers and men without number, and every courtesy was extended to Canadians and to Australians and to other colonists that could possibly be extended to them on their visit to the motherland. Her Majesty received the contingent at Windsor Castle where the whole force was entertained at luncheon, and the officers, one hundred and fifty-three in number, sat down in St. George's banquetting hall in the castle. The Queen inspected us on a lawn in the rear of the castle and all the officers and two men from each corps were presented to her. She addressed the Indian troops in Hindustani and she showed an active interest in everything, as Lord Roberts accompanied her and presented each corps for review. The Queen's garden party at Buckingham Palace and the presentation of the jubilee medals by His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales were two brilliant sights. The review was shared in by the contingent force at Aldershot, when the review was held for Her Majesty's inspection, and the naval review at Portsmouth was one of the grandest sights ever witnessed. The contingent forces were well looked after by the mayor and citizens of Portsmouth, and the government provided accommodation to give the whole force the best opportunity to witness the review and inspection by the Prince of Wales. The illuminations on this occasion and on the evening of the procession were remarkably fine. Wheeled traffic was entirely suspended at night in London, and the stream of people thronged the route of the procession to overflowing and millions enjoyed the sights with the utmost freedom and in the utmost good humour. The events of the fortnight were ample evidence that the government of the vast population in the city of London was developed upon the highest principles of self government that had yet been reached in any nation. That was a great occasion, hon. gentlemen, that was a great year. Now, what is going to follow it? Is it going to be a ceremony and nothing more? Is it going to stir up the hearts of the people in the various parts of the British Empire, to do something more than they have been doing, to accomplish something more than they have accomplished towards the unification of the British Empire, towards helping to strengthen in a material way the forces that are at work by the British Government, which is doing the noblest work that any government has ever yet laid itself out to do, to bring under subjection the forces of the world towards peace, to open the ports of the world to free trade, to give all nations an opportunity to reap together on a common ground, on common soil, in unity and peace and commercial rivalry? That is the battle that England is fighting to-day. You have only to read the papers from day to day to see the noble stand she is taking in China at the present moment. What for? To aggrandize herself there and seize a portion of the territory? No; it is simply to announce to the world that her determination is that no nation should seize a portion of China or Africa or anywhere else and lock it up from the rest of the world, as long as she has the power to withstand the effort.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I say that that is one of the noblest things a nation had ever set itself out to do. They are not taking a portion of the world and saying that nobody else should deal there but themselves. They are taking the foremost part in trying to bring heathen nations under the influence of civilizrtion. Wherever England has put her hand on a piece of foreign territory it is as free to Germans, Chinese, Frenchman, Canadians or anybody else who chooses to go and trade there as to the people of the United Kingdom, and she gives them good government under the British constitution. She gives them ample protection under the power she possesses in her army and navy with all the forces of justice that prevail wherever Britain's government holds sway. Are we going to be chided by Sir Michael Hicks-Beach when he says we are doing nothing for the maintenance of the protection of the British Empire? He says we are doing this in the name of Canadians, South Africans, Australians and the people of every portion of the British Empire, and are you going to offer no material assistance in the shape of money or men or anything else? The burden is being felt, the pressure of foreign nations is great. Sir Michael Hicks Beach is right in drawing our attention to the great responsibilities they entail. I say that the answer of Canada should be "to the utmost of our power will we stand at your back and assist and support Great Britain with our material resources to the best of our ability." I can say, in answer to what Sir Michael Hicks-Beach sent over the cable the other day, that we are as yet a poor country, notwithstanding the prosperity set forth in the speech before us. We are still a poor country, so far as national revenue is concerned and national prosperity, that must to a very large extent be shown by the redundancy of the revenue which the nation is able to contribute to its support. The revenue we enjoy has been to a certain extent stagnant for the last ten years. There is no redundancy to it. Notwithstanding our large territory and the increasing exports, the result of more labour, it has been amply shown that we have reached the limit of the power of raising revenue by the Canadian people under the principle of protection, that there is no force that we can bring to bear except to impose direct taxation, such as we did the other day in reimposing a duty on raw sugar, or increasing the excise on spirit, or some direct taxation of that kind. There is no possible means under the principles of our commercial policy by which we can extract from the people of Canada a larger revenue than we are doing, because monopoly divides the taxation with the government. I say, hon. gentlemen, that the people of Canada can contribute a larger revenue a great deal than they are doing to-day, but it is impossible to increase that revenue beyond the twenty million dollars that we are contributing to-day under the customs taxation which, as I said before, is stagnant and has been stagnant for a great number of years and is only stimulated by borrowing. It is possible for the people of Canada to pay a great deal more revenue than that if it was only levied in the proper way, if it was only levied in the same way Great Britain levies her taxes. She releases the necessities of labour and taxes profits. Hers is the most redundant revenue in the world. The Government of Great Britain has spent enormously on its navy without imposing one additional penny of taxation upon the people. She has maintained her position, she has increased her trade, she has perpetually and constantly increased her revenue year after year. Every year it is greater than it was before. This last year her trade has increased and is the largest ever known in the history of the country. This year her revenue has got a surplus of eight or ten million dollars, the largest ever known in the history of the country. That is due to the method in which she exacts the revenue for governmental purposes, while we divide the revenue which should go for the support of the country, with the monopolists and protected classes that enjoy a very large portion of the means that should be at the disposal of the government. The people have to contribute the taxation and these people take half of it. Now when we are prepared to see things in a different light, which I think before long there is no doubt the people of Canada will come to see, that the business of the government is a different business from the business of an individual, and that the government has got to take care of its revenues, that it has not to manage for the customers who come here for legislation, but it has to manage its affairs for the stock holders, who are the people of Canada ; and when they come to carry out their business upon that basis and upon these relations, then hon. gentlemen will see that the revenue of Canada, instead of being stagnant and remaining as it is to-day, will show a redundancy that is the outcome of prosperity. It is in order to reply to the leader, the great financier, Chancellor of the Exchequer in England that it is not the spirit of Canada that prevents her from giving material resources to strengthen Great Britain, to stand at her back in the fight that she is making with the rest of the world, but it is the weakness of the revenue that prevents us showing that in any appreciable or material manner. To be sure the government did try to show a disposition, and they did show a spirit by reducing the tariff in favour of Great Britain to the extent of 25 per cent, which comes into force on the 1st July next. That is only a concession of trade and not a source of revenue. The carrying out of that is simply the carrying out of the idea of the hon. Minister of Marine when he made a motion in the House of Commons some years ago that the taxation levied against Great Britain was large compared with that of the United States, and this reduction is no reduction so far as protection is concerned ; it is merely an attempt to equalize the protective duties that are still imposed and make them even with those of the United States, which it was always contended were of an unequal character, so that it is not regarded in Great Britain as a very great concession, it is not regarded as of any particular material value, as business men in England assembled together said they would prefer a great deal to see an insolvency act passed to protect the commercial interests of the merchants who have customers in Canada than have this 25 per cent reduction in the tariff. That is only an evidence of the manner in which they look upon it, but so far as the spirit that has been shown by the people of Canada in making that reduction, it is accepted as an evidence of good spirit and a hope that something better will follow, and I was really in hopes that something better would follow as announced in the Speech from the Throne. Well, hon. gentlemen, as the speech says here it was due :

> To the conduct of Canada in materially reducing the rate of duty upon goods imported from the United Kingdom into the Dominion.

As I say, that is an evidence of good will, and it is an evidence of good spirit ; but beyond that it has not shown itself to be of any material value so far as increasing the power of the people of Great Britain to export their goods to Canada is concerned. It led to the action of the Imperial government in denouncing the treaties with Belgium and Germany which has been a matter of controversy for a great number of years and which has been solicited by successive governments. The question has been up very often on the floor of this chamber and hon. gentlemen are thoroughly acquainted with it. The denunciation of the treaties was requested for the purpose of enabling the colonies of Great Britain to admit British goods into Canada or Australia on better terms than the rest of the world were permitted to send them. That was the object of getting the treaties denounced. Recollect that it did not require the denouncing of the treaties to allow England to put on a preferential tariff in England; that was open to England to do at any time whether the treaties were in force or not, but it required the denouncing of the treaties in order to permit Canada to reduce her tariff or to have free trade with Great Britain, while still maintaining the duties against the rest of the world. That was the object of the denunciation of the treaties, that was why we applied that the treaties might be denounced. It was applied for by the conservative government. As you all recollect, Sir John Abbott prepared an address and sent it forward when he was premier, and it has been a matter of correspondence with the British government for many years. There was a meeting of the colonial premiers last year at the Jubilee ceremonies and they met together with Mr. Chamberlain, the Colonial Secretary, to discuss this very point, in order to place before the Imperial government the necessity that arose on the part of Canada, Australia and other outlying portions of the British Empire, for the British government to denounce those treaties which they evidently regarded as a very great safeguard to their commercial affairs. These favoured nation treaties have been negotiated by England as far back as the year 1820 or 1830. They have been arranged with nearly every nation of the earth, and Great Britain attaches very great importance to these commercial treaties. Their importance has been brought out more forcibly than ever before by recent affairs in China. Great Britain has with China a treaty containing the most favoured nation treaty by which she is admitted, and Canada with all the British Empire is admitted, to trade freely in Chinese ports upon the same terms as may be accorded to any foreign nation, and it is upon that right that England is to-day standing in order to maintain any ports that are acquired by any foreign power open to British and Canadian trade, a policy that is now being acquiesced in by Germany and Russia. That only shows the importance that Great Britain attaches to these commercial treaties. Now, the premiers met there, and this position was put before the Colonial Secretary, and it was the climax of the negotiations that had been continually going on, mostly, I believe, from Canada herself. Great Britain agreed to the desire of the Canadian government, and denounced those treaties. What for? So that Canada might reduce her tariff and establish, as I thought, as I supposed, and I have advocated for a number of years, free trade with Great Britain, while still keeping up her tariff against the people of the United States as long as their hostility to our commercial interests remains. Canada went over there with a guerdon held out to the people of Great Britain—with a reduction of 25 per cent upon her tariff. This was a kind of tempting bait to say, "Now you denounce those treaties, you put that in force and then you will see what we will do in order to bring about that commercial unity which you think is so important to the prosperity of Canada." And Great Britain did it. I say, hon. gentlemen, that the Canadian people are bound in honour to carry out the idea that was conveyed by the premier of Canada, when at that Jubilee celebration upon every platform, he announced that that was the policy he advocated, and that was the policy he expected to carry out, and it was to enable him to carry out that policy that he asked the government of Great Britain to denounce those treaties which were of such value to the people of Great Britain. And I say, hon. gentlemen, that we cannot have any better evidence of that than a short extract I took from a speech made by Lord Rosebery a month or two ago in which he discussed the question of free trade, and apparently taking the stand of the Liberal party in Britain firmly upon that policy in order that Canada and other countries and the people of Great Britain might know exactly the stand they took. He says:

But I have an illustrious authority, perhaps the most illustrious outside these islands, inside the empire, who sustains my views as to the preserving effects of free trade on our empire. Sir Wilfrid Laurier says: "There are parties who hope to maintain the British Empire upon lines of restricted trade. If the British Empire is to be maintained, it can only be upon the most absolute freedom, political and commercial. In building up this great empire, to deviate from the principle of freedom will be to so much weaken the ties and bonds which hold it together." That is the view I hold, and, I believe, you hold in this hall. (Cheers.) It only requires the force of law to give effect to Sir Wilfrid's policy, and he is in the position of power to carry it out.

That is the interpretation put by Lord Rosebery, leader of the Liberal party in England, on Sir Wilfrid Laurier's remarks. The people of Great Britain have taken exactly the same ground. Some of the leaders of the Conservative party in this country, and I believe the Conservatives generally, still cling to what they call preferential trade—that we will lower our duties to Great Britain if Great Britain will give us a preference over the United States and other countries of the world. I was in the House of Commons last night and heard Sir Charles Tupper refer to the Governor General and the remarks made by His Excellency lately in the city of Toronto. The moment I read those remarks I regarded them as an intimation from the British Government—the Conservative party in England conveying through the Governor General to the Conservative party in Canada that the carrying out of that policy was an impossible one—that the imports of the people of Great Britain were confined almost entirely to raw materials and to food and upon the cheapening of both of these important articles, which are imported to the extent of about $1,000,000,000 per year they relied for their prosperity—that it would be ruin to the trade of England and ruin to the industrial population of Great Britain if they put any tax, however small, upon that enormous import of articles which are so essential to the weltare and prosperity of the people of Great Britain. Any one can see in a moment that the strength of Britain's policy is free trade. There is no nation in the world which can show such remarkable prosperity, such a redundant revenue and such freedom from debt. Germany, France and Russia have increased their debt; the United States have increased their debt; Canada has increased her debt. The only nation that has not increased her debt is the British nation. They have been reducing it year after year at the rate of forty or fifty millions of dollars every year. If that condition is arrived at through the policy of free trade that she is to-day following, how would she prosper under the opposite condition by taxing the food and the raw materials that are imported there to be worked over for export to the markets of the world by her industrial population? Instead of condemning the Governor General for the stand that he took—and I have no authority for supposing any more than my own intelligence—we should carefully weigh his words. That the Governor General would attempt for a moment to interfere in the battle of the two parties in Canada,—

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—It looks like it.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No; but he is the representative of the British Government in Canada, and if the British Government have thought it desirable to convey to the people of Canada the stand they are obliged to take upon the policy that is being developed in any portion of the British Empire which requires their sanction to the adoption of such a clause, they are quite justified in giving timely warning and timely notice to the people of Canada that it would be ruin to their own policy if they attempted to carry out such an arrangement. If I am correct in my idea, that the Governor General was acting as the mouthpiece between the government of Great Britain or maybe Her Majesty herself and the people of Canada in so far as that is concerned, I have no fault to find with him or with the British Government asking him to make that reference.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—We have responsible government.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Certainly we have responsible government, but while the Governor General is guided by the constitutional advice given by his advisers here in Canada, he has a certain responsibility also to the British Government who have sent him here, as the connecting link in the British constitution which binds an empire together and I say in exercising his responsibility in that respect, he was perfectly right and perfectly justified. It was not a question of domestic politics in Canada, but a question that involves the taxation of the imports of Great Britain. It was not an interference with our domestic policy at all, but dealing with a proposition to impose taxation upon the people of England in order to carry out a policy that was being advocated here.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—That is a distinction without a difference.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The British government wished to convey—I am assuming this entirely—to the people of Canada that under the present condition of public opinion what they were asking was an utter impossibility to be carried out on the part of the people of Great Britain in consequence of that peculiar condition of affairs that exists in the mother country—that they import some $600,000,000 worth of food and some $1,000,000,000 worth of food and raw material, and that the taxation of that would be ruin to their country. I hear the hon. gentleman from Halifax saying hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I quite agree with the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It is always "hear, hear." The hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Mackenzie Bowell) read an article from the Australian Star yesterday, in which the writer, referring to the policy of the Canadian government, said, "the voice is the voice of Jacob, but the hands are the hands of Esau." Hon. Mr. Reed, the premier of New South Wales, has adopted a free trade policy—the very policy of Great Britain. He is an Australian, and when he comes to criticise Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who received ovations beyond him and who concedes to Great Britain only a twenty-five per cent preference with an average taxation of thirty-two per cent, he is perfectly justified in saying "the voice is the voice of Jacob, but the hands are the hands of Esau." My hon. friend always said, "hear, hear," when I was arguing this during the years he was in opposition ; I want to show him that the policy of the government he still supports deserves the remark quoted from the Australian Star. I do not condemn Sir Wilfrid Laurier who I believe is conscientious, but I do condemn the Liberal party for not enabling their Leader to make good the pledges he gave when seeking the denunciation of the German and Belgian treaties. I have endeavoured to show that the government of Canada, not the Liberal party, not Sir Wilfred Laurier, but the government of Canada, whichever party is in power is in honour bound to adopt a policy of free trade with Great Britain, to the exclusion of the rest of the world if you like ; we are bound to trade with Great Britain on the same terms that Great Britain concedes to us, not only because the denunciation of those treaties was obtained on the ground that that was to be our policy, but also in our own interest. I say we are getting the worst of the trade when we refuse to receive back cargoes the products of British labour, in return for products of Canadian labour. If you want Canadian labour to get the full value out of the labour that produces those exports that go across the Atlantic, we should admit return cargoes free, and then those who labour and produce those exports will receive the full benefit of their labour under that policy.

The next paragraph in the speech is as follows :

> The extraordinary gold discoveries recently made upon the Yukon and its tributaries, appear likely to result in an enormous influx of people into that region, and have compelled the government to take prompt action for the preservation of law and order in that distant and almost inaccessible locality ; measures will be laid before you for that purpose.
> A contract has been entered into, subject to your approval, for the completion at the earliest possible moment of a system of rail and river communication through Canadian territory with the Klondike and principal gold fields, which it is expected will secure to Canada the larger portion of the lucrative traffic of that country.

Those two clauses go together. The Mounted Police are an efficient arm of the law, and its administration in their hands has always been characterized by justice and firmness and we are fortunate in having such an efficiently organized force at our disposal at the present juncture. Mr. Ogilvie has upheld the character of Canadian officials and has inspired confidence in the manner in which he has performed a difficult task among the miners and meting out among them the mining laws. The contract referred to in the foregoing paragraph has excited more interest through the length and breadth of Canada than anything we have had yet to excite the people. I cannot condemn too strongly the policy that the government have been led into in making such a contract as to give away in that Yukon territory four million acres of gold bearing lands to a company for the construction of 150 miles of a narrow gauge railway. I do not think that, of all the transactions that we have denounced as corrupt and indefensible when the Conservative government were in power, any begins to come up to the contract that is to be submitted to this parliament to-day. I feel perfectly convinced that we are taking a leap in the dark—that we are trading unsight unseen—both the railway and the mining lands. We know nothing of their value except from the report of Mr. Ogilvie, and the reports that come to us from people who have been mining there. What we do know is that it is an exceedingly rich country; that it is a country which has been unexplored; that it has been untouched yet by the hand of man, except in the last year or two; that it contains marvellous deposits of gold which for ages have been worn off the rocks by glacial action, frost and snow and have sunk to the bottom of its rivers and have lain there a rich deposit the extent of which is beyond our knowledge. We all know that the same excitement took place in the Cariboo district a great number of years ago—some thirty years ago—where in Williams Creek $19,000,000 worth of gold was taken out in placer mining. That was just one creek that yielded that. The inaccessibility of the country, the difficulty of getting supplies, the cost of everything has evidently retarded the development of mining property in British Columbia from that day to this. We are all aware that where there is $19,000,000 of placer gold worn off the rock and deposited in the streams of the Rocky Mountains, there must be a mother lode and quartz ledges which are capable of great development. Quartz mining can only be done by machinery, combination and the expenditure of a very large amount of capital. Placer mining, of course, can be resorted to by individuals and there are no very great difficulties to encounter.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Quartz mining on an average takes 90 per cent to pay the cost of mining.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I quite agree with the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is only 10 per cent profit.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Ten per cent is a very good profit.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—One per cent of that would be royalty.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—When you speak of 90 per cent, it all depends on the richness of the ore, the expenditure for machinery and the value of the labour that is expended upon it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And the cost of getting machinery there.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The cost of placing the plant there, the labour upon it and the value of the quartz. Where those conditions vary the percentage may be larger than 90.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The hon. Minister of Justice speaks of the average cost I suppose?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I suppose he is speaking of the present conditions.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes; under very much more favourable conditions if you consider the location of the country.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I am not prepared to say what the percentage is. I can only say if 90 per cent is expended in extracting the gold, it is expended in the country and that the profit only goes out. The larger the expenditure in the country, the better it is. It is no argument against quartz mining.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see my statement was this. He says this company is over compensated. I am pointing out to him that 91 per cent, under ordinary circumstances, of what they receive is not theirs. It belongs to the public.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—All I can say is if Mann & Mackenzie are going on the chance of making ten per cent on their speculation, they are not the men I take them for. Of course, we all know what South Africa, California and Australia have yielded. They yield largely both in quartz mining and placer mining, and the profits which have been derived from them have been enormous. There is $53,000,000 a year in gold mined in the United States, $43,000,000 in Australia and about the same quantity in South Africa per annum. These are the three chief countries in which gold is obtained. There is a small quantity from Russia and a small quantity from other countries. I have no doubt that that gold is obtained in those large quantities in those three countries owing to the great enterprise of the population that takes it out, the facilities which are afforded by the combining of capital and all those adjuncts to trade and commerce. West Kootenay is coming to the front with an output during the year of nine million dollars. There is mineral activity in various parts of Canada and now we are adding the Klondike or Yukon country to our mineral wealth. It may not be as rich as we believe it is, but we have no right to assume that it is worth nothing. In making the contract we have no right to assume that the contractor is making a bad bargain. We have no right to assume that it is the proper thing for the government to give away the whole of the auriferous belt of that mining country. I think the statement has been made by Mr. Ogilvie that the auriferous belt extends 100 miles by 50, and 100 miles by 50 is exactly 3,500,000 acres. The government proposes to give 3,750,000 acres to Mann & Mackenzie to build 150 miles of railway. If the government is bound by this contract, to give them 3,750,000 acres of mining lands with the right of selection, although they have retained the right of holding the alternate blocks, the question comes in where is the government going to find 4,000,000 acres for themselves and 4,000,000 for Mackenzie & Mann?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman is mistaken in the estimate made by Mr. Ogilvie. My recollection is it was 300 by 100 miles.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That would bring it a little nearer the position of distributing it equally between the government and Mackenzie & Mann. However, those estimates are purely in the dark. Mr. Ogilvie is not in a position to give an exact statement of what is available to the government.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The contractors can make no location until after the railway is built.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No, but if the road is built by the first of September the lands will be available for location. The contract binds them to build it by the first of September, and when they complete the road they are entitled to something like four million acres of land. That is the condition.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They are entitled to it on the completion of each section of ten miles.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Only a small portion —not a proportionate amount to the amount of the line they have built.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They are entitled to it as they construct the line. I did not mean they should receive the four million acres of land at once.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They only receive a small portion of it.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes. They receive a large portion of the 25,000 acres per mile for each ten mile section as completed and the only forfeiture for non-compliance with the terms of the contract is the $250,000. That is to say, supposing they were to build 130 miles of road by the 1st September next they will be entitled to the bulk of the grant and they would have the bulk of the land transferred to them, but they would lose the $250,000. They are going to get so much for every ten miles, even if they do not go another yard. Now, the idea of placing in the hands of two men the entire control of four million acres of land is beyond our conception. There seem to be no restrictions of any kind excepting any laws that we may pass afterwards, but if Mackenzie & Mann were open to sell to United States citizens, then they might purchase another Alaska. Alaska would not only be owned by the United States, but all of the north-western peninsula would be owned by them as well. Are we going to place ourselves in such a position, after having lost Alaska and that strip of coast going down there, for want of as much foresight and judgment as our neighbours have shown? Are we going, for some extraordinary reason, to rush into a transaction that involves the cession of four million acres of land, handing it over to United States citizens, because under the laws it can be sold out to them, and we virtually have lost our influence and control of that portion of the territory. I cannot support any such contract for that reason, apart from the opposition that I have always shown to the cession of land ever since the grant to the Canadian Pacific Railway. I supported the Canadian Pacific Railway, but I have consistently, for a number of years, opposed as strenuously as I could parting with any more real estate in that way. There is a more thrifty way of developing our necessary transportation, and that is to guarantee the first bonds taking them as security for repayment. I think that our lands or our mines should be nursed for the benefit of the country, for the benefit of the people who come after us, and the revenue which can still be obtained from it, and not given away recklessly and blindly, in the way we have been doing, as was condemned in the case of British Columbia, when they gave the enormous grant last year, when they gave the grant to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and it was also given to Mackenzie & Mann in the case of the Lake Dauphin Railway. It did not cost $8,000 a mile to build the line, and the Manitoba government guaranteed the bonds to the extent of $8,000 a mile, and they had the land grant of 6,400 acres a mile, and a cash subsidy of $2,000 a mile. Now if that is indefensible, and if 6,400 acres per mile is considered too large a land grant, with a guarantee from the provincial government that gave them the cash to build the road with, leaving them the land grant and the subsidy of the Dominion government free to do as they liked with, unrestricted, untouched, no bonds on it, all their own—they have the title deeds of it, hon. gentlemen; they built the road for the $8,000 the government gave them, they have the right to issue bonds upon it, and it is paying all the fixed charges to-day and has been from the first day it started. That is well known in Manitoba. Those are the concessions and privileges we are giving to contractors, and they become millionaires by the cession of public lands and property in that reckless way. If it was reckless to give them 6,400 acres a mile on that occasion, is it not ten times more reckless to give them for each mile of this road 25,000 acres of our gold bearing lands? Because, you must recollect, that with gold bearing lands the value is sometimes enormous.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friends will see that if these blocks extended half a mile back from the river the quantity of land would be reduced to one-twelfth of what it is, and so far as the placer gold is concerned, the quantity granted will be exactly the same.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Those are items to be considered. I know perfectly well that every acre of that 4,000,000 acres is not equally productive, and that there is a very large portion of it will probably be valueless. I am quite prepared to acknowledge that. And so with regard to our placer mines, we know that it is in the deep pools that the gold drops down. Where it is rapid there is no gold; it will not settle there, but where it gets deep it sinks to the bottom. So that really it is concentrated in pockets. But if it is all concentrated you may be sure Mackenzie & Mann will get hold of the concentrated parts, and that the government is not likely to obtain possession of a concentrated part. However, that is apart from the position that I take. In the laying out of our lands in the North-west Territories we have even-numbered sections. The even-numbered sections were for open entry by the people at large, for the purpose of encouraging population to come there and get the land. We reserved the odd-numbered sections to preserve the development of the country; and to serve as a future resource for the development of that country. Well, now, we have recklessly given away some forty million acres of our land, and to that extent we have parted with it. But I wish to point out that it is advisable that we should not continue this course, and I can only repeat what I was taught by the Liberal party for 20 years in their speeches. In the mining country we should endeavour to reserve a certain portion for those who mine, for the individuals who go in there: that portion is for the public to assist in developing the country. We should endeavour to utilize the other half in some way that it will recoup the Treasury by a revenue from its resources for governing the country. The government apparently have made no effort to ascertain whether it would be possible to formulate such a scheme as would develop that half reserved from the public by the mining regulations in order to develop a revenue. We certainly are not going to develop a revenue from Mackenzie & Mann under the present contract and the resources of the country we are going to part with. I suggest to the government that a company could be formed to mine the alternate sections in conjunction with the government. that is to say, that to-morrow if the government were to say we will form a company and give them the right to mine those alternate lands in conjunction with the government, for the benefit of the government, with a representative of the government on its board to ascertain what it is doing, with the inland revenue officer watching over its operations—a company, I say, can be formed with a capital of $20,000,000 to give one half of the profits of its operations to the government as a revenue. If you go to England with a proposition and say: here, is a concession obtained from the government to mine for the benefit of the government, and to give one-half of the profits that are derived from the operations of this company, you can, to morrow, form a a company among the investing public to the extent of 25 million dollars to carry out the scheme. While they are dividing the profits with the government, investors realize that there is no speculation behind it, and they know the government is represented upon it and they have a joint interest with a company of that kind with these terms, that the company is going to get as fair play as the government themselves, and, therefore, if the investment would not appear so remunerative, at any rate it would present itself to them as the safest, and, therefore, I say that it is practicable. It is impossible for the government to mine on their own account. That would not be profitable. It would not be wise to place the mines for sale in the same way as we put our lands up in the province of Manitoba during the boom there, because there would immediately be a combination of buyers, as there was on that occasion when the land produced only $2.55 an acre, 5 cents over the government price. So it would be in this case if the lands were up for sale. But such a scheme as I have formulated and suggested to the government myself, from my knowledge of affairs, would be quite practicable and might return a revenue of one million or a million and a half per year, when in full operation, always assuming that the mining claims would be held as our odd and even-numbered agricultural lands, the even numbers for free occupation by the public, the odd for the revenues of the government. With the present proposition there is nothing to prevent Mackenzie & Mann opening an office at the head of their railway and handing out mining licenses on a ten per cent royalty and pocketing nine per cent without investing a dollar.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does the hon. gentleman suppose he could attract a population to that country, going into it to work as labourers, in the same way as a man at liberty to take his own mining lot and mine for himself?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I say if you put in the proper machinery and capital, put up comfortable houses, and furnish the proper means for supplying a population, that there would not be the slightest difficulty in attracting 200,000 or 300,000; and if the population is going to be attracted there at all Mr. Mackenzie and Mr. Mann will have to do the same thing except that Mr. Mann and Mr. Mackenzie only give 1 per cent, while I propose that this company should give 50 per cent.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But the hon. gentleman will see that that is not quite a fair statement, because while he says the government will get 50 per cent, that is out of the net profits; the other includes the gross earnings.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—In reference to what the Minister of Justice suggests, I may say in laying my views before the government, I suggested that the government should have 40 per cent of the gross profits or 50 per cent of the net profits. I put the two ideas before them. However, they were only crude ideas, and only formulated with the idea of offering a friendly suggestion as to the best mode of dealing with that. In order to make my views more forcible, and to bring them before parliament in some form, I myself put into the Gazette in December last an application for the formation of such a company as I speak of, which may or may not come before parliament for enactment.

It was in order that I might put the views I hold more forcibly before the govgovernment. If this contract goes through, of course, that puts an end to any further ideas in regard to the disposition of those lands; but I wish to say that it is exceedingly ill-judged in my opinion to, at the present moment, alienate any portion of those lands in the imperfect knowledge that we possess of them, because any knowledge that we do pos-ess is of a very crude nature and exceedingly favourable to the country. But there is another feature I wish to point out, and that is, that one great argument that is used in regard to this route, that it is an all-Canadian route.

Now, that is the greatest misnomer to apply to this road that it is possible to apply. It is not an all-Canadian route; we have to go through United States territory in order to utilize it. The hon. Minister of Justice himself told us yesterday that that route was open for commercial purposes only, and that for military purposes it was not open. We have our mounted police in there at the present moment, and if it is not open for military purposes, the mounted police can be ordered to remain there, and any one who wishes to get entrance there can be told to remain outside, and the only way the government can reciprocate is to allow the United States troops to go through Canadian soil, that is, give a quid pro quo. Then how can it be called a Canadian route? It is no Canadian route at all.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Is the hon. gentleman opposed to the construction of this road?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—In the first place I object to the valuable assets in the Northwest Territories upon which we depend to assist us to obtain direct access to the mining regions of the Rocky Mountains being used to build a railway in British Columbia, which holds its own public lands and mines. I am not opposed to the construction of the road itself, as far as the mere value of paying for the road itself is concerned; if I had anything to do with it I would get the government to guarantee the bonds to the extent of ten or fifteen thousand dollars a mile, take a first charge on the route, and then the government will be recouped for the guarantee very quickly after the road has been built, and it will not cost the country a solitary penny. I would not allow anything like a narrow gauge road to be built. These narrow gauge roads, wherever they have been built, have had to be abandoned. The rails weigh only thirty pounds to the yard, and the cost of building such a road is nothing at all, with iron manufactured in the United States now, as low as $16 a ton. The narrow gauge road is an exceedingly light rail, and the cost of building that is nothing. If the government would guarantee the bonds to the extent of $8,000 a mile the road would be built and contractors would be very thankful indeed to make their modicum of profit by taking it for that sum. I know something of that. The Crow's Nest Pass Railway has been built with a bonus; I believe if we had the contract of the Canadian Pacific Railway before us we would find that the Canadian Pacific Railway has got from the government every penny that it has cost to build that railway. Iron is so very cheap and labour is so low and machinery has become perfected that they have machinery not only for grading earth but they can actually dredge rock. They have reduced by powerful machinery the cost of building these roads to a very small thing indeed, and I see that the people of the United States have increased their manufacture of iron to the extent of 15,000,000 tons per annum and that rails have been manufactured as low as $15 and $16 a ton. So you can see what a very small amount of value the contractors are to put into the road in comparison with the enormous subsidies given to them. Now, hon. gentlemen, we have to look behind in order to see some reason for this extraordinary position. We know perfectly well, as Mr. Osler, a director of the Canadian Pacific Railway will tell you any day, that the business of the Canadian Pacific Railway is to try and carry the freight into that Yukon region over their road as far as their road goes. That is perfectly legitimate for the Canadian Pacific Railway to do. Then we know a transportation company has been formed to connect the Canadian Pacific Railway at Vancouver with the Stikine route. Now we know there is a desire on the part of the friends of that road to throw the traffic upon that route instead of going in by Dyea. That gives a monopoly to the Canadian Pacific Railway to Vancouver a practical monopoly of the Stikine navigation, and a monoply of the railway.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In going by the Stikine we have a treaty right in that way, but the other way we have not.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We have no customs to pay going in by the Stikine.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Well, we have to tranship on the Stikine route, and the United States government, if they choose, can hamper our hands on the transaction.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They can do more than that, they can prevent the transhipment.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is not the interpretation put on it by Customs Department at Ottawa, I understand.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not know what the interpretation of the custom officials at Ottawa is, but it is a question that has come under the notice of all governments for a great many years past, and we all know that the United States government has enforced to the fullest extent all the provisions of the customs and navigation laws, and they prevent the transhipment of goods at any United States port that have come from a Canadian port.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Are not goods that arrive in New York, transferred in bond through Canada?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Can not goods arriving at Wrangel be transhipped in the same manner?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Those are not the terms of the coasting laws. The hon. gentleman ought to know that the transmission of goods from Europe through the United States is provided for under treaty and the bonding laws, particularly the Washington treaty. We are now speaking of the coasting laws and the effect which they have on the trade of the country, not the bonding system. It is possible that upon a vessel arriving at Wrangel with British goods, they might be entered in bond and then sent out of the United States by making an ex-warehouse entry, but the expense and annoyance attending this course is great.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We have the same right on the Stikine that they have. We have the right to navigate the Yukon. We have the right to tranship at Wrangel.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is a question you have not shown.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have seen the regulations, which are very clear, that boats arriving at St. Michael's can transfer their cargoes to smaller boats to go up the river, but they cannot coast at those ports of the Yukon that border Alaska; they must go through to a British port, to Dawson or Fort Cudahy.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman may have seen regulations of that kind. I must confess in my long experience of the customs I have not, nor has there been any concession of that kind made. The coasting laws make this provision: a United States vessel can leave its own port and touch at a Canadian port, but it cannot take in any goods at the Canadian port, nor passengers and discharge again at another Canadian port; but it can go from a United States port to a Canadian port and thence to a United States port, otherwise it has no right to touch. Now, if I understand the position in Wrangel it is this, that it is required, if a British vessel goes there, she must tranship the goods from the vessel in which they were brought to that port to a vessel which can carry them to another port.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Up the river.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, up the river. A question was asked in the Commons of the Minister of Railways whether the Department of Justice had been consulted upon that point, and whether the opinion of the Justice Department was that it had that power and right, under the coasting laws. The Minister of Railways said the department had not been consulted and he did not know what the law was. Probably the hon. Minister of Justice can tell us what the law is upon that point, which they failed to get in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman will see that that largely depends upon the construction that is put upon the Washington Treaty with reference to the navigation of those waters, and that the interests of the two governments in a large measure correspond in that regard, and as a matter of fact the United States government recognizing our right, for commercial purposes, to navigate the Yukon River, have also, in connection with that, recognized the right of transhipment at St. Michael's; so I do not apprehend there will be any difficulty.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the United States government has recognized that?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Because the United States have the same right under the Washington Treaty to navigate the River St. Lawrence as Canada, but they have no further right than that of navigating; they have no right, under the customs laws, to any of the privileges which are enjoyed by our own people, either of transhipment or otherwise.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They have also gone further than that. They have recognized our right to obtain wood along the river, without which the right of navigation would not be of any value.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is a right they enjoy in the St. Lawrence. If they wish to stop at Kingston to receive fuel they can do that, but it must be consumed on the vessel or taken to the United States, they cannot land it at a Canadian port.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—British steamers touching at different places along the Yukon would be subject to enormous duties.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, yes, that is true. That would be an interference with the coasting laws of the United States. A British steamer leaving St. Michael's could not take on or put off passengers in Alaska. She would have to go to Fort Cudahy or Dawson. So long as she does that, she is quite within the terms of the treaty and the regulations of the coasting trade.

Hon. Mr. SANFORD—This treaty says "for commercial purposes;" do I understand that the Canadian government are at liberty to send the mounted police up the river?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Up to the present they have not objected.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The interruptions have brought out some very interesting facts. Where we can have reciprocity with the United States I am with you all the time. If the United States grant certain favours to us in a certain direction we are quite prepared to reciprocate, and the better understanding that we have between us, the better it is going to be for both countries and all concerned. But we have to deal with facts as they are, and when it is claimed that this is to be an all-Canadian route, it is a misnomer. It is not an all-Canadian route. In a month's time, unless we choose to accede to the demands of the United States, our mounted police may be shut out from going there. But after having spent $300,000 this winter in order to build a route through Dyea and open a way for the United States militia to go in, we may be excluded from going in.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We have not spent any money at Dyea.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The expense that has been incurred in taking in provisions and opening up that route is not going to cost one penny less than $300,000.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But the hon. gentleman is mistaken in supposing that that sum has been spent at Dyea.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In transportation, not in any permanent work.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I am quite aware that this is in transport, the sending Major Walsh, the commissioner, and his party and all the expenses that are attached to it. We read in the paper that Major Walsh bought provisions at $2 a pound: that is $4,000 a ton for the provisions all round, whether it was tea, sugar, pork, salt or anything else. Now you cannot, without incurring great expense, pay such prices as that. We know that the cost of transportation has been something enormous; even on the route by way of St. Michael's the charges are ten cents a pound, but by the Chilkoot Pass and these other passes the expenditure has been enormous.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But my hon. friend will see that there has been no expenditure upon the passes. The provisions that are bought, and the amount that is spent for provisions and for supplies that are consumed on the way, are not expenditures upon these passes.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Certainly not. I am quite agreeable to that position, but what I want to impress upon the government is this, that they sent Major Walsh in with a full outfit of government stock, and that he is now still halted at the Salmon River, and he is as far away from the seat of government as if he were in Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What does that show? That the difficulties of getting into that country are very great, and that even with the government behind the expedition, it is almost impossible to get in. There was no other way for him to go.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He is not there yet.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That is exactly what I want to come at, that some $300,000 had been expended in conveying Major Walsh as far as he had got, without any public improvements of any kind or description. There have been stopping places and other things, but the whole cost has gone in transportation, $300 a ton, for conveying things up the Chilkoot Pass. When that bill comes to be paid, you will find I am not outside of my estimate in saying that we have spent $300,000 in order to convey Major Walsh into Dawson City, and that he is still camped at the mouth of Big Salmon River. He tried to send Mr. McGregor, the inspector of mines, a few miles further, but he has had to stop. That is the result of the efforts and expenditure of a very large sum of money indeed. The hon. gentleman says that that was the only way. I find fault entirely with the folly of trying to send a government by that route into that country at the time of the year it went in. If they thought it advisable and necessary to send it in, they ought to have sent it in by the Edmonton route. If they had sent it that way.

Hon. Mr POWER—It would take six months to get through.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I will undertake to go in there in six weeks if you will give me a letter of credit on the Hudson Bay Company.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—An expedition was despatched consisting of mounted police and a surveyor. They left in September and we have not heard of their arrival there yet.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If they had gone by the Mackenzie River they could have got there long ago.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They were told to select the best route they knew.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I am aware that the expedition got as far as the Liard. I am not prepared to say the mounted police are the smartest men in the world to do things of that kind. The settlers in the country are more inured to the difficulties which their own individuality have to overcome. The mounted police are under discipline and under orders. They have to go under certain conditions. They are under discipline. This party started in there with eight or ten men and I have no doubt they are at Dawson to-day. It would not surprise me if they were not, but there are lots of people who have gone into that country inured to difficulties. I myself went into the part of the country where I settled 18 years ago and took my wife and children with me across the country 300 miles, across rivers and sloughs and without a bridge or any adjunct money can supply, and when numbers turned back in consequence of the difficulties. You can get lots of people in the North-west Territories who will undertake to deliver a letter in Dawson City inside of six weeks if you will only pay them. The Mounted Police however are obliged to act more deliberately they cannot take chances individuals can.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Perhaps by balloon.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No, not by balloon. Half the way to Dawson City the route is through a good country for settlement. There are Hudson Bay posts and settlers all over it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—From the Peace River district to Dawson City is about 1,100 miles?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I am aware of that, but there are lots of people there that do not mind travelling 1,100 miles. It is a big country. Near where I live, a man with a team and outfit started from Russell a week or two ago to go through Peace River, 1,400 miles, and he will get there inside of a couple of months. The Peace River district is an agricultural country, full of rich resources of all kinds, pastoral resources, grain resources, mineral resources and every thing that is required to sustain human life. We have in the Peace River district 3,000,000 acres of land that was transferred in exchange by the province of British Columbia because it was on the east side of the Rocky Mountains and not easily administered from the Pacific coast. It is an exceedingly fine agricultural district, I believe. The same way with the Peace River district, the agricultural lands extend very far north, I am satisfied more than half the distance toward Dawson City. Mineral wealth is to be discovered and developed on the streams in that region and if the government had last September sent Major Walsh in there to establish headquarters half way between Edmonton and Dawson City, and let him work his way from there with the staff that was necessary there, something would have been accomplished, and if the $300,000 we have expended this winter in a fruitless effort to get Major Walsh and his party through to Dawson from the Pacific coast had been expended on the Edmonton route, there would have been a very different story to tell to-day. The government might then have boasted they had opened out an all-Canadian route. Major Walsh is camped on the Big Salmon River out of touch with the government and out of touch with the people up there. When he is to get to Dawson City, goodness knows. In my opinion it will be the first of June at least. He has to be supported there and how far he has provision for that, I cannot tell. We had information only two or three days ago that he paid $2 a pound for provisions, whether for his own support or to relieve distressed miners I cannot tell. There is this point I wish to point out, that if we are going to furnish from the North-west Territories and from eastern Canada here the food supplies and the necessaries required for the development of that mining region, we can never compete with Oregon and California. It is utterly impossible for us to do so and pay the freight across the continent and ship the goods on by steamboat through this route that is now being developed, tranship them at Fort Wrangel, tranship them again into smaller boats, tranship again to this railway and then tranship them again on to the route where Major Walsh has been stuck for months. The emigrants or intending miners on their return from the Yukon will find their way to California, they will never come back over the C. P. R. to settle. Going in by the Edmonton route, they will, if not successful in locating gold, fall back upon our agricultural districts to settle and help to develop their resources.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—It is a fact that we get nearly all our flour, cattle and supplies of that kind from Manitoba and the North-west. It is also a fact that United States miners come over to Victoria to compare the prices for such articles with those in Seattle and Tacoma, and they buy them from us, finding them cheaper.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I do not want to disturb the equanimity of my hon. friend from British Columbia, I am quite aware that they use our flour and why? Because it is a great deal better flour than can be got in Washington or Oregon. This statement that we send our cattle from Manitoba and the North-west Territories to British Columbia is not correct. We send them to the mountains, but not a single beast goes beyond that. Most of them come east and are shipped to England. I came down with the manager of Rothschild's Company, and he is sending supplies in there. He came to buy canned corn and tomatoes and things of that kind and he told me that he bought his flour in San Francisco, his bacon in Chicago and his butter from a creamery in Washington. What is the use in arguing and saying that we can compete and send our stuff across the continent, and that the duty is going to keep our neighbours out. What does the duty amount to when the transportation is twenty cents a pound?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It is done every day for all that.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, with a certain class of dry goods, but it is not our business or the business of the government to consider the diversion of wealth or business into any particular town or city. The duty of the government is to serve the interests of the country at large rather than the immediate interests of Edmonton, of Calgary, of Prince Albert or Victoria or Vancouver. That is not the question we are arguing at all. They are individual towns which will look after themselves to the best of their ability, and provide the supplies from some source or other, which are absolutely nesessary for the development of that mining region. We are interested whether for all time, or ten or fifteen years at least, they are going to be diverted from this country or whether we are to be able to compete with foreigners by the government taking the shortest and most advantageous route to get in there from our agricultural districts in the east, customs duty does not count when freight rates are high.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is the point at which my hon. friend lays down his free trade and takes up the other view.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I do not understand the hon gentleman's point. Anybody knows perfectly well that if I want to go from that corner of the room to the other corner of the room, the shortest route is to go right across, instead of going round the sides of the room.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is the way you would have to go, though.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—You prefer the straight line.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I prefer the straight line every time. Toe the mark every time, stick to your principles, and carry them out. That is the position in which the matter stands. The road from Edmonton in the North-west Territories, which is the terminus of railway communication in the interior, is a Canadian route all through, which our United States friends cannot interfere with in any degree whatever.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does my hon. friend assume that because this road is to be built to enable us to get in there within a few months and get our supplies in, that therefore no other road can be built?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No. I quite understand our position. I do know that if you give away the whole of our resources to build 150 miles of road in British Columbia, there would not be much use in our coming down from Edmonton and asking for assistance to build a road. I want the government to hang on to the dollars and cents.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think there are about 70,000,000 acres of land left.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Under ice.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—We are not speaking of that particular belt surrounding that district. I do not think it is the business of the government to contribute with undue haste to the excitement, because it is an excitement, and it is a boom which cannot last and will not last. Therefore, I do not consider it is the business of the government to unduly facilitate the ingress of that enormous population, which everybody claims is going in there before the country is able to digest it, and, as Mr. Ogilvie himself says, will return disgusted with the difficulties they have to encounter.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does my hon. friend think that if the government had taken advantage of that route they could have found contractors ready to construct the road at all?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Put up a notice in these buildings asking for tenders to-morrow, and say that the government will guarantee the bonds to the extent of $10,000 a mile for a narrow gauge road, and ask for tenders from contractors from Canada and you will not have to guarantee them for more than $8,000 a mile. Let them build the road, and the company are going to pay you back every penny out of the business they will do: it will not cost the government any money. I know what Manitoba did. They guaranteed the bonds of the Lake Dauphin railway for $8,000 a mile, and that built the whole road, and the Provincial Government took a first lien, and the company is earning enough from the traffic to bear the whole of the charges necessary to repay the province of Manitoba. The same condition of affairs exists on that road out there. I heard last night in the House of Commons an argument used that the expenditure on transportation and the purchase of goods in that country this year was going to be $20,000,000. But who is going to get that $20,000,000? Mainly those interested in transportation and in the construction of that road. All the government apparently wants is to secure that road. I will support them in securing that road, but I will not support them in giving away that enormous track of country to secure it, and I am not going to support them in their diversion of a large area of country which could readily be appropriated to connect the North-west Territory with that region which belongs to the North-west Territory. The road is being built through British Columbia, and they have their mines there, and own them there, and it is developing that portion of the country owned by the United States along the coast, and not developing the Yukon district. A connection between Edmonton and Dawson City would develop Canadian territory the whole way. We had here a committee appointed at the instigation of His Honour Governor Schultz, which went into a thorough examination of the natural resources of the Mackenzie basin and hon. members who sat on that commission will recollect very well the enormous resources which were proved to exist in that country. The Yukon country is part of the North-west Territory of Canada, and that the resources of these North-west Territories should be husbanded in order to connect the various parts of the North-west Territory together, and not force the trade of our heavy products, the only thing we grow, all the way back across to the Pacific, in order that the Canadian Pacific Railway may earn every dollar that there is to be made in carrying these goods. It is not our interest to support that; it is not our interest to support a monopoly of any kind. What we want to do is to get rid of monopolies. The monopolies are eating the vitals of the country. It is competition that we require. And while the government may feel the necessity of constructing that road, what I say is that they should put it on a business basis and business principles. Let it be built in thay way, and if possible administer the affairs of that Yukon region so that a good return can be obtained from it, in order that the country may be developed without falling back on the revenues of the country. These are my ideas with regard to construction of that road. The next clause in the speech reads :

> The bountiful harvest with which we have been favoured by a benevolent Providence has contributed greatly to the increase of our prosperity, and I am glad to note that the trade and commerce of the Dominion, and more especially the amount and values of her principal exports, have increased greatly during the past eighteen months, and there is good reason to believe that this improvement may be maintained if not augmented, during the remainder of the present year.

I am very glad indeed to see that the government have attributed our prosperity to the proper source—that is to benevolent Providence. I thoroughly believe in the hand of Providence being over us at all times. That fact that the government have seen fit to insert that clause in the speech is an evidence that they attribute our prosperity to that source, which is very true, and for which we have every reason to be thankful.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—They attribute it to Providence and not to the government.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes. But we strike a snag right here, as far as I am concerned, and that is my free trade views.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend abandoned his free trade views when he talked about flour from California and the Western States.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No; my free trade views are limited to free trade with Great Britain for the present, until we can remove the commercial hostility of our friends in the United States, and I tell hon. gentlemen that it is the most popular policy that there is in the country to-day.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—You had better endeavour to abolish the Dingley tariff.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—If you would adopt free trade with Great Britain you would convert the whole Northern States to the same principle. It will not be more than five years, or a very little longer, when the United States will find it absolutely necessary for them to adopt the same principle. There are lots of free traders in the United States, only they cannot get out of the grasp of protection and it is the same in Canada. Here is a free trade government that appealed to the country for 20 years, who have put themselves under the thumb of the member for Centre Toronto, who says that no disturbance of that tariff shall be made for ten years. When I find that that gentleman has been put forward to move the address, and that this speech contains no reference to the reduction of the tariff, to the carrying out of the principles the liberal party advocated for many years, you cannot expect me, hon. gentlemen, to believe in the views that they may express so long as that condition is maintained.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But you do not want to lower the tariff against our neighbours.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No, not for the present. I am quite convinced if we have free trade with Great Britain that they will be in a great hurry to lower it, that they will enter into a reciprocity treaty at once.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—So as to get rid of the smuggling.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I want for the present, our commercial relations with Great Britain to be reciprocal free trade for free trade, and the same for the United States, free trade for free trade. But we are brought face to face with a new condition that has never presented itself since Canada was Canada, and the new condition having arisen, it is necessary to put on your thinking cap and consider is that condition a wholesome one, or is it necessary that some change should be made in order to improve it? Now, what is this condition which has arisen, only in the last three years? It is that our imports exceeded our exports for 30 years. If anybody will run his eye down page 17 of the Trade and Navigation Returns, he will see that from 1868 to 1898, with the exception of three years, the imports have exceeded the exports, that is for 27 years of the life of Confederation the imports exceeded the exports. For the past three years they have reversed this order. Now, both conditions cannot be sound. If it was a sound position that we were importing more than we were exporting, it cannot be a sound position that we are now exporting more than we are importing. You can take whichever side you like to argue upon, but you cannot argue both ways like the present government. My hon. friend, the leader of the opposition (Sir Mackenzie Bowell), while he condemns the government for not carrying out the policy advocated in their speeches, quite approves of the manner in which they are conducting operations in not carrying them out, but I think, to a certain extent, arguing both ways also. He approves of the policy the government have adopted, but he condemns them for stealing his clothes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—And they have left him without the means of covering up his nakedness. He is not prepared to put on a new suit. I want to dress him up with a new suit, and I think I can do it before I conclude. There is a stone wall that you have got your head against, and that is the fact that I have announced today, that we are exporting more than we are importing. In 1896 we exported two million and a half more than we imported.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is a good sign.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—In 1897, the year which has just closed, the exports have exceeded the imports to the extent of $18,000,000. That is a jump from $2,000,000 to $18,000,000. The public returns show us that the exports have exceeded the imports during the last six months of the present financial year—that is, between the first of July last and the 31st December last—$30,000,000, or at the rate of $60,000,000 a year. I want to know how you can explain that condition. For 27 years of our life we have been importing more than we have been exporting. The moment the Liberal party get into power, the reverse condition comes about and we are now parting with $60,000,000 more of the product of the labour of Canada than we are getting back. The hon. leader of the House knows that I am stating a thing that is against the principles he has always advocated, and I believe thoroughly in my heart he is advocating to-day, only he has got into a nest of traitors, to use a new parliamentary phrase, traitors to their principles, I think, and he must submit to the inevitable and has to swallow his own principles. I quite appreciate the position. He knows Her Majesty's government has to be carried on and I am proud and pleased to think he is occupying a seat in this chamber and helping the government to carry it out, and I only hope his influence will be so exerted that he will cause them to change their policy; whether he can do that or not, remains to be seen.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Would you stop the exports?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No, but I would bring back the imports.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Supposing this country had been running behind for some years previous, supposing we were incurring a foreign indebtedness, and that when the country was becoming more prosperous, there was an opportunity to even up matters, does not my hon. friend see that the exports would be in excess of the imports? That may be our condition.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, and that is why I opposed giving a grant to the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, and why I oppose the excessive cost of transporting Major Walsh to Salmon River through the United States, and several other matters. I opposed those things for the reason that the hon. gentleman has given. What he said does not justify such an enormous surplus over imports of $60,000,000 a year. I am quite aware that any public indebtedness that we have to remit in the shape of governmental indebtedness, in the shape of dividends of our large corporations, and all those things are absorbed by our exports, that our exports go to pay for these remittances instead of the Canadian Pacific Railway, or the Canadian government sending gold across there, they merely draw on England, or rather the country sends exports, and the exchange in England is what remits the indebtedness. But there is something more behind that to account for the enormous increase, because hon. gentlemen must become alarmed at the fact that we have parted with $30,000,000 worth of exportation of the product of Canadian labour in six months and get no visible return for it.

Hon. Mr. COCHRANE—We got the money.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No, sir, we have not got the money.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—A good many mortgages have been paid off.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The loan companies are not in that prosperous condition in eastern Canada to justify that last remark. In Manitoba, where the loans do not as a rule exceed two to four dollars an acre with 8 per cent interest, their condition may be better, but loan companies will not accept payment of a mortgage under those conditions. I am going to explain exactly to you the conditions that I think we have arrived at, and that is, first of all, we have of course to remit the government indebtedness, the interest amounting to $11,000,000, the net earnings of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the net revenue of the Grand Trunk and the net revenue of all our corporations. Then, of course, hon. gentlemen will know that the principle I have always argued this question upon is this, that if we export to England or any other country a million of dollars worth of products which are admitted into England free, and we refuse to receive British products back again into Canada, excepting under a tax of 30 per cent, that of necessity they can only send back 70 per cent.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Where does that 30 per cent go to?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That goes to customs duties on our necessaries. The farmers are bearing the whole cost, because those exports, as the speech says, consist mainly of our agricultural products. I am arguing the question for the benefit of the great agricultural interest which represents 75 per cent of the exporting power of the country; they send out of the product of their labour, 75 per cent of all our exports, and they get nothing back for it; it is absorbed by the high charges on the Canadian Pacific Railway, the increase of indebtedness, etc. That does not account for the enormous difference between exports and imports of the past six months, which is going to alarm the country, and I advise people to open their eyes to it, that we are parting with $30,000,000 worth and have no visible return for it in six months. except any one here in this House can explain how it is returned, and who gets the money. Now, my explanation of it is this, that in May last there was a boom got up for the Canadian Pacific Railway stock and it stood at 49 in April last, and you will recollect my drawing attention to the fact that the hon. Minister of Interior had contributed to that boom by announcing on the floor of the House of Parliament his opinion as to the exemptions of Canadian Pacific Railway lands from taxation for 20 years. Mr. Lister, the member for Lambton, asked the question when did the exemption of the Canadian Pacific Railway lands from taxation for 20 years commence, was it from the date of the issue of the individual patent or the date the letters patent when the land grant was earned. His reply was that it dated from the issue of the individual patent, and that only 1,500,000 acres had so far been patented. The Canadian Pacific Railway stock boomed up from 50 to 90, an increase of 40 per cent. That was bought very largely in Montreal; so, at any rate, to the extent that it was purchased in Montreal, is it necessary to remit the amount of the purchase money to England. That is to say, supposing people here in Montreal or elsewhere purchased stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway upon a marginal deposit of five or ten per cent for a rise or a fall, say at 50, they would have to remit the value of the stock at 50, when the demand for the transfer of the stock was made, the profit between 50 and 90 remains with the purchaser, but the 50 per cent would have to be remitted to England in order to meet the obligations entered into in the purchase of that stock from Dutch, English or American shareholders or whoever it was who agreed to sell that stock at those figures. Hon. gentlemen, when you come to think that $30,000,000 has gone out of the country and that the exchange has absorbed that $30,000,000, the exchange being contributed by these sources such as the remittance of the dividends of the Canadian Pacific Railway government liabilities, our corporate liabilities and, added to that, the terms of the purchase of the Canadian Pacific Railway stock by speculators, then I can account for the transference of $30,000,000 of Canada exports into the pockets of somebody else; and the people which have reaped the benefit of the exports are those who purchased the stock and pocketed the profits. They had to remit, of course, the original purchase money, but the profit they made between the price they purchased at and the rise, remained with them, but the products of the country have been absorbed in purchasing exchange in England to cover that. That is what I call the transference of the profits of labour that produced those articles of export to the pockets of speculators who do not do any work upon it. And the moment the farmers whose exports last year were sixty million become aware of that, I tell the leader of the opposition, they will get such a hustle on to change that state of affairs, that at any rate they will want their commercial policy arranged so that the British exports shall come into Canada on the same terms as our exports go into England, so that the return cargoes will be distributed among the people instead of being transferred into the pockets of the speculators. Now take the revenue of the Canadian Pacific Railway last year it is upwards of twenty-four million dollars and its net revenue or profits is ten million dollars, this revenue pays no taxes. It is a revenue equal to the income of 15,000 farmers all of whom have to pay their taxes, while this large income is untaxed, the road bed and rolling stock is untaxed, the lands are untaxed, the rails are untaxed and the net income derived from its earnings is untaxed, and the remittance of this income absorbs the exports produced by labour which is heavily taxed; take off the protective duties and labour will be relieved from a portion of the burden in proportion to its exporting power. It is open to any one to refute my position, and I should like to hear a clearer explanation of this matter. Take one particular article, that is, the article of iron which we import from Great Britain. We have put on a duty and given a bonus to increase the manufacture of iron in Canada, and what has been the result of the bonus? It is that we have reached a great production of iron in Canada of 36,000 tons. Here are the mineral returns.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—That is a beginning.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That is a beginning, as you say, but a beginning that has been going on for ten years, and that like the crab is crawling backwards 32 per cent of our mineral production is coal, twelve per cent gold, nine per cent silver and one-half of one per cent is iron produced in Canada out of the $22,000,000 of mineral production. For the sake of producing and establishing an industry which produces but one-half of one per cent of our mineral productions in Canada, we tax the farmers of Canada and the people upon $10,000,000 of the import of iron manufactured goods. Is that justice to labour and to the country that we tax $10,000,000 worth of the absolute necessities of our agricultural interests? What for? To encourage the production of one-half of one per cent of our mineral resources in the shape of iron. That is only one instance, and I could go on and run the gamut of lots of other instances just exactly in the same way.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—You are including the bounties?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The duty has been reduced by the present government to $2.50 a ton, but the bonus has been increased to $3.00 a ton. The late government, I say it to their honour, imposed $4 a ton to encourage the production of iron, but they gave nothing for the production if it was made out of iron ore in the United States. Notwithstanding the fact that a bounty of $3 a ton is paid upon iron produced from ore from the United States as well as from iron ore produced in Canada, the whole result of the protectionist effort, which this government has not relieved in the slightest degree, but increased, by increasing the bonus, is that we are taxing the requirements of agricultural labour to the extent of $10,000,000 a year for the benefit of the small amount of Canada production that I have spoken of to-day. What have we to pay for a binder in the North-west Territories? $150. Let iron and iron manufactures come in free and let the Massey-Harris and other companies hunt their living in the markets abroad, which they are quite capable of doing and which they are doing more and more every day, make then hunt their living abroad, and then we will be able to buy a binder, a harrow and a plough of the same money.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The hon. gentleman laughs.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—I do laugh; it is so absurd.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The hon. gentleman is interested in maintaining that policy, but it is my duty to fight that the people amongst whom I live who labour and work and have to buy these machines shall not be taxed unduly, so that $30,000,000 of the exports of the agriculturists of Canada shall not be absorbed in speculation and the exaction of money by the government which restricts their power to produce. The returns are here for the six months ending the 31st December last—January trade returns show the same condition 85 per cent increase in exports—imports only 7 per cent:

Imports	$ 62,701,000	$ 58,102,000
Dutiable	34,350,000	31,989,000
Duty collected	10,341,000	9,683,000
Free goods	25,613,000	21,634,000
Coin and bullion	2,732,000	4,478,000

The exports during the same period were:

	1897.	1896.
Minerals	$ 7,656,000	$ 5,314,000
Fish	7,100,000	7,230,000
Animals and produce	32,467,000	25,950,000
Forest	19,767,000	18,762,000
Agricultural products	26,771,000	14,247,000
Manufactures	5,736,000	5,132,000
Miscellaneous	174,000	248,000
Total	$ 99,673,000	76,886,000
Produce of Canada	89,779,000	69,911,000
Coin and bullion	987,000	3,212,000

I saw this in the public press, and I was so astounded at the fact here exhibited that I went and verified the figures at the Department of Trade and Commerce to be sure they were correct.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—What is the excess?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The difference between $62,000,000 and $99,000,000 in six months. A portion of these figures are foreign trade, but I figured the difference between the articles imported for consumption and the articles exported the produce of Canada, and the difference is $30,000,000; taking the whole trade, it is $37,000,000 more export than imports. Those are facts that I only present for the consideration of this hon. House, and I consider that it is ample justification of the warning I felt it necessary to give some six or seven years ago, when I saw how the interests of the people of our great North-west Territories which are essentially agricultural, were being pressed down by some cause or causes which we could not quite arrive at, and that, as hon. gentlemen know, although a Conservative I withdrew myself from the party and took an independent stand so that I might have a free hand in discussing this question which you have patiently listened to time and again on the floor of this chamber, and for which I have to thank you. I think I have brought such an array of facts before this hon. House that they will see that it is worth their while to open their minds and put on their thinking caps, and argue for themselves; it cannot be good for twenty years to have been importing more than we exported, and then to export $30,000,000 more than we import. If it is good for England to import 40 per cent more than she exports and still be the wealthiest nation in the world with the most redundant revenue and the enormous powers of improvement that she possesses, the reverse condition cannot be good for Canada. The United States, I will acknowledge, is working on the same policy as the people of Canada are: they export $300,000,000 more than they import; but if the people of the United States were exporting at the same rate as we have done for the past six months, they would be exporting $850,000,000 more than they import, which, I think, would be figures sufficiently high to alarm even that country that appears to be so thoroughly wedded to protection. I do not think that I shall trespass on the patience of the House any more by discussing the trade question further. I should like, before I close, to move an amendment to the address, and I do not know whether it would be wise to prolong the discussion. The address says:

> I am glad to know that the trade and commerce of the Dominion and more especially the improvement in value of our principal exports have increased in value during the past eighteen months.

I wish to add the words:

> But I regret that the importations into Canada in return for these exportations have not kept pace with the agricultural exportations of the country.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If the excess has gone towards the payment of indebtedness abroad, the hon. gentleman ought not to regret that.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No, but if it has gone to pay the speculative Canadian Pacific Railway or to other stocks, then, I do regret it, and what is more, the hon. gentleman knows that the burden of paying the country's debts should not be imposed on the necessaries of the people. If I move that amendment he will be able to explain exactly where it is. There is one thing to which I should like to call the attention of hon. gentlemen which I omitted, and that is with regard to the Mounted Police, that the government have found it necessary to withdraw a very large number of the Mounted Police in order to assist in keeping law and order in the Yukon region. Any expenditure they may find it necessary to make in that direction I think will be thoroughly supported by the country so long as it is continued on sound economic principles. I want to see the labour of the Mounted Police expended entirely within Canadian bounds and for the benefit of Canada; at the same time, I wish to call attention to complaints which have reached us time and again in the North-west Territories that the police are being drawn off from their legitimate duty, which they have been in the habit of performing for a number of years in that country, keeping down the improper use of intoxicating liquor and others there and also the general duties that they have performed. I hope that the government will consider that the burden of maintaining the force in the Yukon district should be quite apart from the necessities that may hereafter arise in the maintenance of the protection which has contributed so materially to the success of our settlement in the North-west. If that protection should be withdrawn, it would be, to a certain extent, disastrous to the interests which are springing up and which require the protection that the government has so far afforded. There is one thing before I conclude, I should like to say upon the question that is not referred to in the speech, and very properly, because it is, to a certain extent, a dead issue in its present form; but what I want to say is, when I was in England I took an opportunity of visiting one of the public schools there in one of the poorer districts, in the Borough Road, in order that I might see what they did and how they managed, and everything that I saw there pleased me exceedingly. It was a magnificent school, capable of holding about 1,500 children. The building was three stories high, each story an exact counterpart of the other, I was shown over the whole building and the girls and the boys were kept entirely separate. The girls had their play ground on the top of the building; the boys in the centre of the building, and the kindergarten children had the other end of the building.

Then I went into the class rooms. In one they were having their morning lesson. It was just 9.30 a.m, and the curriculum that governed the whole of the schools—that is what is called the board schools, we call them national schools—the first half hour of every day, after breakfast, was teaching the Bible. Every day year in and year out, as long as the child is there, he is taught the Bible without any sectarian or religious teaching of any kind of description. I asked what the children knew. The whole class stood up and repeated the chapter they were then engaged in learning correctly from end to end. That struck me as being something remarkable and I felt that I should take the first opportunity of giving my views upon that. What I find in the province of Manitoba, since the school agitation, is that the teaching of the Bible has practically ceased in our public shools, a position that I cannot agree with at all. The Bible, I believe, is the foundation of the nation's character and individual's character Some like to teach it and explain it in accordance with their religious ideas; other object to the use of the Bible as a text book at all; that may be all right, but at any rate for the nation to entirely ignore the Bible in its national institutions where the education of the children is concerned is wrong. The principle in England is, there is a system of voluntary schools and a system of board schools. The voluntary schools are supported by those who wish to give their children a training in a particular line. The board schools have to submit to the curriculum provided by the government. The education is excellent and the training is excellent in the board schools and it has to be up to a certain standard in the voluntary schools. The government gives a parliamentary grant to the board schools, which are also supported by rates, and, in addition to rates, the government gives a grant. The voluntary schools are supported by voluntary subscriptions and fees, to which the government also adds a grant, so that those who approve of these schools are supported to a certain extent, in keeping their children in lines in which they think they ought to be taught, while those who prefer to send their children to the board schools where the education is excellent, are supported by the rates and by government grants. They are free schools, with the rates and the parliamentary grant. I should like to give an idea of the amount that the British government grants in the way of supporting education. Taking the year 1895, it was $35,000,000. The total cost of education is $55,000,000. The government grant is one pound eighteen shillings per head, and the rate is two pounds five shillings and five pence. The number of children that are being taught is 5,000,000. They have increased from two and a half millions in 1870, when this law was introduced by Sir Edward Foster, up to five millions to-day. In 30 years the increase of school population in England has come up to five millions daily attendance within a small fraction of the total. When such a system produces that result, and the total population of England are educated either at these boards schools or at these voluntary schools, and the system works smoothly and does not operate injuriously in any shape or form, it must be effective. The only fight they have had has been over an attempt to introduce into board schools not only the teaching of the Bible but religious teaching. However, the people are determined not to allow religious teaching to enter into the national schools and make it a bone of contention. Those who desire to educate their children in the way I speak of have the voluntary system, which is very largely assisted by parliamentary grants. I only give these facts and figures for public consideration and I feel myself that, while there is a difference between denominations as to the methods which should be adopted in teaching children, out of which arose the troublesome school question which, I am happy to say, has been cleared off the political slate as it existed, still there is continuously an effort being made to do something else than what we are called upon to do. The true position for the Canadian people to take is to make the Bible, where these difficulties do not present themselves, a part of the national education of children, and it would not be at all out of place if the parliament of Canada, out of its revenues, when there is a redundancy of revenue, were to assist the voluntary schools in order to remove the political obstacles that appear to be perpetually cropping up in our educational system. I take pleasure in explaining the interest it afforded me in visiting the schools in England for the purpose of finding out the facts I have given to you. I will not impose any more upon your time. I thank you very much for the patient hearing you have given me, but the subjects, you will acknowledge, are exceedingly important. I shall move the amendment that I spoke of.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Move it to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Will it be in my power. (Cries of now, now.) I move my resolution expressing regret that the imports of this country have not kept pace with the exports.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—What has that to do with the motion before the chair? We are not going to amend the Governor General's speech. The motion before the House is just to declare that we thank His Excellency for the speech he has made. It is to avoid discussion on particular words of the address that can be dealt with at a different period. The motion of the hon. gentleman cannot enter anywhere into this resolution. It must be at the close of the Governor General's speech, and that is not before the chair. The hon. gentleman cannot move such an amendment as that.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I can move an amendment to the address.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—We have nothing to do with the speech from the Throne, but merely with the address. In old times it used to be, "We thank your Excellency," prefacing each paragraph of the speech. You could have amended that but not this motion.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—We have listened to an interesting speech from the hon. gentleman from Shell River. At this stage of the evening I would move the adjournment of the debate until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Has my hon. friend finished speaking?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I give notice that I shall move the amendment to-morrow.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman cannot, after having spoken, move any amendment. If he completes his speech with an amendment he is in order, but he cannot move it at a future time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And the amendment must be germane to the motion before the House.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman had better finish his speech. We can meet after eight o'clock, if necessary.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman from Shell River has put us under an obligation for the speech he has made, but after speaking two hours I think he, being opposed to monoply as he is, ought to feel that he has done enough for us and give some one else a chance.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I think the hon. gentleman from Shell River has really, in substance, finished his speech, and he merely moves the adjournment of the debate to give him an opportunity to prepare his amendment.

Hon Mr. BOULTON—This is all.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I move the adjournment of the debate for the purpose of preparing this amendment, and nothing else.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It will only be ruled out of order, because it is not germane to the address.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think we ought to try to take a technical advantage of the hon. gentleman. If he has an amendment that he wishes to move, we should not object to it unless he intends to talk two hours longer.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I object to that course, because you are departing from well established rules. I differ from the opinion expressed by my hon. friend the Secretary of State with reference to our right to amend the address. It is not only parliamentary, but it has been the practice in the House of Commons and also in this House. You can move an amendment to the address, but it must be germane to the subject before the House, and the proper course for the hon. gentleman to pursue would be, taking the words of the answer to the speech, while we are thanking His Excellency for the address he has presented, to express regret that a certain thing has not been done. If that were passed in the House of Commons, it would be a vote of want of confidence. It would be utterly useless here, even if we passed it by a majority. If we could depose these gentlemen from their seats by a motion of that sort, there might be something in it. The hon. gentleman from Shell River has expressed his views, and they are on record just as well as if he had moved a dozen amendments, and he should be satisfied.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—He may add that to this motion but he cannot tack that to the paragraph in the speech from the Throne, because it is not before us.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Withdraw.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—You generally induce me to withdraw, but some day I hope to force upon you a discussion of the real points at issue.

The amendment was withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate then adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Thursday, 10th February, 1898.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'Clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE FAST ATLANTIC STEAMSHIP LINE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to a telegram from Quebec, dated 7th February, which appeared in the Montreal Star, which states :

It is rumoured that a cable has just been received that the Messrs. Peterson have succeeded in their negotiations for assuring the success of a fast Atlantic steamship.

I ask the hon. gentleman whether the government has any information upon that subject, and whether the statement made in this telegraphic despatch is correct. It is a very important matter and the country should know.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may state to my hon. friend that if such information has been received it must have been to-day, and I have not heard of it from the minister, but I will tell my hon. friend that I know that two or three days ago Mr. Peterson thought he was about succeeding in carrying out his intentions.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Did he telegraph his thoughts ?

MR. OGILVIE'S REPORT.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—I beg to ask the hon. Minister of Justice a question with reference to the report of Mr. Ogilvie, who has been up in the Klondike country for two or three years. He is a servant of the government and of the country ; how comes it that his report is published in another place and is placed on the market for sale, and not put into the hands of members of parliament ? I think we are entitled to that report as a report of a pub ic servant. We should not be compelled to buy it, nor should it be placed in the market in that way.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend has not given notice of his question, but I will say to him that that report will be in the hands of members of parliament almost immediately. I think there were 15,000 copies printed for the use of the government, and as soon as they reach the hands of the government, I have no doubt they will be distributed amongst the members.

THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC IN THE YUKON COUNTRY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to ask the hon. leader of the government if he has seen in the Evening Journal of yesterday, the answer which the hon. leader of the government gave to the temperance delegation respecting the sale of liquor in the Yukon country. I might say that on Tuesday of this week a temperance delegation, or body of temperance men, met in the tower room for the purpose of taking into consideration the supposed conditions to be attached to the vote on the plebiscite question, and that a committee was appointed to wait upon his honour the leader of the government and, among other things, they were to protest before him against any liquor being allowed to be sold in the Yukon country, and his honour, the leader of the government answered him :

> As to liquor permits, so far, there was no sale of liquor in the Yukon.

The question I want to know is this : if the government is aware that the North-west government did, in the latter part of January send a member of the government and an official to the Yukon country for the purpose of establishing and regulating the sale of liquor in that country. If the government is aware of that fact, then I think it is rather an evasive and improper answer to be given to that committee. I would like to know also if the government of the North-west Territories has the power to control and regulate the sale of liquor in that country, or whether the power is vested in the Federal government at Ottawa ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say to the hon. gentleman that I do not read all the newspapers, that I have not time, that the matters to which my hon. friend has referred have not come under my attention and if he had put his notice upon the paper in the regular way I would have been prepared to give him a more satisfactory answer than I can under the circumstances. The hon. gentleman knows that as far as the North-west Territories government is concerned there were no specific limitations mentioned in the bill creating that government and legislature and giving them jurisdiction over that territory. I cannot say—the hon. gentleman would know better than I do—what that government has undertaken to accomplish. I can only tell my hon. friend that the government are preparing measures to submit to parliament to define the limits of the government of the North-west Territories and to provide for the government of the Yukon country. My hon. friend knows that those territories are not provinces, that we expect them to be settled in the course of time, that during the progress of settlement the provinces are likely to be barred out of the territory now very extensive and embraced, for the moment, under one government. We shall submit to this House and to the House of Commons a measure relating to the government of the Yukon country and my hon. friend will see precisely what the provisions of that bill are. With regard to permits, of course, the hon gentleman knows that that subject is not under the jurisdiction of my department, and I can only answer questions relating to other departments of which I have had notice, and if my hon. friend wants a more definite answer than I have given him—and I would give him a full answer if I had the power to do so—he will have to put a notice on the paper, and then I will give him all the information I can obtain.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I would take the opportunity of suggesting to the government that it would be a very wise thing now to institute the same system in the development of the Yukon territory as was instituted in the development of the North-west Territories, and that for the time being at any rate that the sale of liquor should be prohibited except under some restricted system.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I might be permitted to add, unlike the Minister of Justice, I have read that interview in the Citizen, in the Montreal Witness, in the Toronto papers and also in the Journal, and it is reported a little differently in the different papers, and slightly different from that read by my hon. friend from the west. The Prime Minister gave a somewhat similar answer to the deputations to that just given by the Minister of Justice, that the matter was under their consideration. The only inference you can draw from his reply is that they have not yet decided as to what the powers of the government of the North-west Territories were ; but I saw this morning an answer to a letter sent by the secretary representing the North-west government in answer to a request as to whether they would grant a permit for the taking of liquor into and selling of liquor in the Yukon territory. The answer was that upon a regular application being made to the administrator, who I believe is the premier of that province just now, I am not sure——

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Mr. Haultain.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Mr. Haultain, that upon an application being made to him and a fee of one dollar accompanying that application, for every gallon of liquor to be taken into the territories, the permit will be granted. The gentleman came to me and asked my advice about the matter as to whether I thought, if he did that, the government here would annul any permit that would be granted to him. I frankly say, that I told him that under the circumstances the authority had been assumed by the North-west Territories, and if he obtained a permit from them, I thought he would be quite justified in going on with his trading operations and take chances as to the future —that if it was annulled by the Dominion government, they certainly would have to refund the money which was given them. Whether that has been brought under the notice of my hon. friend or the Department of the Interior, of course, I do not know. It is quite evident it must be referred to the Justice Department in order to ascertain really what the powers are that have been granted to the North-west government by the Act of the Dominion Parliament, and my hon. friend, no doubt, will look into that, and then he will be able to give the gentleman who asks the question, more clear and definite information.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend knows that the powers of the government of the North-west Territories and the legislature have not been increased for some years. They are now what they have been and they are not exercising any new power.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not say they were.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, and so far as the Yukon country is concerned, I told my hon. friend we intend to legislate on that, and until we do legislate the government of that country is, theoretically at all events, under the North-west Territories.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think I may add to what has been said by the Minister of Justice that it is quite unlikely that any permits are being issued now. I know that about three weeks ago I sent a telegram to Mr. Richardson stating what the desire of this government was, that it was their desire not to issue any licenses. About ten days ago I received a telegram from him asking whether that applied to all licenses where the license was simply a personal one for a small quantity of liquor, and my answer to him was that it was to apply to all licenses and it was the desire of this government, for the present at all events, that no permits should be granted by the administrator. I have no doubt he is governing himself accordingly.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—About ten days ago a member of the government, who is now on his way to the Yukon, and Mr. Victor Dodds, an official of the executive staff there, who had charge of the issuing of the liquor licenses in the North-west Territories, has gone with him to establish and regulate the matter in the Yukon.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Of course we have no control at present until power is obtained by legislation. I suppose under the general powers possessed by the North-west government, they have the control at present, but knowing it was our desire that no permits should be issued for the present and that it was intended to take the Yukon district out of the North-west Territories, I assumed they would conform.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I think it very improper on their part to send a man as they have.

THE ADDRESS.

The Order of the Day having been called,

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech on the opening of the Third Session of the Eighth Parliament.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM said:—I can assure the House that I will detain you but a very short time. I am not going to make a very long speech, but before I shall say anything about the speech from the Throne I may say there have been some changes in this House since last I had the pleasure of addressing it. I see that we have now a new leader in this House, the Minister of Justice. I have no doubt he will discharge his duty satisfactorily to his party, and I hope to the country, and to the Senate. I have known him for a long time, and I am glad to see him here. I am very glad to see him leading the government, and holding the position in this House that he occupies to-day. But this is an age of improvement, an age of progress. That hon. gentleman's opinion was not always very favourable to the Senate, I must say, and I hope that he finds himself comfortable here to-day. I may quote from some former speeches of my hon. friend to show how times change, and what we say to day, may be quoted a long time afterwards. I hold here in my hand the Commons Hansard of 1875. My hon. friend, speaking in the House of Commons about the constitution of the Senate, and who was likely to be found in the upper chamber, said :

> Is it the artisan, the agriculturist, the lawyer of good standing? No, you get none of these; you find a few wealthy merchants and retired bankers and defeated politicians, and when you go behind this last there is nothing.

That was his opinion, but he went even farther. I hope that he will find something more than he then predicted he would find there :

> It was said by a gentleman who, when appointed to the Senate, found himself among gentlemen very much his senior in years, that he expected to be with those who lived two or three generations ago, but to his surprise he found himself with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob when he took his seat in that chamber.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In the kingdom of Heaven.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Does he find that here to-day? He said even worse of this House—something more surprising than that. He said that the Senate was a "Magdalen asylum for political prostitutes and broken down politicians retained by the government." Well I hope my hon. friend may live long to enjoy the position he is occupying here. I do not say that the hon. gentleman meant that earnestly. I do not quote his former utterances to attack him, but to show what a change has taken place in his opinion of this House. I know this, that my hon. friend was always opposed to the composition of the Senate, the mode of appointment; that he was always in favour of having the Senate appointed by the local legislatures. I have always disagreed with him in that, and if we cross the line and see what goes on in the United States in the appointment of senators, I think it will be admitted that our mode is preferable to theirs. I do not mean to say—far from it—that he is a broken down politician, although he got defeated in his own county at the last elections. That has happened to us all, and I do not intend to say any more about it. But I am glad to see him in the position he occupies here, and I hope he will discharge his duties satisfactorily and may live long to enjoy his position and let bygones be bygones—brush them away and let them go. He knows better to-day. He praised the Senate the other day; and he knows that what he said formerly was said under a wrong impression. I am willing to let that go and say no more about it.

I may have to deal somewhat with the speeches that have been made here. I must pay a compliment, before I come to discuss this question, to my hon. friend the member for Shell River. He made quite a speech. One half of it I approved of entirely; the other half I disagreed with altogether, as my hon. friend knows. He has been very persistent and very consistent in advocating free trade on all occasions. He ought to feel encouraged that he has made some converts, among them the prime minister of the country. The hon. member and the premier were both in England at the Jubilee ceremonies, and the hon. senator the gentleman who ought to have received the Cobden medal, not the premier, because our colleague made a convert. It must have been a quick conversion. If we look to the premier's speech at London in the last election, we find he was in favour of preferential trade. He showed the farmers there how much better off they would be if they could get so much more for their butter and cheese and products generally. How did he get converted all at once to free trade? The moment he put his foot on British soil at Liverpool, this conversion occurred. There is only one conversion more remarkable, that is the one that took place on the road to Damascus. My hon. friend from Shell River has given us the same speech, from his standpoint, on free trade more than once, but he must know this, or has to learn it, that people do not get rich by what they buy. They have to get rich by what they produce and sell, and instead of my hon. friend regretting that the exports of this country exceed the imports, he should regard it is a matter of congratulation to the people of this country that we have surplus products to sell. No people on the face of God's footstool are better fed and clad than the Canadian people. We supplied ourselves and as our exports are so much more than our imports we should be satisfied that we are on the fair road to prosperity. When my hon. friend speaks of Great Britain, with the balance of trade against her, getting rich all the time, he must remember that the mother country has been rich from time immemorial. Great Britain is the banker of the world, with money loaned to all the nations of the world. There is where the imports of Great Britain come in—the interest on those loans. They do not feel the effect of the balance of trade being against them. So far as we are concerned, it is the labour of the people who produce that we have to rely upon. We have to look after them and see that they get fair play. I do not want to encourage imports from foreign countries.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I should like to ask the hon. gentleman, was not the country prosperous during the period the Conservative government was in power, when every year they were in power they were importing a great deal more than they exported? How do you account for that?

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The hon. gentleman says the country was prosperous.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—But they were importing more than they exported; how do you account for that prosperity?

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—They were building railways and other public works with borrowed capital. The people of Great Britain have money loaned all over the world, while we are borrowers. When we import shoddy and silks and satin from Great Britain while our men are idle, it is a poor lookout for the country. It is all very well to say "encourage importations into this country," but we should not import more than we are able to pay for. I say, import as little as you can; manufacture and produce everything you want in this country so far as it can be done and keep people comfortable; pay a good day's wage for a good day's work, that is the true policy for this country. The people of the Dominion are in a comfortable condition, and have only exported what they do not need for their own use. The crofters and the tenants in Ireland, many of them, have to sell the pigs that they should consume in their families in order to pay the rent. It is not so in Canada. We are a prosperous people, and it should be the duty of the government not to encourage importations into this country, but to encourage the production of what we require in our own land. It is a blessing for this country to-day that our exports far exceed our imports, and I hope it will always continue to be so. My hon. friend who moved this resolution now before the House, said that the country is prosperous and that the government ought to have credit for producing that prosperity. I would ask my hon. friend what have the government of this country done to deserve credit for the increased exports of the Dominion. Have they made even two blades of grass grow where only one grew before? They say the man who does that is a benefactor to his country. Can they point to one single instance where they helped the people to increase the production of the country in any degree? Before I sit down I shall show where they have hindered the productions of this country; that in every instance where they departed from the policy of their predecessors, the country was a sufferer by it. They stole the Conservative clothes, and whenever they used their own the country has suffered. I believe we should manufacture and produce everything in this country that we require ourselves, as far as possible. They believe in encouraging foreign production in preference to our own, and the hon. gentleman says they ought to have credit for that policy. When my hon. friend spoke of the Yukon Railway, I thought at first he was going to oppose the whole policy. He said he did not like that at all, because he remembers the speeches of the party leaders before they got into power, in which they contended that all public contracts should be let by tender. But before he was through he swallowed it all. I am not ready to accept or oppose the contract, because I do not know what it is. The leader of the House said the other day, if we knew as much about this question as he does, we would all vote for it. We asked him to inform us. He said that would never do, because there was some foreign correspondence about it. I should like to know what secret there is about 150 miles of tram road in British territory. The government want us to take it on trust without telling us all about it. I do not know what I may do yet, but as it strikes me now I am not favourable to it. In speaking of the hon. prime minister's visit to England my hon. friend said further that all the people of Canada—he does not except any—approved of his actions and conduct in England. There is one who does not anyway, and that is the individual who is now addressing you. I speak for myself. The premier is a very fine spoken man. As far as appearance and speeches and manners are concerned, I have no doubt he did his part well, but he went from here, as far as we know, and as far as his speeches show and as far as we understood, to try and get preferential trade with Great Britain for this country, and he came back with the Cobden medal. I do not approve of his course in that respect. The hon. Minister of Justice said that Sir Joseph Chamberlain could not maintain his position if he gave us that preference. How does he know that? The Colonial Secretary generally holds any position he takes.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I know for years it has been the whole aim of the Conservative party in this country to get preferential treatment in the British market. We would have given anything in reason for it, but just as we were about to secure it, the premier of the Dominion jumped the stile and said, "We will not have it." Free trade is best for England and it is best for Canada also. He comes back here now with the Cobden medal, which should have been given to the hon. gentleman from Shell River (Mr. Boulton) because the premier is in fact, what he calls a revenue tariff man. I do not quite understand what he means by that. We have not had more than a revenue tariff for the last twenty years in this country. There is a great difference between a revenue tariff and a tariff for revenue only. If you impose a tariff for revenue only, you impose it where you get most money, but the object of the government should be to get a revenue and to encourage production in this country. You may call that incidental protection, if you like, or full protection. I am satisfied that is the true position for this country to take—to make and produce what we can for ourselves. I have said that wherever the government departed from the policy of their predecessors, they have gone astray. That is a pretty serious charge. I should like my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, who used to be the member for Bothwell in the House of Commons, and comes from a county that used to be a rich county, to explain how he bought corn at 10 cents a bushel. I understood him to say that it was corn in the cob. I want an explanation of that. What was the cause of its being sold at 10 cents a bushel. Was it damaged corn?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Will my hon. friend tell me how it came to be sold at ten cents a bushel?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I spoke about corn being shipped into Windsor for sale.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—In the cob?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—At ten cents a bushel?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, corn from the western states. My hon. friend from Essex (Mr. Casgrain), I dare say, knows the facts better than I do.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—I know the farmers bring it there in the cob. It is taken to the elevator and there shelled. It comes from the farmers, not from the States.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I do not care whether it is grown in Canada or the United States, it does not make any difference to me. It only shows that when the government put corn on the free list they brought the price down to ten cents a bushel. That is clear from the language of the Minister of Justice, that is what he told me.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is corn in the cob.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Yes, corn in the cob. A bushel of corn in the cob is 72 lbs. A bushel of shelled corn is 56 lbs. We know that, and the result of the present government departing from the policy of their predecessors is that the farmers all along the Erie shore, even from Sarnia to Fort Erie, and for fifty miles back in the country, have to sell their corn for ten cents a bushel.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And in the year before, 1895, it was the same.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The hon. gentleman can qualify it as much as he likes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is no qualification to it.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—That is one respect in which they departed from the policy of their predecessors. I suppose that is where they helped the farmer, and should have credit for it. My hon. friend, the mover of the address, says they should have credit for the help they give the people of the country. What help have they given them? None. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, speaking in Toronto, said: "We do not claim that we have been the means of raising wheat to a dollar a bushel, but it is coincident." I have a good memory. I remember several coincidences. I remember when the great Reform party was in power in the two provinces of Canada before confederation. I know we got the weevil in the wheat. I know that is a coincidence. We did not blame them for it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Oh, yes, you did.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I know that when they came to power in 1873 we got the potato bug and we have it yet. That is another coincidence. Last, but not least, we have the San Jose scale, and that is coincident too. But I do not blame them for it, because they are not responsible. They are just as responsible for these things as they are for having contributed to the prosperity of the country. What have they done to bring prosperity to the country? They have done nothing. They have increased the expenditure of the country from the time they came into power. They have violated all their pledges to the people, except in two instances, and those two instances have been ruinous to the country, and the people of this country to-day ought to return thanks that they did not carry out their pledges, because if they had they would have ruined the whole Dominion. What were their promises? They were going to reduce public expenditure. They were going to reduce the debt of the country. In place of that they are increasing the expenditure largely and increasing the debt of the country. My hon. friend from Shell River (Mr. Boulton) told us last year that the increase was three millions and a half. I have proved one instance in regard to corn.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I would like to ask who it is that uses the corn.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Farmers.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Distillers used a good deal of it formerly, but they use a great deal of imported corn now, because we have a duty on corn coming in for use in the distilleries and the farmers in some parts of the country buy it and mix it with their own and you cannot separate the home from the foreign grown grain. Take the counties along Lake Erie, they raise all the corn required in this country. The government have also put binder twine on the free list. I am an agriculturist and I have a good deal of farm land, and I will buy twine no cheaper this year because it has been put on the free list. If any one will think for a moment he will see that the harvest in the United States comes on before ours, and the United States manufacturers will supply that market. They will come here with what they have left—any twine that is manufactured in Canada they will put on this market and so we ought to have protection. The 12½ protection has not been too much. It would not cost the farmers any more in the end. And what has been the result. There are eighty men thrown idle at the city of Brantford. They cannot get a day's work, and I see a meeting was held by some of the bankers of this country and some of the people of this country and a delegation was appointed who waited upon this government trying to get them to reimpose the duty on twine. One man a banker, says: "As the matter now stands I cannot supply the money to go on," and so the people were idle. There are two instances showing that wherever the government departed from the policy of their predecessors they have gone astray. They may be going to do a great deal for us in the future. The promises are good but the practice is nil. As far as the railway is concerned, I shall not say very much about it. I will wait until I get that information which will compel me to support the Minister of Justice, because he has told us that if we knew all that he knows we would support him unreservedly. The only valid defence of this private contract is urgency. Why, have not they had a whole year to make their preparations? Last summer, when we left here, we knew pretty well what was in that country, and knew very nearly as much about it as we do to-day. But after parliament rose what did they do? They went through the country, decked beautifully in uniform, showing their titles. They went to Washington and other places, and now they come to parliament, and say they have made arrangements to build this road, and that they must observe secrecy about it. That will not satisfy me. Because if I were to support the Minister of Justice in that, I could not show my face before the people of this country. I always want to explain whatever I have done, and whatever position I have taken. They may do wonders, but I question it very much. They have had plenty of time, if they had chosen to apply themselves to it, and they are getting in a hurry all at once now. I listened to the speech of my hon. friend from Shell River yesterday, and I do not often agree—scarcely ever agree—with what he says, but I agreed with every word he said on this railway question, and disagreed with every word he said on everything else. I do not know very much about railway matters, particularly in the mountains. We will have to wait in order to see what this arrangement is, but we may have something more to say about this bill when it is brought down. I do not say what my course will be, but I feel with the information before us, that the Senate, no matter what the consequences may be, should reject it. Why should we allow these people to go back on their pledges? Why did they not do as they promised the people of this country? I say they have gone back on their pledges because they could not carry them out and it has been a blessing to the country that they could not. In this one case it will be a benefit to the country if we insist that they shall carry out their pledges. They got a verdict from the people on false pretenses and one of the false pretenses is that they approved of preferential trade with England; another was a promise of economy in all the public service; another was that all public contracts should be let by tender to the lowest bidder, and here they are swallowing their pledges one after the other, and they simply smile when they are brought to task for it. These gentlemen want credit for the prosperity of the country. I should like to know what they have done to give prosperity to the country. I have shown that they have increased the debt and destroyed the industries of the people of the town of Brantford and destroyed the agricultural interests of this country by putting corn on the free list.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—They passed the Alien Labour law.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I ask what have they done? Have they planted? Have they watered? Have they sowed? Have they harrowed? Have they weaved? Have they spun? No, sir, they have been running through this country revelling at the people's expense, and they have not done anything at all. They did not even attend to that tram railway over in the Yukon country, and they tell us now we should thank them for what they have done. I believe I have the reputation of telling people what I think of them. I prefer to tell them what I think before their face and not behind their back. I hope I shall always retain that courage, and all I can say is that I wish them well, but I hope their conduct in the future will be more acceptable to the people of this country than it has been in the past.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I am forced to take part in this debate because of a reply which I got a day or two since to a question which I put to the hon. leader of the government, that gentleman who, I understand, is familiarly known as the sage of Bothwell. How he came to acquire this cognomen, I do not know, except from the fact that he is a sage and that he comes from Bothwell. What a sage is, I am not prepared to say, but I suppose it is a gentleman who looks very wise and shakes his head wisely. I am not an iconoclast and I would be sorry to shatter the idol of the people of Bothwell but I would remind that hon. gentleman of a Latin quotation which his classical education no doubt will enable him to understand—nemo mortalium omnibus horis sapit, which being translated is, no mortal man, not even a sage, can be wise at all times. Now the truth of that adage was very well exemplified the other afternoon. If the hon. gentleman had these grave state secrets which he alluded to so mysteriously and did not wish to raise any question about them, he should have been wise enough not to have alluded to them. Having alluded to them, and being questioned, he should have adopted the plan not of setting down questioner by a caustic and, I think, rather rude reply, but the ordinary and usual diplomatic, parliamentary and sufficiently evasive mode which is usually adopted in dealing with those questions. By the time the hon. gentleman has occupied a little longer the position into which he has been pitchforked over the head of my friend the Secretary of State, he may be more parliamentary, more diplomatic and perhaps less discourteous, in trying to answer questions which are put to him upon subjects to which he has alluded. Now, when the hon. gentleman informed me that if I was not satisfied with the explanation that he had given with reference to the matter, I would be the only one in this House who would not be so, he may have thought he was perfectly correct. I choose to differ from him. I dare say that the explanation he gave was satisfactory to the gentlemen of his own party who sit around him, and who no doubt have been supplied with interior and private information which has been denied to us. Probably the hon. gentleman thinks that I belong to that number who rush in where angels fear to tread, or I would not have put this question to him; but as the question was put, and as the hon. gentleman did not see fit to reply to it, I think he will find that a great number of people, not only members of this House, but outside, in the press and the country at large, will be very anxious to know what are these very grave international complications to which he alluded. I understand the hon. gentleman himself has been hauled over the coals by members of his own party for bringing up and courting questions on this subject by alluding to matters which he could not afterwards give an explanation of. I think the hon. gentleman will find these questions, when they are brought up, very much like the ghost of Banquo they "will not down." and the explanation will have to be given, and that right soon.

I should like, while upon my feet, to say a few words about this railway contract, one of the most important matters of discussion which will come before parliament this session. I want to say personally that I am in favour of a railway being built which will be an all-Canadian route and which will provide us with the road that is so necessary to reach that country, but we have no proof that this road is an all-Canadian route; we are told to the contrary by the leader of the government and others; nor have we any guarantee that this road when built may not at any period be handed over to a foreign corporation or even to a foreign government, so as to pass entirely out of the control of the people of this country or of the contractors or anybody else in Canada. Now as this contract stands before the House, I may say that whether I am in accord or not with any other member of the conservative party I am opposed to it. I am opposed to it on various grounds. One is that the giving of this contract has violated every principle to which we have been for the past eighteen years educated by the liberal party, who have been always declaring that the giving of these contracts should be governed by public tender and awarded to the lowest party who offered. That has been the cardinal principle laid down; and I say that when at the inception of their rule in this country they violate that principle, it is right that we should condemn them. They say that it was necesary to do this, that haste made it necessary, that in order to save time they were obliged to take this course. Well, whose fault is that, whose fault is it that the position of the country and the government is as it is now with regard to this matter? If instead of their starring it in England and the continent last year, if instead of their looking after their jubilee honours and their decorations and their osculatory efforts to the Pontiff of Rome, and all those other matters on which they spent their time, they had been engaged then, as they are now, in trying to ascertain what the wants of the people in that country are, they would have been in a position to meet parliament, not with a crude and undigested measure like that brought down, but one which would give some information with regard to the subject matter which they had before them. Now, they bring down this contract, and the gentleman who introduced it has no information to give the House or the people of this country when questions are put, no estimates, no engineers' reports, nothing which would place the government in a position to give information which would certainly be sought for by the members who heard it introduced. They have no information whatever, not even the simplest that would be asked for by an individual, who was going to take up the most ordinary business transaction. I am opposed to it on other grounds—on account of the monopoly clause. Some people think that all right. I think the monopoly clause ought to condemn the transaction in toto. But more than that, I am opposed to the arrangement on account of the extraordinary and extravagant grant of land which has been given to Mr. Mackenzie and Mr. Mann. It has been arrogantly proposed to compare this road with the Canadian Pacific Railway with their four thousand miles of railway, a road which is not only a commercial but a political and military necessity, and which has been the means of binding together and making Canada the great country which she now is, and they compare with it this miserable little one hundred and fifty miles of tramway, and because large concessions were given to the former these should be given similar concessions with our eyes shut with regard to the latter. Now, it seems to me a most extraordinary thing that such a bargain should be made. I am satisfied that no contractors in the world could have come to the government and made a demand such as this contract shows. It must have been given by the government themselves, who put forward these enormous concessions and gave Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann such a contract with such concessions, as no one would think of asking, and which never has been done in any country before except in the case of the Panama Canal and some other matters which contained enormous provisions of this nature. They gave such exceptional advantages to Mackenzie & Mann that it seems to me they could not have demanded them, they are so different to what they do give to any other settlers who go into that country. Usually in granting lands of the Crown the government reserves the right of precious metals that are discovered thereon. To Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann they give not only the precious metals but all the baser metals. In their usual dealings, the settlers in the country find it very difficult to get the ownership of the land themselves, but Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann are given the full ownership of the land. From the ordinary miner the Crown exacts a royalty of ten per cent; from these great capitalists they exact a royalty of only one per cent. I wonder if any of you have ever taken into consideration the extraordinary area that is covered by the land grant to this company, an area of land between seventy and eighty miles long and the same in width. Contrast it with the area of some of the kingdoms of this world. This area of land is two and a half times the size of Prince Edward Island; it is nearly one-third the size of Vancouver Island; it is three-quarters the size of the principality of Wales; it is one and a quarter times as large as the colony of Jamaica; it bears comparison in area with many a European kingdom; it is one-half the area of the kingdom of Belgium; one-half the size of the kingdom of Holland; and it is one-third the size of the republic of Switzerland; it is about equal in area to the kingdom of Saxony, and it exceeds in area many of the important Grand Duchies of the German Empire and this vast domain which many a crowned head in Europe would envy, it is being handed over to these contractors as "boot," as a bonus in addition to extraordinary concessions which, of themselves alone, would make the contract a most favourable assset. There is an effort being made to belittle the value of the concessions given by this contract. I know that not only supporters of the government, but members of the government themselves, are going about and saying, "Why, it is perfectly startling the risk which these gentlemen run in taking hold of this contract without knowing more than they do about the country and what it contains," and they shake their heads like sages, because, I suppose, there are other sages in the government besides the one we have here, and say, "We would not like to be in the contract with Mackenzie & Mann." Would they not? I think there are very few of them that would not like to have a chance in it. If these gentlemen have any arrière pensée about the way they could realize at once on the concessions they have in that contract, I can put them on the track of a way of doing it without risk to themselves. They are entitled to nearly 4,000,000 acres of land. They do not take them broadcast nor necessarily along the line of railway, but they are allowed to select them by their own engineers and prospectors, and they have six years within which to take them and have them located. All they have to do is to take 3,000,000 acres of these lands, as soon as they are entitled to them, get out their maps, place them simultaneously in the cities and markets of the world, not at a high price, but at, say, $10 an acre. I would undertake to say that companies will be formed, syndicates formed while this Klondike boom is on, and men, women and children will want to have a stake, however small, in that great gold bearing region. With the land disposed of at that rate they would have $30,000,000 cash out of which they could pay the $3,000,000, or whatever this railway is to cost. Allowing them one or two million —one or two millions does not matter much in dealing with large figures for their expenses, and for the lubrication necessary to get this contract through—and they would have what is left? $25,000,000 in cash, and they would have one million acres of land more to select from, taking the very best in the country, and it might be of fabulous value; and they would have besides, the railway and its concessions and monopoly, out of which to make more than the thing is worth many times over. Take the words of Mr. Mann himself, while addressing the people of Vancouver or Victoria, in which he estimated that from 250,000 to 300,000 tons of freight would be carried over that road this year. See what the freight on that line would be worth? Enough to build the road over and over again. I should be sorry to throw out of the hands of Mr. Mann, (he is a friend of mine) such a chance to make a large fortune as he has here. I saw a quotation from Pope the other day in one of the local papers, in which it said, "the proper study of mankind is Mann." In view of the extraordinary concessions, which have been given to this gentleman, and which are supposed to place him in such a high financial position, I would suggest another quotation from Pope—"Mann never is but always to be blessed."

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I desire to say a few words on this important subject. My intention is to say very little at this stage of public business, and to follow the example of the mover of the address confine my remarks chiefly to the Stikine-Teslin Railway contract. With regard to the trade policy of the government, the leader of the opposition (Sir Mackenzie Bowell) has shown in a manner which cannot be controverted or denied, how divergent the crystallized acts of the government are from the protestations and assertions of its individual members when in opposition, free from the cares of state for 18 years when their words did not carry responsibility. There were three very important planks in the trade platform of the Liberal leaders—Commercial Union with the United States—which would shut British Commerce entirely out of Canada. Unrestricted reciprocity with the United States which would also have shut out British commerce. Free trade as in Great Britain. If the two first plans, or either of them, had been adopted by the country, where would British connexion be to-day? Dead and gone, and the United States in the ascendency dictating our policy.

The parties which held these ideas came into power, and with the responsibility of State affairs on its shoulders, did its leaders attempt to give effect to any of its previous opinions? No, they did nothing of the kind. What did they do? They paid the conservative government and party the highest compliment they could possibly pay, by adopting their trade policy and making it their own. I am quite satisfied with that line of action, and so is the country. The conservative policy was a wise one, and the Liberal government displayed a good deal of wisdom in adopting it. Before going into the most important question before us, I have a few words to say to the hon. gentleman from Shell River, who always gives us very interesting speeches on trade questions. The only fault I have to find with him is that he soars too high in ethics and the science of political economy.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—If you had to pay 45 cents for coal oil and $150 for a binder, you would view the trade question as I do.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—If the hon. gentleman came down to practical questions we could understand him, and his opinions and speech would be of great benefit to the country. The hon. gentleman is supposed to take up the cudgels for the farmers, but he will have to perform many surgical operations before he can get the idea into their heads that the more they sell and the less they buy, the poorer they will be. Supposing the hon. gentleman had, to-morrow, a credit in London of $1,000 as the proceeds of the sale of his wheat and cattle, and were to import $1,000 of goods that he did not require and no one else required, just for the sake of increasing the importation, he would increase the volume of the imports, but which would be best for him and for the country, to put that money in the bank or in some useful investment, or import goods that he did not want? I think it would be better for him and for the country to have the money than the goods he could not use or did not require.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Could I eat the money?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—Our policy in this country should be manufacture for ourselves and keep foreign goods out of the country as far as possible. My hon. friend asked the hon. gentleman from Monck a short time ago how it happened that the country was prosperous when we imported more than we exported. By that the hon. gentleman admitted that the protectionist policy which the country had pursued for 18 years was the proper policy for Canada, because the country was prosperous, but it upsets, to some extent, his free trade theory. I have another crow to pick with the hon. gentleman. Speaking yesterday he referred to British Columbia as though it were no part of Canada and complained that the government were trying to build up and enrich British Columbia as though it were doing so in a foreign country.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I rose to explain that this road was passing through the province of British Columbia which owned its own lands and mines, and that the government was taking the land and mines of the North-west Territories to pay for the construction of a road in the province of British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—British Columbia never asked for that road.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—If British Columbia does not want it, that is another thing.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—British Columbia never asked for a grant to the Crow's Nest Pass, and that is to-day of more benefit to this part of Canada and the North-west Territories than it is to British Columbia. All the labourers and supplies for it are going from this part of Canada. After it is built it will help to bring in supplies from the east to that mountainous country. It will be as much or of more benefit to this part of the Dominion than to British Columbia. But we are glad to see the road built. The province aided it by a grant of land, and did its duty in that respect. With regard to the Teslin and Stikine Railway, hon. gentlemen may not all know that this road is entirely in British Columbia. I do not know what steps the Dominion government have taken to get British Columbia to acquiesce in this road being built. They have given out a contract for a railway in British Columbia without a survey, and, I believe, without an application to British Columbia. The south end of Teslin Lake, where this road ends, is well within the territory of that province. I know there has been a local charter for a line over that route, but whether the government have taken up that, or the contractors have taken it up, I do not know.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I understood—I do not know whether I am right or not—that Mackenzie & Mann had secured that charter.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—If so, it is a different matter. I fully acknowledge the necessity of getting communication with that Klondike country as soon as possible, and am willing to give the government credit for what they have endeavoured to do in getting that route opened, but I wish they had adopted other measures. I speak more in sorrow than in anger when I refer to this question. When I heard of this land grant I could not believe it. Here is a country to which the attention of the whole world is attracted by its enormous wealth. It is not like ordinary farming land; this is a country as to which large expectations are held, not in Canada alone, but throughout the world. The government must have known that. They had the report of their engineers. They knew what was being done and surely they ought to have kept that rich heritage for this country. I cannot speak for this House, but I do not think they can possibly make up their minds to hand over that heritage to any company. It must belong to the people of Canada for ever. That is my view of the matter. I have no hesitation in saying that 5,000 acres in the Klondike country would be a vast grant, a grant with vast possibilities.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Per mile?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—In fact 500 acres of that country would be a vast thing. This company have the power to lay out their own base lines and select their own land grant on the banks of the rivers. There is no restriction placed on them.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Every line must be 24 miles in length.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Then, again, who is to administer that country? Who is to preserve law and order in this vast territory where the company have sovereignty and royalty? They are actually kings of that country. The royalty in the minerals and the lordship of the ground. In British Columbia if we sell a farm, anybody can go in and take up mines on it and you cannot mine on your own farm without taking out a license. Why is this rich country thrown away without any restriction in the public interest? Suppose to-morrow this company select so many thousand acres and after the selection is made, four or five hundred miners go in and are found working there, are the company going to turn these men out? It is impossible? It would take all the mounted police of the country to do so. They will not give up their mines if they are worth holding. There is great danger of conflicts as well as throwing away our heritage. If the land were safeguarded to the public I would not mind—if the company were bound to sell this land at the same price as contiguous government land; if miners were allowed to take up mines on the same terms as the government give, and a royalty were exacted, by the contrators, would not a royalty pay them in addition to the tolls on passengers and freight carried by the railway? If the government advertised to give the freight rates and tolls on that road to the company building it, I believe it would be built free of money or land. There will be enormous traffic on the line, which will recompense the company for building it. But, if in addition to that, the contractors could collect a royalty, and pay the government a portion for administering the country and preserving law and order, it would be a splendid bargain.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Supposing 100,000 people go into that territory during the coming season, does the hon. gentleman say it is of no consequence to have immediate communication?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—At a meeting in Victoria the other day, the people said that we would sooner lose all our trade and prospects than allow ourselves to be trampled on in this way by the United States government. What the government can do is this, they can stop all traffic at the Canadian boundary. If the United States authorities meet us with hostile regulations on the sea coast, we can do the same on our frontier.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Supposing the Americans were going in by Dyea and Skagway, how can you stop them at the boundary?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—They could be stopped, surely.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—You would require to have some one there to do it.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It would become an international question then. If Canada cannot carry out her own laws and regulations, she had better give up the country.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend makes a proposition which would practically have the effect of giving up the territory to adventurers from San Francisco and Seattle.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What has that to do with the improvidence of this bargain?

Hon. Mr MACDONALD (B.C.)—I think I have said enough to show that I am entirely opposed to giving this land grant and, as I say, I do not mind that if it is safeguarded. About the monopoly clause, I am opposed to that also, but I would favour giving the company control of a zone of 10 miles on each side of its line for its full length, within which no railway should be built by any other company for five years. I would allow other railways to intersect it, but that is all. But to prevent, as the contract does, the building of any other railway in there for ten years together, I say it is monstrous. I read it that way. I have only glanced at the contract in a very cursory manner. The leader of the opposition had it here, and I was not able to read it carefully but that is what I understand by it. At all events, to the principle of monopoly, this House I think, will be strongly opposed. I have an alternative scheme for the government's consideration. I believe if they were to ask the country for two or three millions of money to build that road they would say "yes take the money, build the road, keep the country to yourselves, do not throw away the mining country, it is your heritage, do not part with it." There would not have been the least trouble in this House or the other House. We know that the government of Russia carries on as a government work enormous mining operations in Siberia and other parts of the country by convict labour. Why cannot this government do the same thing? Remove the penitentiaries up to the Klondike country, and mine there as government work. Pay off the debt of the country with it. It is a feasible scheme. Why cannot it be done? There is a capital place for convicts up there. They would be very happy. Make them work and earn their living. I believe that scheme to be feasible, and one that would pay off the national debt of this country in a few years. But whatever is done this heritage, this three million seven hundred thousand acres of land must be kept for the Dominion of Canada and its people.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Before proceeding to discuss the principal points that have been touched on in this debate, I wish to offer my congratulations to the mover and seconder for the clear and able statements which they have made in discussing the answer to the speech. The two principal points that have been made, or endeavoured to be made, against the government are in reference to this Yukon contract and to the giving away of what is called preferential trade. In reference to the Yukon contract, which seems to be the pièce de résistance, there is a very large amount of misconception, and if hon. gentlemen were right and all that they assume were true, there would no doubt be a severe indictment against the administration, but I think I can explain away very many of the objections that have been urged against this contract. In the first place, hon. gentlemen will recollect that at the time we separated last year, in the month of June, no one had any idea that there was such wealth in the Yukon district as has been announced in the last few months of last year.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You must have been asleep.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I was not asleep. It was reported that gold was found, but it was not found in any such quantities as was reported in the months of October and November.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I beg your pardon.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is my recollection of it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We had specimens of it in the city in which I reside.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, we had specimens' some found on the west side of the hundred and forty-first meridian, and some on the east side, but no announcement that gold had been found in large quantities. The question of subsidizing a railway into that country was never dreamt of until about the end of the year or the beginning of the present year. Its necessity was not pressed upon the government. There were two charters obtained last session. The British-American Yukon Company, with a great flourish of trumpets, obtained a charter and were going at once to build a railway, and there was another charter to a company to build by Takul Inlet not very far from Juneau. We heard that the British Company was composed of great capitalists, that they intended building a railroad across the of White Pass. Some expenditure I believe was gone into. A preliminary survey was made, but beyond that nothing further was done. Subsequently it was reported—I do not know with what truth—that the charter was for sale. They found the difficulties so insuperable that they did not propose to go on with it. With regard to the company who were going to build the road by Taku, no action whatever was taken. It was quite open to those parties to make a proposition to the government if they felt they could not go on and complete the road without a subsidy, but they have made no proposal, and from time to time it was announced that a line would be constructed across the United States frontier to the Lynn Canal. That was found to be the shortest way to get into the country. One route is by the Yukon, which would be over four thousand miles from Victoria, and which may be described as an impossible and impracticable route except for a couple of months in the year: it involves transhipment at St. Michael's and a tedious voyage up the river of from thirty to forty days before reaching even the Canadian boundary. With all the attraction in the United States Alaska, only four small vessels succeeded in going up the Yukon last year. There was a comparatively small population last year, yet we know very well, from the reports recently received, that they are threatened with starvation, although two large wealthy companies endeavoured by every means in their power to force in supplies last year, the Alaska Company and the Yukon Company. Both Companies have their establishments at Circle City, Dawson and other ports. Yet the difficulties of getting in through that route were so great that even they failed to provide facilities for getting in the food that was necessary for the limited population that was in the Yukon territory. Those of us who have been reading the newspapers know of the difficulties from the head of the Lynn Canal. The Lynn Canal seems to be the shortest route to that country. The Lynn Canal is about 700 miles from Victoria. To pass into the British territory you have to cross a fringe of land which belongs to the United States. As hon. gentlemen know, the boundary line there is a subject of dispute, and very wide dispute, between the two countries. Hon. gentlemen who are desirous of seing the two boundary lines at that point can consult the map, and they will then observe the very wide difference of opinion that prevails in reference to the location of the boundary line along that coast. According to our contention, and according to our reading of the treaty of St. Petersburg, the United States territory running from Mount St. Elias southward is simply a fringe of the coast, as indicated by that white line on the map. In the treaty of St. Petersburg that fringe of coast was reserved for the Russian fishermen. It was not intended that they were to occupy the interior of the country from St. Elias southward. It was for their convenience; to land on the coast and dry their fish. The country, of course, has been from time immemorial practically an unknown territory. The Hudson Bay Company, and the North-west Company did not penetrate westward to the Pacific Coast, so that it has practically been an unknown land, and when Russia sold Alaska to the United States in 1866, the United States authorities encroached upon this land at various points, wherever there were inlets, and established posts. They practically took possession of interior sections of the country which did not belong to them. The reading of the treaty provided that from Mount St. Elias southward the line of demarkation between the two countries should be governed by the ridge of mountains that runs along the coast, but in no case was the line to go further back than ten marine leagues

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—From what?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—From the windings of the coast. The words are "the windings of the coast." The interpretation put upon that by the United States authorities has been that wherever there is an inlet it is a winding of the coast, and there are a great many inlets along that coast. I suppose the Lynn Canal runs up thirty-five or forty miles. According to their contention t at is regarded as one of the windings of the coast. They say there is no well defined mountain land or height of land to the westward of it, and that consequently ten marine leagues must be counted from the head of the Lynn Canal. That would throw their boundary very much further into what we claim is Canadian territory.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I thought Mr. Ogilvie and the gentleman from the United States who were surveying two or three years ago had almost agreed within two or three feet.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is on the 141st meridian. Under the treaty the fringe of coast extends up to the 141st meridian. The 141st meridian is believed to intersect the apex of Mount St. Elias, and for convenience it was arranged between the two countries that the apex of Mount St. Elias should be the starting point until the meridian was intersected. In 1885, when Mr. Ogilvie was despatched to that country with instructions to locate the line, no arrangement had been made with the United States. I do not go over the succeeding years, but subsequently negotiations were entered upon with the United States, and they appointed a commission. They sent officers who were to ascertain the true meridian, the 141st degree west longitude, at prominent points: that is where it intersected the rivers, where it intersected the Yukon and the Porcupine, and Forty Mile Creek, and other prominent points. Mr. Ogilvie during the last two or three years—I believe since 1895—was engaged in that service, and the United States commission also attended there. The honourable gentleman from Victoria is quite right in saying that there was but a slight difference between Mr. Ogilvie and the United States engineers at the Yukon River. Practically there can be no dispute about that, as I understand. The difference would be only a few feet. The line has been cut for a considerable distance on each side of the river. It has not been cut through ; it was not considered necessary, because it would probably involve a very large sum. So that in reference to that portion of the line of demarcation between the two countries, there ultimately will be no difficulty. It is a matter purely of mathematical demonstration as to the location of the 141st meridian, and therefore there will be no dispute on that subject, but as to the boundary along the coast, there necessarily must be a reference to an independent tribunal to define the words of the treaty to which I have adverted—that is the treaty made between Russia and Great Britain in 1885—because it is open to a very wide interpretation as to what is the meaning of the range of mountains along the coast, and what is the meaning of the windings of the coast from which, in the absence of a range of mountains the ten marine leagues are to be calculated. No doubt under the best arrangements and most friendly feeling between the two countries where there are ambiguous words in a treaty, there can be no fairer way of deciding an important question of that kind than by such a reference. That it is a very important question to Canada, no one at the present moment can deny. Our approach to our own country, practically, at the present, must be through this United States strip of territory. It would take a very long time to reach it if you were to ascend north from British Columbia. There are, as far as I am advised, at present no ocean ports below the end of this range of territory. As my hon. friend from Victoria stated, the line starts from the southern point of the Prince of Wales Island, which island then belonged to Russia and now to the United States, and the line, according to our reading of the language of the treaty, went north through the channel to the east of the Prince of Wales Island. According to the United States reading, although it is a departure from the language of the treaty, to carry out their contention the line would have to come practically east or rather south of east in order to reach what is called Portland Canal. The whole difficulty arises from the fact that there was not a Portland Canal at that time. There was, in the opinion of those who have given a great deal of study to the question, also a channel considerably to the north of it known as the Portland Channel. That name unfortunately was dropped after the treaty of St. Petersburg. Of course very little attention was given to that country for more than half a century. In the meantime, the United States construed Portland Canal to mean Portland Channel, and they adopted a line running to Portland Canal. To reach Portland Canal, as I have said, you must proceed south of east, and then as the treaty says the dividing line is north to the head of Portland channel to the 56th degree of north latitude. From the 56th degree of north latitude it is governed entirely by the other words of the treaty which provide that the range of mountains along the coast shall be the boundary line, subject only to the condition that where the range of mountains was further off, the ten marine leagues should be the absolute limit of the Russian territory. Honourable gentlemen will understand that in order to readily get into that country it was necessary to pass through the United States boundary. As the hon. gentleman from Victoria knows, in November and December, when crowds of people were attracted by the rumors of gold in the Yukon, the people of Seattle and Portland, and San Francisco put a pressure, no doubt, upon their representatives to insist upon terms and conditions for crossing their territory, which became exceedingly oppressive and onerous. It became a matter of negotiation, and here I may say that my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, in answering the question of the hon. senator from Brandon, (Mr. Kirchhoffer) was I think guilty of no discourtesy, and I am quite sorry if my hon. friend has so misconstrued it. He stated that there were a number of subjects connected with this that could not be made public. He must recognize that where two powers are discussing a delicate subject of this kind it does not help the ultimate arrangement of it if all the details should be given to the public. It is very well known—and my hon. friend from Victoria particularly knows—the serious embarrassment that was thrown in the way of Canadians and of all foreigners who had purchased their goods in Canada, who sought to cross that fringe of country. It was practically taking away from Canada her trade, if persons were compelled to pay the duty to the United States after having purchased the goods in Canada although they were simply transporting their outfit across a few miles of territory. That was the condition, and so a short time before parliament met matters had reached that delicate point when we felt that if we were going to secure any portion of the trade of that country in the year 1898, it was absolutely necessary that no longer should there be any delay in the construction of some line of railway which would enable persons to go in through British territory. There was no other route possible available, except the Stikine. The Edmonton route has been spoken of. To build a line by that route, even to the waters that are reached by the route over which the contract has been given, would have involved probably a year and a half, or two years. We believe a very large number of people are going into that country this year. Unless there is some better avenue by which food can be transferred to Dawson, it will be simply impossible for one-tenth of the number who propose going there to get in.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Would it not be better to keep them out?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My hon. friend may be quite right, but we would get the benefit of any increase of population in that country. There is no doubt that a considerable number of those who go in, will buy their supplies in Canada. They will afford traffic to our railways. Already the merchants at Montreal, Toronto, Victoria and other points, as we see by the press, are reaping enormous benefits from fitting out expeditions for that country. Merchants are making special arrangements to put up kits for the trip and we feel the benefit of it. That has been done for a large number of people from England and other European points, and the woollen mills in Canada are working night and day turning out goods a large proportion of which are destined for the Yukon country. It meant simply a sacrifice of all those interests unless some better way was secured for obtaining access to that country than existed at that time. Speaking of the Edmonton route, to which some hon. member referred a day or two ago, I may say on 4th September last, with a view of ascertaining whether that Edmonton route was a feasible route—I wish the hon. gentleman from Shell River (Mr. Boulton) to listen to this particularly—an expedition started from Edmonton, consisting of a body of mounted police, with engineers, to take observations and report on the character of the country. On the 10th December, three months after, they had only travelled about 600 miles. I asked Mr. White to-day where he last heard of them, and he said the last he heard of them, was at Fort Graham. They had all the support they needed. They had their horses and dogs all the paraphernalia necessary for an outfit in order to go through that country with despatch, yet they got no further than Fort Graham on the 10th December. We know very well that persons who left on the Pacific coast in October have gone as far as Skagway and Dyea, and many of them are in camp between Skagway and Dyea, or else between those places and some of the waters in the interior, and unable to get on. We know, as a matter of fact, that it has cost sixty cents to a dollar a pound to transport the food supplies and stores north of the Lynn Canal, and many persons after they had paid that high rate to get across that Pass found they could not get any further and remained there. There are thousands of people who are now between the Lynn Canal and the inland waters in the Canadian territory, unable to get on. Surely no person could be better equipped than Major Walsh, with all the power of the government behind him in order to assist him to get into that country rapidly, because it was of the highest importance he should get in rapidly, but it was impossible, the physical obstacles were so serious. Judging by the existing condition of things in the older provinces of Canada, no one can comprehend what the obstacles are, and in the face of those difficulties and of the necessity in the interests of the people of this country that food supply should go in there this year,—because if 50,000 people go up there this year and 25,000 remain, how are those 25,000 to be fed next winter—will it not be discreditable to this country, with the knowledge that the congress of the United States, in view of the reports made to them that miners were starving in that country and that there would be great loss of life, voted $200,000 in order to purchase food to be sent to that country, chiefly for United States miners? There is no incident in history that can at all compare with that. That of itself furnishes the best possible proof of the absolute necessity for prompt action being taken.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Is Major Walsh on the line of this proposed railway?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, he is down very much further according to last accounts.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Will the railway remove the obstacles which are stopping him?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No; what this railway will do will be to enable the stores that are brought up to Glenora to be moved on to waters that will carry the stores down to Dawson. That is what this 150 miles of railroad will do. It will remove unlimited amounts of stores for that 150 miles, which was the difficult portion to be got over. I understand four steamers are now being built in the city of Toronto, in connection with this railway project, for the purpose of enabling them to carry stores from the mouth of the Stikine up to Glenora.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Is not Major Walsh at the waters that these steamers are to navigate upon?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, he is much further down.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—He has to pass that route. On the road to Dawson the supplies have to pass the same difficulties he is contending against.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, but there is this peculiarity about it, that the upper waters of the Yukon and the tributaries of the Yukon are open and free from ice about six weeks earlier than the ice leaves the Yukon opposite Dawson. The ice does not get out of the Yukon River towards its mouth until the month of June. The first steamers that will ascend the Yukon will not reach the international boundry before the month of July, and if the people who are threatened with starvation at Dawson and Circle City and other points, were relying on the Yukon vessels to relieve them, they would be for two months without food, because steamers on the Yukon would not reach Dawson before the month of July, but reaching Dawson from the south, I am advised that towards the end of May the ice breaks up on the upper waters and the boats will go down with the ice. Some hon. gentlemen suppose that in that country it is possible to travel in winter. Any hon. gentlemen who were present at Mr. Ogilvie's lecture last night, will have had that view removed from their mind. According to the pictures that he showed us, which were absolute photographs—they were thrown by limelight on canvas—it was impossible to travel on the ice. He cited as an instance where a party wishing to make great speed, took three days to make nine miles. He said it was impossible to travel along the banks and on the river the ice had been thrown up in sections, and in that way you had simply to cut a trail through the ice before you could secure a passage. So that hon. gentlemen will see that the only way to get relief into that country was the course taken by the government. Hon. gentlemen are quite right in saying that the policy of the government, has been that no contracts, particularly of this magnitude, should be given out without public tender, and it was a great wrench when we had to ignore that principle, but we felt in the public interest there was no alternative for it. There were very few contractors in this country that had the plant and the capacity and the ability to undertake that work and put it through in so a short time. To build 150 miles of road in Ontario, or in some of the other provinces, with money and with materials ready at hand would be a very easy matter; but to built 150 miles of railway up in that country, and to encounter the difficulties that I have, in some measure, described in order to get your materials there is a very serious matter indeed. In addition to that they undertook to make a winter route along the Stikine River within six weeks. That winter route would be open to everybody to come in. Persons can leave now and be sure of access up to Glenora on the winter road.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Without interference by the United States authorities.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, yes. In speaking of the treaty with Russia, I should have mentioned one of the other features of it which is quite important. In the original treaty between Great Britain and Russia, in 1825, there was an express stipulation for all time to come, the words are "for ever" —that all the streams crossing Russian territory were to be free and open on equal terms to the people of both Russia and Great Britain. It was not simply the privilege of using the rivers for commercial purposes, it was an absolute right or equal interest in those rivers that Russia then had, and that was the position of matters down to 1866. Why it was that Great Britain or Canada made no protest at that time when the United States purchased Alaska with this provision which was guaranteed by Russia, and which was a part of a solemn treaty, and why it was not made also a part of the treaty between the United States and Russia when the sale took place, I am unable to explain. I know not who was to blame for it, or why attention was not called to it. Subsequently, in 1871, in the Treaty of Washington, provision was made that Canada should have the right of navigation for commercial purposes of the Yukon and the Porcupine and the Stikine, but hon. gentlemen will notice that that is a very much more limited interpretation of the terms of the original treaty than the language of the treaty itself. I do not know who is to blame, if any one is to blame, for all this omission, but there is the fact. The original treaty is clear and plain which gave us an equal interest in those rivers. Our interest now is somewhat restricted. We use those rivers simply for commercial purposes, as the United States use the St. Lawrence. As I said before, there were two companies incorporated to build railways from the coast: neither of those companies made any overtures or proposals to go on with the work. A gentleman representing a very wealthy English syndicate, Mr. Kersey, who had sent persons up into the section between the Stikine and Teslin Lake in order to examine the country with a view of building a railway, announced that this company were going to put steamers on the Stikine and on the waterways between the Stikine and Dawson and the Yukon River. After getting his reports, I understand he went to England a few months ago to confer with the people whom he represented. He returned to this country four weeks ago but made no direct proposition to the government. He did express, unofficially a desire to secure the contract for the building of a railway, but he said that the company, in addition to any land grant, would require a money subsidy. We did not feel that it would be advisable or prudent to give a money subsidy. We know how uncertain mining interests are. For the present, while marvellous wealth has been found to exist in the Klondike and in Bonanza Creek, and in three or four other creeks in that region, there was no certainty that that extended over the whole territory, and therefore we hesitated about giving a money subsidy. We probably should have been censured, if we had done so, by the very gentlemen who say "Oh it would be much better to give a money subsidy than the land." We said "if this railway can be built without putting the people of Canada to any great expense it should be built." A land subsidy does not involve taxing the people. Hon. gentlemen regard it now as a valuable heritage. Two years ago they did not regard it as of any value, because it has no value unless it has a mineral value. It is simply bare rocks that have no possible value except for the minerals beneath the surface, and therefore we felt that if the road could be built and the country opened up by a land subsidy we should be amply justified in granting it. There were no contractors—I say it without any hesitation—that were superior to those men. They knew something about the country and knew where to lay their hands on bodies of men and plant. They were prepared to do the work and do it instantly, and put up a forfeit of a quarter of a million if they did not. There were not many men in Canada who would undertake to do that. They wanted a large land subsidy and a money subsidy as well, but we said "it cannot be done; we will not give you a money subsidy, we will not take the peoples money to develop that place yet; it is too uncertain a a thing." It may be a good thing and we hope it will for the country but we cannot at present draw any such conclusion.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Why did you not take the land from the province of British Columbia?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We would have to confer with the province of British Columbia first. British Columbia has offered large quantities of land for a road built through this belt. The Crow's Nest Pass Company had a charter since 1884. It was known it was going through 250,000 acres of coal land, and yet you could not get a dollar on that charter. It was talked about year after year, and finally taken up by the C. P. R. Company.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—Where ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In British Columbia, and my hon. friend from Victoria will set me right if I am wrong, the last time I looked it up there were several charters leading in different directions to which a subsidy of 20,000 acres per mile was attached. No doubt about that at all ; and, therefore, there was nothing extraordinary about our giving a subsidy in that way. Now as to the crucial point, which is the land, hon. gentlemen have said we have allowed this company to select the lands as they please. I deny it at the very outset. I say if we had allowed this company to select their lands as they pleased they probably would have undertaken to build the road for 100,000 acres.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Has the hon. gentleman the contract in his hand ? If so, will he please read the clauses referring to it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Where the gold has been found in that country, as probably hon. gentlemen know, is in creeks with very little water, creeks that are practically dried up ; they are called gulches. The mining licenses have been issued across those gulches : they are usually a couple of hundred feet wide, the limit of width I think is 250 feet, and the precious metal is found in that narrow space. Hon. gentlemen will see by the plan on the Table, that if the contractors want to take up blocks of land along a gulch, they place a stake at one end of the gulch, and at a distance of 24 miles in the direction of the gulch they place another stake ; a straight line is then run from one point to the other.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Who selects the gulches ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They have the right to go and select anywhere ; they then take a block of land extending three miles on either side of this centre line. That makes a block of land six miles one way by three miles the other, the government reserving the alternate block. For instance : they run out 24 miles, that would consist of eight blocks. The contractors would take blocks 1, 3, 5 and 7 ; the reserve would be 2, 4, 6 and 8, which would be open to free miners, or to such an arrangement as the government might please.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Have not they the right to take an even numbered block on each side of their odd numbers ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No ; where they have the odd numbered block they can extend their block out to three ; then the government would be retaining the corresponding blocks on each side, so it is practically carrying out the alternate system. That block of land represents 46,000 acres that those gentlemen would get ; the whole valuable part of that block would probably be about eighty to one hundred acres, the rest is not worth looking at ; it consists of mountains of rocks, and gold is not found in the mountains. There may be quartz mines, but that does not extend everywhere. At present the gold is found in the little creeks along the gulches, so that eighty to one hundred acres is all the value there would be in the 46,000 acres. When you boil it down it amounts to very little, that is, as far as the gulches are concerned. Now I will answer my hon. friend from Shell River (Mr. Boulton) who said we were giving to these men one-half the country. The extent of the gold zone there, as stated by Mr. Ogilvie, consists of a belt 500 by 300 miles. He estimates it at 125,000 square miles. It is rather more than that.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Is not a portion of that in British Columbia ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, that is outside—all north of the 60th parallel. Now, that represents, working it out carefully, eighty odd million acres, so hon. gentlemen will see this company in getting 3,750,000 acres, receive a very small fraction of the whole country.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—But the choice.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, the choice ; but we retain the other half.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—About one-half of the mineral lands.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We cannot estimate that. I would not undertake to contradict my hon. friend, because we cannot form any estimate ; neither he nor I can. According to Mr. Ogilvie, there would be a great deal more, because there are a great number of streams. Although the Klondike is a comparatively small stream, I suppose already they have found gold on probably ten or twelve different tributaries of the Klondike; the Bonanza Creek is a tributary, and there is a tributary to that creek. The best lands, no doubt, are in the gulches—that is, the richest mines ; if they take the quartz mines I do not suppose any one would grudge them their lands, because they have to employ a large amount of labour to work them ; they have to bring in expensive machinery, and it is very seldom that a high royalty is exacted on quartz mining. In the province of British Columbia, where they put on as large a royalty as locations would bear, on the best mines, the royalty is only two per cent. In Alaska, across the boundary from our territory, there is no royalty at all ; in California there was no royalty. So it is rather an innovation on this continent. I think in Nova Scotia they have two per cent royalty, certainly on this continent there has been no higher royalty charged except by this government. We did it for this reason, because we thought here were certain localities that were going to yield very rich results, and it would stand a much higher royalty. But in this connection, hon. gentlemen must bear this in mind, that the man who takes up one of those 250 feet claims is not charged any royalty until he has made a pretty good thing out of it. He has to get $2,500 each year before he pays any royalty. He is exempt to that extent. Then in granting licenses for sub aqueous mining where you have to put in plant, there is an exemption for every five miles of $15,000 that a miner has to get out before it is called upon to pay royalty.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—What month was this ten per cent royalty put on by the government ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think the Order in Council was passed before November or December last. We were unable to get any official reports from that country. There were six or eight months that we could not hear from Mr. Ogilvie, until Mr. Sifton met him when he went up in November and December, and we had not had his report. Mr. Ogilvie was snowed up there in the winter of 1896, and there were no communications. Of course there were men coming out from there who gave us those rumors of large finds ; they came out in order to get provisions, because they could not exist any longer, but so far as official information is concerned, we were unable to obtain it, and I think it was only in the month of October or November that the facts were known.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD(B.C.)—Did the hon. gentleman see the report of Mr. Ogilvie, that he found ore giving $100 to the ton ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The Alaskan mines only yield from five to seven dollars a ton.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, of course there are much richer mines higher up in Alaska. As far as the quartz mining is concerned, individual enterprise can accomplish nothing. It will require companies with very large capital. The effect on this country will be very great, and it can only be developed by large syndicates undertaking the work. The result will be that Canada will derive a very great benefit from it. The supplies for that country will have to go from Canada, and we know consumption in mining claims is very large relatively per head to the consumption of the country generally. With reference to my hon. friend's question, I may say that I find the regulations were only approved on the 18th of January of this year. We had, I think, passed an Order in Council in August or September making a scale, but that was disapproved of when we sent it up to the officials—that is, making a scale for the poorer mines to pay a less royalty and the richer ones a larger royalty. I hold now in my hand an Order in Council under which the regulations were framed, and it is dated the 18th of January. That will show what the gulches are like. You will see that the real value in these six miles across, if they take up their claims along a stream, is confined probably to 200 feet ; outside of that there will be nothing but rock, wholly valueless. In addition to lines along the gulch, or stream, or river they have the right to mark a post down at any point, but if they do they must run at least 24 miles and they must run on a direct line north and south and east and west.

Mr. McMILLAN—Why give them that large quantity of land if it is valueless? Why not call it a small amount?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My answer is that we know so little about it that in making a contract with the railway company, I suppose, it adds to their credit very considerably to have a large area; there is no doubt about that, and they will no doubt represent that a large amount of this land must be absolutely valueless, but it would not be proper for us to undertake to give them absolute choice of taking up mining lots as free miners take them up. Free miners take up 250 feet, but when they do take up 250 feet they have something valuable, something that is worth working, but when a contractor takes up 250 feet he has to take six miles across so he has to take a very large amount of no value.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is impossible to know whether it is of any value or not.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We know very well the bare rocks themselves alongside of the streams are not valuable. Now taking up the contract, which I hold in my hand, the line is to be a narrow gauge road. There is no doubt an objection to that, but if that country proves of the value that we hope it will, we believe that this road will be extended down to intersect the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Where?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—At some point in British Columbia, Ashcroft or Revelstoke. From what I have read of Cariboo and Cassiar, and the section between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the 60th parallel, which is the boundary of British Columbia, I believe that before many years you will get a company to build a railway there for a land grant, directly north, to connect with this road if the Yukon country is to prove ultimately of the value that we hope it will. In this contract the contractors have no monopoly. One of the conditions demanded was, "you must allow us to build to Lynn Canal." We said "no, we are face to face now with a very serious difficulty in crossing that fringe of country; we cannot undertake to allow railroads to be built across that to intercept Canadian trade. Unless we get some satisfactory arrangement with our neighbours in reference to the bonding privilege, it would be impossible to foreshadow what might be the result, and therefore we will not allow you to build along that country, and we will not grant a charter to anybody else for five years. We will, at all events, take five years in order to make up our minds what is best to be done." There is no monopoly there that any hon. gentleman in this chamber does not approve of, and I am quite sure that every hon. gentleman who has given any study or thought to the difficulties we have had in getting across this fringe of country must realize the difficulties under which we labour; my hon. friend from Victoria has had a personal experience of it. Why, during October, November, December and January, long telegrams were coming constantly from the government of British Columbia, from merchants and the Board of Trade in British Columbia and other points, begging our interference to enable traffic to cross there, asking that we shou'd put difficulties in the way of foreign travel in our own country unless concessions were made to us. It would take me a considerable time to explain the obstacles and difficulties we have had to contend with in that matter. We hope now they are practically settled and we think they are. But, in the meantime, it would not be a wise policy on the part of Canada to grant a charter and give any assistance to build a road through the disputed territory. No one would approve of that.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That is what this contract does.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It does it precisely, but subject to Order in Council.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What we said was this: unless you get the consent of the Governor in Council we will not allow any other road to be built there.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The contract allows it to be built.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman will see the wisdom of our policy. There are, at the present time, two charters across that territory. If they attempt to build, then we should permit those contractors to build. If they do not attempt to build, we will allow no one else to build during the five years, but it is not likely the holders of the present charters will build. If they do, then it will be open to any one to build. What we do provide is that there shall be an extension southward to a point that is indisputably in Canadian territory, and that we will give the preference to those contractors if we are extending any aid to a company to make that connection.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—For ten years.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. I think that before that time there will be a line built from Ashcroft or some point in British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Or Edmonton.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Of course, the Edmonton route will not interfere with the present proposal. It may be found to be a feasible route. It is a 1,600 mile route, but for four or five hundred miles there is very fine land which, at all events, will furnish food for the people—good grazing land and good wheat land, so there are attractions attached to the Edmonton route, although it will take some considerable time to build it. They have the ten years as a preference only. It is open to any one to build. Any one can now build a road through any part of British territory to that country. There will be no interference with any charter that is granted by parliament to build a line to that country through British territory. This Company has no exclusive privilege whatever.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Unless you vote money or lands.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If we give money or lands to the company building from the Stikine River southward, and they undertake to do it as low as any other company, we will give it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You are obliged to give them the preference.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, but they must be willing to build as low as any other company will build it. The snow roads and shelters are valuable because they enable any one to go in at once by the Stikine River. They must continue the road down to Teslin Lake. They are also bound to put on steamboat connection with Dawson. That will be done without any doubt. The security I need not discuss. The grant as I have already explained very fully, is 25,000 acres per mile, to be selected in the manner I have already explained. I shall be very glad indeed to give any further explanation on that point if hon. gentleman desire it. The company must take up half their lands within three years and the other half within six years. It practically means nothing. If there is any value in the country they will want to take up their lands as soon as possible. It is not like agricultural land; it is only mineral land, and the contractors will be anxious to secure their tract as early as they have earned it. There are certain rivers reserved, the rivers which form the water connection between Lake Teslin and the Yukon and some other larger streams. The banks are excepted; 25 feet on each side, so that parties can use the river and there will be no interference with navigation. Any miners taking up locations, before the contractors blocks are actually staked out on the ground, are exempt, and the contractors have to recognize those and give them all facilities for crossing and recrossing portions of their lands. As to the royalty, I have already explained that the highest royalty outside of the Klondike region in any part of Canada is two per cent.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Will they have power to charge a royalty of ten per cent to any parties leasing lands from them?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They can do as they please. There will be this advantage, however, in having a wealthy syndicate interested in taking up those lands—the syndicate will explore the country. The cost of examining that country is very large, indeed—it is very expensive getting about. The time within which it can be done each year is limited to a couple of months, and the effect of interesting large capital in securing mining rights in that country will be that they will have experts in the country endeavouring to find the best locations. When they have found the best places, half the locations are to be open to the free miner, and the free miners can follow the experts.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is, the government blocks are open to free miners?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Is not the company likely to take advantage of the prospecting done by the 100,000 people now scattered over the country, instead of employing experts?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is open for them to do that. Of course they will do the best they can in that country. If the free miners can get a better location by following the company's experts they will do so. Within a few yards of the streams which have proved so rich we have had miners examining the country the last fifteen years. Mr. Ogilvie was there in 1885 with his party. Miners were in that region years ago finding gold here and there in comparatively small quantities, making what they called a grub stake, merely a living, and the rich deposits have only recently been struck. So, hon. gentlemen will appreciate at once the difficulties which the miners encounter in locating a valuable site. It involves a good deal of labour to get down where the gold is. In many instances they have to cut down through ice and frozen earth, a distance of eighteen, twenty or twenty-five feet, and after a man has given a month to an investigation of that kind, if he fails it is a serious matter for him. If experts who are employed by wealthy syndicates are engaged in that work, you can be quite sure that their discoveries will enure to the great body of the people, because the great mass of the miners there, if the experts find anything good, will at once flock in and take up claims on the intermediate sections. They have the run of three miles of country on each side of the company's sections, so there is a public advantage in enlisting a wealthy syndicate in making the discoveries that we hope to make from time to time in that country. There is a provision with reference to farm lands, but I am not aware that there are any farm lands in that country. There is a provision that after ten miles are completed the contractors can make a selection of a limited quantity. That quantity is limited to 92,000 acres, to be selected in the way I have described, and as they finish each ten miles a similar quantity. It is not to be supposed that the road is to be finished this year up to the standard which we recognize for our railways, and therefore the selection of the great bulk of their lands will be thrown over for another year, so that the free miners will have practically all the advantages of the present year in making their selections. In reference to the rates, the rate is fixed in the first instance. No doubt conditions have to be considered, and it will be for the government to say what will be a reasonable rate to start with. That rate will be from time to time cut down until ten years is over --I think that is the limit they have—and then it comes under the general railway law of the country. Then, where hydraulic mining is concerned, the company do not control the water. The water will be reserved and distributed to all parties interested, under the direction of the Minister of the Interior. As it is near six o'clock I move that the debate be adjourned.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—With the permission of the House I will read an item which has just appeared in this evening's Journal. It is headed as follows :—

GOLD ! GOLD ! GOLD !

FIFTY THOUSAND DOLLARS PICKED UP IN ONE DAY.—A SEEMINGLY RELIABLE DISCOVERY IN ALASKA.—VANCOUVER MERCHANTS ASKED TO GIVE AWAY THEIR BUSINESS AND HASTEN TO THE NEW ELDORADO, WEST OF THE INTERNATIONAL BOUNDARY.—FOUND IN THE CREVICES OF THE ROCKS.

These are the rocks which, we hear, have no value.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is west of the international boundary.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—I am not saying that it is in our territory, but it is in that locality. The following is the despatch :—

Vancouver, B.C., Feb. 10.—A fabulous find is recorded to-day on Unknown Creek on the American side in the Yukon territory. Fritz Behnson, of Victoria, B.C., writes his brother Karl: "We have struck it rich on Unknown Creek across the border, never before seen by man. In the crevices of the rock in one day we picked up $50,000 in coarse gold. Sell your business or give it away and come quick with ten men."

The Behnson's have large business interests here and are thoroughly reliable. The news spread like wildfire, and a stampede to the American side will result as soon as the locality is located.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is in United States territory. We have also something on our side. The following is another despatch in the same paper :—

STRUCK IT RICH.

Vancouver, B.C., Feb. 10.—Information just brought down from Dawson is to the effect that A. W. McConnell, who left Vancouver August last, reached Dawson on October 1st, has struck it rich in the Klondike, making from $75 to $100 per day.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate then adjourned.

THE SENATE.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

CROW'S NEST PASS RAILWAY STOCK.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON rose to inquire :—

Has the Canadian Pacific Railway Company applied to the Government for authority to increase its capital stock on the Crow's Nest Pass Railway under the authority of the Act of 1893, which requires the sanction of the Government thereto? Has the Government any knowledge of preference shares being issued under the authority of the same Act but which does not require the sanction of the Government, or bonds being issued under the authority of the charter giving the company power to build branch lines?

He said :—The object of the inquiry I wish to make of the government to-day is in regard to the construction of the 320 miles of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway for which a bonus of $3,500,000 was given by the country last year. Under their original charter power was given to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to build branch lines and also to issue, I think, $20,000 per mile bonds upon any branch lines they may build. They have, in addition to that, the power to issue preferential shares by the Act of 1893. The power is conferred by clause 37 of its charter in respect to preferred stock, and it is provided that the aggregate amount of any such stock shall not be more than half of the stock outstanding. That is what is called preference shares and for which they obtained the power to issue bonds. They issued an amount of bonds when the Act was passed, and last year there was another issue of five or six million dollars. They have the power to issue that without coming to the government, and in addition to that they have the power to increase their capital stock without coming to parliament.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not like interrupting the hon. gentleman, but I think a moment's reflection will suggest the impropriety of going on with that motion until after the address is adopted. It is always looked upon as an act of discourtesy to a governor, or to the government if you like, to do any business until the address is adopted, which is an evidence of the confidence of the people in the administration which asks its approval. I assure my hon. friend that it is not with any intention of preventing him from going on with his motion, but I think we had better adhere as nearly to the precedents of parliament as possible. I call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the matter.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I notice that on the Order paper my hon. friend's question stands before the Orders of the Day. There is no doubt a great deal of force in what the hon. gentleman says, and if the question were simply put as an inquiry without any speech or discussion, there might not be any objection, but my hon. friend is making a speech upon it.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I do not propose to make a speech.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is a good intention, but my hon. friend has not been acting upon that intention, and that being the case, I feel there is a great deal of force in what my hon. friend opposite says. I do not know that it is a strict rule, but each House claims the right to submit bills and to give such notices with a view of maintaining their rights as distinct branches of parliament as against the Crown. But what my hon. friend says is no doubt perfectly consistent with the settled usage of parliament that we ought to deal with the address before we take up matters which are questions of very considerable importance.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The point referred to by the Minister of Justice to my mind has no force: that is, that the motion stands before the Orders of the Day. If the hon. gentleman will look at the Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons he will find some fifteen or twenty such motions. I know that there is no rule, but we are governed by precedent, and no one knows better than my hon. friend that the British constitution is based upon precedents almost entirely. If you could go on with these motions here, and they could go on with such motions in the House of Commons, you might delay the passage of the address in answer to the speech from the throne indefinitely.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, perhaps till the end of the session. There is no doubt about that, and therefore there is very great convenience in the practice which my hon. friend has referred to.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—There was a case in point which occurred during the time Sir John Abbott was leader of the House; I think it was the year he came here from the House of Commons. He introduced some measure before the debate on the address was over, but withdrew it on the representation that that was contrary to the usual practice of the House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is no urgency, I suppose.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I have not the slightest objection to let the notice stand until after the adoption of the address. I was called upon by the Speaker to make my motion, and the printed order of the House put me in that position. It is not a matter of such importance that it cannot stand for a day or two.

The notice was allowed to stand.

THE ADDRESS.

The Order of the Day having been called,

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech on the opening of the Third Session of the Eighth Parliament.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said: Hon. gentlemen, when on a motion by myself the debate yesterday evening was adjourned, I had been endeavouring to answer some of the objections that had been urged by hon. gentlemen to the contract made between the government and Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann. I might sum up in a few words the reasons that prompted us to enter into the contract at the time we did. We could have had a line constructed from the head of the Lynn Canal across United States territory up to navigable waters at a very much less cost; no doubt parties would have been willing to have constructed that line although no positive offer was made that I am aware of, but it was impossible for us to consider any proposal of that kind in view of the manner in which the Canadian merchants and Canadians going in over United States territory had been treated by the Customs Department of the United States. We were deluged with telegrams from boards of trade and commercial houses all over this country, for five or six weeks before parliament met, calling our attention to the obstructions in the way of establishing trade with the Klondike region in consequence of the difficulties encountered in crossing through the United States territory. I do not propose to discuss what occurred in our correspondence with the United States It might not be seemly or proper to do so here. Also looking at the country and the opportunities for winter navigation at the Lynn Canal, there is no doubt whatever that nature has pointed out that as the proper way of obtaining entry into our own territory.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—You mean the Lynn Canal.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. It is the shortest and the quickest, because it is only 700 miles by sea from Victoria or Vancouver, and it is accessible at all seasons of the year; although the passes are difficult, engineering skill would probably have overcome the difficulties, if a fair arrangement could have been made with our neighbours in reference to a railway through that portion of their territory, or had they even consented to have adopted a line of communication between the territories of the two countries. But as, during the last twenty years, it has been found impossible by former governments to get the consent of the United States to lay down the boundary line there, it seemed to be a hopeless task to enter upon any further discussion of that subject, and, therefore, we were forced to the adoption of the line between Teslin Lake and Stikine River.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Do I understand my hon. friend to say that an effort was made to secure the consent of the United States government, and they refused it?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No; the difficulties in our way across that fringe of country were so serious that we would not have been justified in favouring the construction of a railway across it, because we had no assurance that we would not have to pay duty for traversing, perhaps, a mile or two of United States territory.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The bonding system would soon settle that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I cannot say that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What would be the difference between the difficulties presenting themselves on the Pacific coast, pointed out by the hon. gentleman, and the difficulties presenting themselves by going to New Brunswick, by what is called the Short Line through Maine?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No difficulty has been offered there, but we found that our traders and dealers were met with actual difficulties in crossing this fringe of territory on the Pacific coast, we know it from actual experience, and we had endeavoured by correspondence and personal interviews with the members of the United States government to minimize at least the difficulties, and within the last few days they have in a certain measure been reduced; therefore we were forced to the selection of a line through Canadian territory, and that was the only section which was available by which transport could be made into that country during the present year. It was felt that if we did not obtain access to the country during the year 1898, the large body of people expected to go into that country would fit out and pass entirely into that country under United States auspices, and that would be a very serious loss to the trade in Canada, and although the road may not be open until September, yet under the arrangement with the contractors facilities are to be created immediately so that the products, goods and outfits can be brought to Glenora, the southern point of the proposed railway, and be ready to transfer when the railway is opened. It was not supposed that the railway could be completely built within the short period between May and September, but that it would be in a sufficiently completed state in order to carry supplies over it, and therefore we were constrained in a manner to deal with parties who had the capacity and the ability and who were ready with the plant to go on with the work—who had the financial ability to undertake it. As to the magnitude of the subsidy, which has been so exaggerated by the press and some hon. gentlemen, as I explained yesterday, if the contractors had been permitted to select the land as they pleased themselves I have no no doubt they would have been glad to build that road for 100,000 acres, because, as I explained yesterday, in my judgment 95 per cent at least of the land to be selected by this company is valueless, absolutely valueless. There is no value in the rock certainly, and on each side of these gulches and each side of the streams and creeks every hon. gentleman who has given any study and thought to the physical conditions of that country must recognize that it is absolutely valueless rock. Any one who saw the lime light views of the lecturer the other night will realize the character of the country on each side of those gulches. It is simply solid rock, absolutely useless and valueless. Then again it was thought that it would be a very important matter to have the contractors interested in prospecting, because their efforts in prospecting will enure to the benefit of the free miner. Then in reference to the question of royalty—I speak subject to correction—the mining regulations in the North-west did not provide for any royalty. It has not been the practice of the government of Canada to exact any royalty. The royalty in Nova Scotia and British Columbia was two per cent. There was no precedent for any higher royalty than that. So that hon. gentlemen when they came to analyse the terms and understand them will find they do not bear the construction that has been put upon them by outside parties and the press. I should like to say a few words in reference to another very important paragraph of the Speech which has elicited some very caustic remarks—that is charging the prime minister of this country with having omitted to avail himself of what was said to be an offer to give Canada preferential trade. I say emphatically that there is no scintilla of justification for such a statement. I shall very briefly go over the case, and I think I can satisfy hon. gentlemen that no such deduction can be drawn by them; that if Mr. Chamberlain and every member of the government were to pledge themselves to such a policy it could not be accomplished. The people of Great Britain would not consent to it; the parliament of Great Britain would not adopt any such measure. What I state here is this, that had Sir Wilfrid Laurier pursued any other course than he did, he would have failed to obtain the denunciation of the Belgian and German treaties, and he could not have placed Canada in the high place she occupies to-day in political circle in Great Britain, as manifested by the high price that our debentures command to-day. It is the first time that any British colony has sold its debentures at two and a half per cent interest, and our standing is farther shown by the amount of capital coming into Canada for investment and the attention given to Canada in British financial circles. In order to thoroughly appreciate the obstacles in the way of preferential trade with the mother country, I invite hon. gentlemen's attention to the history of this matter. In 1881 the late government, in its desire to favour the sentiment that was rising in Canada for preferential trade with Great Britain and, knowing the difficulty there was in consequence of the various treaties containing what is called the favoured-nations clause, they passed an Order in Council deputing Sir Alexander Galt, then High Commissioner, to make an appeal to the Imperial authorities to relieve Canada from these treaties. The answer was that it was impossible to grant the request. They could not consider it at all. In 1891, ten years after, the parliament of Canada unanimously adopted a resolution praying the British government to denounce the treaties. The petition is given in the last paragraph:

> The Senate and House of Commons therefore humbly request Your Majesty to take such steps as may be necessary to denounce and terminate the effect of the provisions referred to, as well as the treaties with the German Zollverein and with the Kingdom of Belgium and with any other nation in respect of which such provisions are now in force.

To that a cold refusal was also given. Then probably the most important meeting of representative men outside of Great Britain took place, as you all know in July, 1894, under the presidency of my hon. friend opposite. This question naturally attracted the attention of the distinguished men from all the colonies who met in this chamber. It was probably the most prominent question discussed. At the time the British Empire League was in full force and life and there was a feeling throughout the British Empire that it was desirable there should be some closer commercial relations between the colonies and the mother country. It was a most laudable ambition, and one would have thought it would at once have commanded the attention of Great Britain. At that conference which the premiers and the leading men of the Empire outside of Great Britain attended here, they adopted this resolution after discussing the question fully:

> That this conference is of opinion that any provisions in existing treaties between Great Britain and any foreign power which prevent the self-governing dependencies of the empire from entering into agreements of commercial reciprocity with each other, or with Great Britain, should be removed.

The representative of the Imperial government—I have not the report of his speech here—I believe, intimated that it was unlikely that any such request would be acceded to. The formal answer came, however, from the British government in a despatch from the Marquis of Ripon to the Governor General of Canada, and the various governments of the different colonies in which he refers to that resolution:

> In regard to the separate denunciation of these articles, it may be stated that both the Belgian and German governments have been asked whether they would consent to the abrogation of these particular clauses without the rest of the treaties being terminated, and the reply in both cases was to the effect that the clauses could not be denounced apart from the rest of the treaty.

Now, that is the answer to the largest gathering of colonial statesmen that ever took place. Adverting to the reasons that prompted that action on the part of Great Britain, I shall briefly call attention to what Canada asks. Canada, through the Imperial Confederation League, and through other channels, asked that her products should have a preference in the British market. The answer has always been that it was too insignificant to discuss, that it would be unfair and unreasonable to ask the British workmen to be taxed for the benefit of the Canadian farmer. That is practically what it meant, and in order to fully appreciate that I shall briefly draw your attention to the figures as I take them from the Statesman's Year Book of 1896. Our export differs slightly from that. But it is only a matter of a few dollars. In 1896, according to the British returns, the grain and flour purchased by Great Britain amounted to $250,000,000. Canada sold to Great Britain between ten and eleven million dollars' worth. Therefore, we were asking, in reference to grain and flour, that the British people should tax themselves on $240,000,000 of breadstuffs in order that we might obtain a preference for our ten or eleven million dollars.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—They would not pay the whole amount.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The whole importation would be taxed. It would impose a tax on all the consumers in the United Kingdom, or else we got no benefit of it.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—They could not give a preference to Canada at all?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Certainly not, because it would involve an increase in the price of all the rest of the grain and flour imported into the United Kingdom.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It meant taxing $250,000,000 worth.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Canada's interest in the importations of Great Britain that year amounted to 4 per cent. In the live and dead meat trade the importations into Great Britain in 1896 were $166,000,000: Canada's portion of that amounted to $7,000,000, which would be 4½ per cent. In the butter and oleomargerine trade the importations were $83,000,000, and Canada's interest in that importation was $1,000,000, being 1½ per cent.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—These figures are not of value unless what all the colonies supply are taken in.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I was speaking for Canada alone. It is a mere matter of the addition of a very small amount if the other colonies are included. Unless we were in a position to furnish 95 per cent it was simply taxing the British people in order that we might obtain access to their market. At all events that is the British aspect of it. They had to be satisfied that the proposal was a reasonable one. In 1896 British exports amounted to over one thousand millions, while Canada's purchases represent only $33,000,000. It will, therefore, be seen that our trade is so insignificant compared with the large volume of British trade that it seems presumption on our part to ask the British people to tax themselves for our benefit and for that of our fellow colonists. To quote from Mr. Chamberlain's speech at the Canada Club dinner in March, 1896, "even the suggestion is barred out from consideration by Great Britain." Hon. gentlemen will see the reasons for the course taken by British statesmen in saying, according to the paragraph I read from the despatch, that the disadvantages so clearly outweighed any advantages that they could not consider it.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—It is what Canadian statesmen's opinions are that we want. We have nothing to do with British statesmen.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We had to get Great Britain to consent.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—But we did not want it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As I said before, if Sir Wilfrid Laurier had taken any other course he would not have secured the denunciation of those treaties.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is no evidence of that; that is a mere statement.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He captured the free trade sentiment of Great Britain by his eloquent utterances.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend, but does he mean to tell us that he had to tell the people of Great Britain that we could not give preferential trade?

Some hon. MEMBERS—Order, order.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There were a great many pleasant phrases passed between the premiers of the different colonies and Mr. Chamberlain, and the other leading statesmen of Great Britain. Those pleasant phrases meant very little in jubilee year. Compliments were being exchanged, but when he came down to talk business and to disturb trade relations, there was a very different expression of opinion, and I say that it was because Canada had offered that preference in the manner she did last year by our legislation and by the patriotic sentiments of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in saying that Canada did it out of gratitude for the very many favours she had received from the mother country, that he captured British sentiment and induced British statesmen to influence public opinion at that time to denounce the Belgian and German treaties.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Is not it a fact that all the colonial premiers in England at that time joined Sir Wilfrid Laurier in asking for the denunciation of the treaties?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They certainly did. They were all interested in it—no doubt about it, but Sir Wilfrid Laurier was the leading figure in securing it, and Canada had taken a forward action that no other colony had taken.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—New South Wales has.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They introduced free trade absolutely, but not in preference to the mother country. There was no other colony than Canada had put herself on that plane to command the sympathy of the British people in the manner this country had done. Now, only one year before the Jubilee year, probably the largest gathering of leading statesmen of Great Britain and presidents of chambers of commerce, leading merchants all over the empire took place in the city of London. I hold in my hand the official report of that meeting. It was held from the 9th to the 12th June, 1896. In that Canada was represented by gentlemen who were sent forward by the Chambers of Commerce of Montreal, Toronto and other points, and the meeting was held under the auspices of the Hon. Joseph Chamberlain. He was the honorary president. The actual president was the president of the London Chamber of Commerce, Sir Albert A. Rother. At that meeting one of the very first questions that engrossed the attention of the gentlemen who met there was to establish in some degree closer relations between the colonies themselves and between the colonies and the mother country, and the question came up again in the most emphatic and marked manner. Mr. Chamberlain opened the conference, and I will just read you what his utterances were on that occasion. That was only a few months before the speech referred to here that Mr. Laurier made in Liverpool. When this question was proposed at the very beginning of the conference, Mr. Chamberlain said :

> It is, in effect, that while the colonies should be left absolutely free to impose what protective duties they please both upon foreign countries and upon British commerce, they should be required to make a small discrimination in favour of British trade, in return for which we are expected to change our whole system and to impose duties on food and on raw materials. Well, gentlemen, I express again my opinion when I say that there is not the slightest chance that in any reasonable time this country, or the parliament of this country, would adopt so one-sided an agreement. (Hear, hear, and cheers.)

That is emphatic language.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Who is that?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Mr. Chamberlain, the gentleman who was so ready to give it away. He continues :

> The foreign trade of this country is so large, and the foreign trade of the colonies is comparatively so small, that a small preference given to us upon that foreign trade by the colonies would make so slight a difference, would be so slight a benefit to the total volume of our trade, that I do not believe the working classes of this country would consent to make a revolutionary change for what they would think to be an infinitesimal gain.

These are the sentiments expressed before the largest body of commercial men probably that ever met in London, only a short time before this jubilee year. That is the opinion of Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, and do you mean to tell me that he had changed his views, and if he did change his views, could he change the views of the people of England? Was there a man at that meeting that dissented from it? Mr. Osler went home full of the hope that Canada could obtain a preference in some way or another, and what did Mr. Osler do? He moved a resolution at that meeting in favour of free trade relations, but it had not the slightest chance of success and Mr. Osler had recognized that himself. He was a protectionist, a national policy man, in favour of closer trade relations with England, anxious to give England the same preference in our market that we were getting in hers, and looking around him and seeing the all prevailing sentiment what does he say? His resolution was :

Resolved, that in the opinion of this congress the advantages to be obtained by a closer union between the various portions of the British Empire are so great as to justify an arrangement as nearly as possible of the nature of a zollverein based upon principles of the freest exchange of commodities within the empire, consistent with the tariff requirements incident to the maintenance of the local government of each kingdom, dominion, province or colony, now forming part of the British family of nations.

He asks for closer relations and what is his view of the feeling that prevails in this large gathering on the subject of a preference for the colonies in the British markets. Here is what he says in his speech :

I will only repeat that in Canada we believe that certain concessions must be made if we are to get England to join in a confederation, and I think that as Canadians we are willing to make these concessions. We believe it will be for our own interest and for the interests of the empire that we should do so. I thoroughly agree with all Mr. Chamberlain has said, that it is impossible for us to have in the meantime Great Britain imposing a duty upon the food products from foreign countries, and not increase the price that she would otherwise pay, for she will be able to get from her colonies all the wheat supply she requires.

That is Mr. Osler's opinion. He evidently felt it was hopeless to expect the British workman to submit to a tax on food products for the benefit of the colonies until the colonies could supply the demand.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Just as hopeless as it was ten years ago to ask for the denunciation and abrogation of the treaties.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There was not, even at this time in 1894 a chance of it being abrogated. The parliament of Canada had asked for it a few years before. It had been pressed upon the attention of the Imperial government and the answer was a positive and absolute refusal. Nothing could be more decisive, then Sir Donald Smith brought forward a resolution in these terms :

Therefore resolved—That this congress records its belief in the advisability and practicability of a customs arrangement between Great Britain and her colonies and India on the basis of preferential treatment, and recommends that steps should be taken by Her Majesty's government to bring about an interchange of opinion on the subject between the mother country and the other governments of the empire.

There was not even a vote taken on that resolution. Sir Donald Smith saw the sense of the meeting was so strongly against it that he withdrew it. Let us see what the president who represents probably the largest Chamber of Commerce in the world, the Chamber of Commerce of London, says upon the proposal :

The dangers of a preferential duty in favour of colonial imports are the following : first, the increase in the price of food and raw materials in this country ; an increase which would at once be felt by the working classes—increased cost of living, which would involve on their part a demand for an increase of wages. That, in its turn, would lead to labour disturbances. Then there would be an increased cost in the production of our own manufactures, which would tell against us all over the world, not only in foreign countries but in the colonies themselves. Why do colonies buy from us to such a large extent? Because they find Great Britain is the cheapest market. If we increased our duties to them we should lose our trade with them and our trade with the rest of the world. We should meet with retaliation from foriegn countries.

That is pretty decisive language and it met with acquiescence by the representatives of the various chambers of commerce ; there was not a whisper that within any reasonable distance of time that we could accomplish the object of our hope which was to secure a preference in the British market.

The resolution presented by the Toronto Board of Trade with the several amendments proposed was withdrawn and the only resolution that could receive the approval of the conference was couched in the language usually adopted at the gatherings of the representatives of the British Empire League in its palmy days. The resolution read as follows :

That this Congress of Chambers of Commerce of the empire is of opinion that the establishment of closer commercial relations between the United Kingdom and the colonies and dependencies is an object which deserves, and demands, prompt and careful consideration. The Congress therefore respectfully represents to Her Majesty's Government that, if the suggestion should be made on behalf of the Colonies or some of them, it would be right and expedient to promote such consideration, and the formulation of some practicable plan, by summoning an Imperial Conference, thoroughly representative of the interests involved, or by such other means as Her Majesty may be advised to adopt. That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the president, to the Prime Minister, the First Lord of the Treasury, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, the leaders of the opposition in both Houses, the High Commissioner for Canada, and the agents general of the other Colonies

I need not continue reading from the report, because the spirit of the speeches is all in the direction that I have indicated. That was the condition of British sentiment in the year before the Jubilee. When Sir Wilfrid Laurier went home he went there strengthened with the Act passed by the Canadian parliament in which we lay down the principle that we would give a preference in our markets to countries that would give us a preference in theirs, or give us a tariff that was on no higher basis than our proposed tariff. Of course the whole object of framing our Act was with a view of ultimately giving a preference to British trade. That was our ambition and our desire. We felt, although it was argued to some extent to the contrary, that there were difficulties in the way, because we could not ignore the Belgium and German treaties. There were clauses in these treaties which gave to Germany and Belgium similar privileges in the colonies that the United Kingdom enjoyed, that is, we could not tax German and Belgian products higher than we taxed British products, and following out that principle many other countries, some twenty or thirty, had treaties with Great Britain which contained what is called the favoured-nation clause. That favoured nation clause gave those countries equal privileges with Great Britain in the markets of the colonies, so the effect of Germany and Belgium obtaining that concession gave to all other countries having a similar clause an equal privilege with Germany and Belgium. After confederation the government of Canada on several occasions declined to join in treaties involving those concessions Wherever Canada was consulted, I may say the government of this country wished to be omitted, but many of those treaties were made before confederation and some without conference with the government of Canada. Those treaties outside of Belgium and Germany, although they gave advantages to certain countries, were a matter of very little moment inasmuch as the products imported into Canada from those countries, outside of Belgium and Germany, were very very small. I have in my hand a paper which I perhaps need not read, but it shows clearly that with the exception of Germany, France and Belgium, the exports to Canada of all the other countries that had the favoured-nations clause were very small—some of them were practically nothing. The best evidence that our course was the wisest one is proved by results. I say unhesitatingly, that unless we had captivated public opinion in Great Britain by the action of parliament last year we could not have succeeded in having those treaties denounced. It was the embarrassment that the British people felt by the generous offer made by Canada that captivated public opinion in that country and acted on the government of Great Britain and the result will be just as we foresaw that on the 1st of August next Great Britain will be the only country that will enjoy that preference in our market.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not unless you change your law.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We propose, with the approval of parliament, to bring about that result. There was no other way it could be accomplished and that we have accomplished it is the best evidence that we took the only way it could be done.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman ridicules it. I have given the testimony of the last fifteen years, in which the most positive refusal is recorded year after year on the part of the British government to denounce those treaties. They had asked Belgium and Germany to let Canada out. Those countries said "no we will not." The British Government said it involves too grave a responsibility to let them out. I have shown that down to 1896 the evidence is conclusive that the British Government had no idea of denouncing the treaty or giving any preference to Canada.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Will the proposed action knock out the favoured-nation clause with regard to China and Japan?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. That particular clause which reads this way—"take for instance the Belgian treaty—the products of Belgium shall not be subject to higher duties in the colonies than the products of Great Britain." That is the clause in the Belgian treaty and a similar clause appears in the German treaty.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I suppose in making that change in the tariff you will apply it to the British colonies as well as to Great Britain ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is intended that they shall come in as New South Wales does now. That is my present opinion. Of course, I can only foreshadow what it will be, but there will be an opening for British colonies to come in certainly. The other countries that came in were the Argentine Republic, Austria, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Persia, Roumania, Venezuela and Switzerland. I may say the reason those countries come in is this : they have treaties containing the favoured-nation clause. That clause gives them equal privileges with Great Britain in the markets of her colonies. If you remove the privilege that Germany and Belgium now enjoy, then no other countries can come in except under the act of the parliament of Canada, and that is our own. In 1895 we gave France a preference in our markets on certain articles. I presume all those countries would be entitled to equal privileges with France in our markets in regard to the articles referred to in that treaty. I am inclined to think that would be the legal effect of it. So hon. gentlemen will see, I hope, before this parliament rises that we shall have succeeded in placing Great Britain and the colonies in the position that we all along hoped they would enjoy.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—On the free trade basis ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No ; it is our 25 per cent preference for the present.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Do you call that free trade ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is a preference over every other country.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is a march towards free trade.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Well, I am just as strong a free trader as my hon. friend is, but I do not think it would be the part of a prudent statesman to precipitate this country into absolute destruction.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That was not your opinion three years ago.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Always my opinion. I hope some day or other to see the transition, but the transition certainly cannot be a rapid one. You must pay regard to interests that have grown up under the sanction of parliament. It would be monstrous to adopt any other course. When Great Britain adopted free trade, I think it required about 25 years.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No, one year.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There was first a sliding scale.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It was reduced to one shilling a bushel on grain, and that remained for four years.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not speaking of one article. There was a sliding scale. It was very many years before they finally launched into free trade, and our progress must be equally slow and gradual. I do not propose to discuss economic questions with my honourable friend from Shell River, but I think it will gratify him that our importations from Great Britain are increasing. Of course, so far as the fiscal year ending last June is concerned, there could be no proper conclusious drawn from the twelve and a half per cent preference, because our tariff was only adopted in the end of April, two months before.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The returns that you refer to show an increase of 85 per cent in our exports and 7 per cent only in our imports.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—That is all right.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What I say is there has been an increase in our importations from Great Britain. The changes of trade do not immediately occur after the adoption of any fiscal policy.

Hon. Mr McCALLUM—Certainly the imports will increase as the population increases.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not wish to further discuss this question, but I think I have submitted to the House reasons that ought to warrant the conclusion to which I came, that in no other way could we have secured the denunciation of the treaties than by the plan that was adopted. It is perfectly clear from the expressions of opinion that I have quoted for many years back and up to the year 1896, that it was absolutely impossible for the premier of this country, or for the parliament of Canada, whether individually or collectively, to have secured from Great Britain a preference for our products in their market. I think that must be clear and manifest to the judgment of every fair minded man. The evidence is conclusive, and it was only by appealing to British sentiment in the manner that he did that Sir Wilfrid Laurier secured the denunciation of those treaties. It will, I have no doubt, lead to very much closer relations. It may be as years go by that we will be able to reduce the duty still further upon the importations from Great Britain. The Imperial Federation League that was in existence for some 12 or 15 years disbanded hopelessly only two years ago, feeling they could accomplish nothing. They did accomplish nothing in all that time. But our legislation of last year has forced this country forward very many years in advance of what we ordinarily would have attained to. It is evident in a variety of ways, as I said before, especially in the high price of our securities. Our securities which were sold only a few months ago have gone up several points since that time, and I think we are quite right in stating that Canada's political position in the British Empire has been very much raised by the course that we took last year and by the action of the premier in Great Britain.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The leader on this side of the House my hon. friend from Hastings, very aptly made some reference to some changes which had taken place since last year on the other side of the House in respect to leadership. I must on this occasion express the satisfaction which I have in seeing the hon. Minister of Justice occupying the position which he does on this occasion, namely the leadership of this House. I would, however, like to say in reference to the elevation of that gentleman to cabinet office and also to the leadership of this chamber, that he overlooked and disregarded a very important plank in the Liberal platform, and one to which he no doubt subscribed with very great cheerfulness even as late as the Liberal Convention of 1893. I refer to the reduction of cabinet ministers, which as my hon. friend will know has been strongly advocated by the Liberal party. Now, my hon. friend has had an excellent opportunity of demonstrating that he was true to the principles which were being promulgated by the Liberal party previous to his accepting this portfolio. He might have been willing to sacrifice himself upon the altar of his party so to speak, and thus demonstrate that there was one member of the Liberal party who when offered a portfolio insisted upon consistency being observed, and the number of ministers reduced by the fusion of two or more portfolios. But my hon. friend would not resist the tempting bait; and I must say that I am very well pleased personally that he accepted the portfolio and let somebody else sacrifice himself in that particular matter.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I never proposed the abolition of the portfolio which I hold.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would be rather surprised if my hon. friend or any of the other leaders of the liberal party would do so. However, that did not stand in the way of the numerous professions which were made along that line previous to and at the last general election. Now the predecessor of my hon. friend, the counsellor and guide and the moral force of the liberal party, that is the late leader in this House, the present Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario, was likewise guilty of a violation of an equally important article in the liberal creed, one which was advanced with quite as much emphasis as the one to which I have just alluded; namely, that no member of parliament should accept an office of emolument under the Crown other than that of a portfolio except a year elapsed between his resignation and the acceptance of office.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I never advocated anything of the sort.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I did not say my learned friend advocated it. I refer to the predecessor of my hon. friend. I think that this was a favourite plank in the platform. The present Postmaster General advocated it in very strong language and was prepared to designate as a political parasite any one who would occupy a seat in parliament with the immediate view of taking an office of emolument other than the one which I have mentioned. Now, as I say the counsellor, the guide and the moral force of the liberal party vacated his seat in this chamber for that higher position of the governorship which he at present adorns in defiance of liberal professions, I simply point out this fact to illustrate what I have mentioned, that there is such a thing as inconsistency in the liberal party and that their professions made while out of office are somewhat different to their acts after accession to office. Allusion has been made to some of the remarks of the Minister of Public Works during the recess in reference to reform of the Senate. This, of course, has been a favourite topic with the liberal party for some time past, and I note that they are taking a practical advantage of the situation to carry out that reform. The present Minister of Public Works made use of the rather embellished language during the recess that the members of this hon. body were scarcely worth sufficient rope to hang them. I notice that this reform is going on in the way of appointing liberals to Senate vacancies, the mover of the address is one of the gentlemen assisting the reform, and the seconder is another gentleman who has been introduced to carry out the reformation indicated. The chief feature of the reform is that when a sufficient number of gentlemen of the liberal persuasion are introduced into this chamber to reach the party equilibrium or go a little beyond the balance of political leaning, the reform will be successfully carried out, and we shall hear very little more about the reformation of the Senate. I congratulate the mover and seconder of the address for the manner in which they have discharged the duties imposed upon them. I would point out to the mover of the address that he was rather in error in the statement which he had made in regard to the unquestionable prosperity of this country under the present administration. My hon. friend made a statement as follows :

> We have evidence on every hand that Canada today is prosperous. No man in this country willing to work need go idle.

I happened to glance through a very reputable journal this morning and found in it the following telegram from Toronto :

> Toronto, Feb. 10.—Five hundred of the army of unemployed assembled at the City Hall yesterday, and listened to addresses from various members of the rank and file. A sight of the wretchedness of these men was one that would appeal to those disposed to be philanthropic. Mayor Shaw addressed the crowd, and assured the men that he sympathized with them in their distress, but could not undertake to give them work just at present. He held out hopes of employment before long. Citizen Atwood made a vigorous speech in which he complained about the bad condition of affairs and the great need of the unemployed.

I simply direct the attention of my hon. friend who moved the address to this little item so that he may not abate the alacrity with which he and his friends are now engaged in proclaiming the prosperity of the country, because if they become indifferent in declaring the prosperity of the country the distress which I have read about might possibly become somewhat greater. My hon. friend will pardon me if I thus disabused the impression made in his mind, and which found expression in his speech on the address. The hon. gentleman who seconded the address seems to have fallen into a somewhat similar mistaken notion of affairs in regard to the making of the Fielding loan mentioned in the address. I find that hon. gentleman under the impression that the loan was floated at par at a 2½ per cent rate. Allusion is made in the address to the fact that the loan placed by Mr. Fielding on the London market was very satisfactorily placed, indicating that there was very great reason for congratulation and satisfaction at the excellent price realized for our bonds. The address reads as follows on that subject :

> The loan recently effected has shown that the credit of Canada has never stood so high in European markets, and affords reasonable ground for expecting that the burdens of the people will, in the near future, be materially reduced by the substitution of a much lower rate of interest on our indebtedness than that which now exits.

Of course, the statement that this loan has been satisfactorily placed involves the fact, no doubt, which hon. gentlemen do not lose sight of, that it became necessary for the liberal party, after coming into office to borrow no less than $15,000,000. Those gentlemen had been in office fifteen months when it became necessary for them to send the Finance Minister to London. I do not say that the finances of this country had run behind to that extent, but it is well known that the deficit amounted to some two or three millions of dollars when Mr. Fielding went home to London, and upon an examination of the finances we find that the expenditure had very materially increased. These gentlemen who never grew tired of declaming against the extravagance of the late government and pointing out how a very substantial reduction could be made in the expenditure of the country—how at least $2,000,000 a year might be saved on expenditure,—we find these gentlemen's expenditure exceeding the revenue of the country the first year of office by at least half a million, and the public debt increased by two and a half million of dollars. Hence, we find these gentlemen instead of being busily engaged in reducing expenditure and paying off the public debt by a system of economy to be inaugurated and carried out in a practical way—we find these gentlemen making a loan of $15,000,000. In regard to this we are asked to express our satisfaction at the very resonable way in which this loan was placed on the London market. The mistake which my hon. friend who seconded this address fell into was this: he seemed to think this loan was put on the London market at two and a half per cent and the bonds were sold at par and consequently this country was only paying a $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent rate interest on the loan.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am quoting now from the speech made by the seconder of the address, who seems to have fallen into that error. The bonds in question realized, if I recollect correctly, about $91\frac{1}{2}$. They yield to the investor about two and three-quarters per cent, so that the Dominion of Canada is not paying two and a half per cent on this issue of bonds but two and three-quarters per cent. One reason why I find fault with the Minister of Finance is this, that for some time previous to his going to London, our three and a half per cent bonds were yielding to the investor only two and five-eighths per cent in London. English Consuls at that time were selling at two and three-eighths and the bonds of reliable home corporations were selling at two and a half, and we find a small colony like Ceylon having their inscribed bonds quoted at two and three-quarters. Notwithstanding the fact that our three and a half per cent were only yielding investors at that time two and five-eighths, we find Mr. Fielding negotiating a loan on which we are paying two and three-eighths per cent. Now, a difference of one-eighth per cent on a loan of $15,000,000 will represent nearly $18,000 a year, so that instead of negotiating a loan on as favourable terms as two and five-eighths per cent, we are paying an extra one-eighth per cent, or in other words eighteen thousand dollars a year more than we should have been called upon to pay. I am informed the negotiations were so conducted that it was impossible to get sufficient subscriptions to take up the loan and if it had not been that Canadian bankers took up a considerable amount of the bonds the subscriptions would not have exhausted the issue. This was due to the loan being put on the market at an inopportune time when money was dear and the rates had stiffened for reasons which then should have been known to the government. Consequently I, for one, cannot express the satisfaction which apparently is embodied in the the address in regard to the success of the Minister of Finance in his first financial venture. My hon. friend, the Secretary of State, exercised himself considerably over endeavouring to explain away the opportunity which presented itself to our Prime Minister when in London during the Jubilee to forward negotiations for imperial trade relations between ourselves and the empire. My hon. friend the Secretary of State struggled very hard to prove to the satisfaction of this House some good reason why the Prime Minister should have pursued the course he did, and the liberal party from that day to this have been endeavouring to convince the country that Sir Wilfrid Laurier exhausted every effort before taking the position he did take on free trade, and receiving a Cobden medal. My hon. friend pursued a somewhat specious course in presenting to this House the proceedings of the Congress of the Chambers of Commerce, in which Mr. Chamberlain expressed himself on this particular question. If my hon. friend had been desirous of giving to this House a full explanation of all that took place on that occasion he would not have refrained from going more fully into the report from which he read. He would have placed this House in possession of the other resolution which was submitted before the congress on that particular occasion to which Mr. Chamberlain assented and which embodied a proposition entirely agreeable not only to Mr. Chamberlain but to public thought in Great Britain at the time as to a method by which preferential trade with Great Britain might be established between the mother country and her colonies. At the risk of occupying the attention of the House for some few minutes longer than I intended, I would like to refer to a report which I have of the meeting of that congress on that occasion. Hon. gentlemen may doubtless remember that there were three propositions submitted to the congress, two of which did not receive favourable consideration and one of which did. My hon. friend, for the purpose of supporting the argument which he started out to establish, dealt with the second proposition, which must have been apparent to the gentlemen who were present on that occasion, was not favourably considered The other propositions were as follows. I am now quoting from Mr. Chamberlain's speech on that occasion. Mr. Chamberlain said, speaking of the three propositions :

> The first of them is a proposal that the colonies should abandon their own fiscal system, and should adopt ours, that they should carry out fully the doctrines of free trade, that they should open their markets not only to us, but to all the world, and that they should abandon entirely the protective duties upon which now they rest very largely for the revenues they collect. That is a proposal which is supported by the Cobden Club, by extreme, or, perhaps I ought to say, by orthodox free traders; and there is no doubt a great deal to be said for it. I do not deny that possibly it might be for all concerned the best solution.

My hon. friend did not refer to that proposition. I suppose his allegiance to the Cobden medal is such that he thought proper to overlook that and deal with the second proposal which was as follows :—

> I pass on, then, to the second proposal, which has been laid before a similar congress to this, which found expression at the great congress at Ottawa a year or two ago—that is, a proposal which has been favoured by some of our principal colonies, which has been advocated with great force and eloquence by leading colonists. It is the very reverse, in spirit at any rate, of the proposal I have just been considering for whereas the first proposal requires that the colonies should abandon our system in favour of theirs and it is in effect that, while the colonies should be left absolutely free to impose what protective duties they please both on foreign countries and upon British commerce, they should be required to make a small discrimination in favour of British trade, in return for which we are expected to change our whole system and impose duties on food and raw material.

It was that proposition to which Mr. Chamberlain expressed his dissent. But let me proceed to read the proposition which did receive favour :

> I admit that, if I understand it correctly, I find the germs of such a proposal in a resolution which is to be submitted to you on behalf of the Toronto Board of Trade. (Hear, hear.) What is that resolution ? Again I say I hope that I am correctly explaining it. That resolution I understand to be one for the creation of a British zollverein or customs union, which would establish at once practically free trade throughout the British Empire, but would leave the separate contracting parties free to make their own arrangements with regard to duties on foreign goods, except that this is an essential condition of the proposal—that Great Britain shall consent to replace moderate duties upon certain articles which are of large production in the colonies. Now, if I have rightly understood it, these articles would comprise corn, meat, wool and sugar, and perhaps other articles of enormous consumption in this country, which are at present largely produced in the colonies, and which might, under such an arrangement, be wholly produced in the colonies and wholly produced by British labour.

I would point out to my hon. friend the Secretary of State, that what he pointed out as an insuperable obstacle, viz., the colonies providing Great Britain with her food products, the present Colonial Secretary at any rate had sufficient confidence, sufficient faith in the ability of the colonies to believe in their being able to provide all the food products needed by Great Britain were such a trade system established.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think any resolution in that spirit carried.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend has not acquainted himself apparently with the proceedings of the conference ; he took too superficial a view of the proceedings. The insuperable obstacle which apparently stood in the way of the premier when he was in London has likewise blocked the view of the Secretary of State. He stopped there. That resolution was well thought of by the congress and was endorsed by the Times newspaper, and as far as I can trace it, by public opinion in Great Britain. We find the Times newspaper—and there is no greater exponent of public opinion in Great Britain—stating in an editorial after the discussion of this same subject :

> This has been the keystone of the commercial system of the United States and of that of the German Empire ; but it is necessary to remark that those countries are strongly protectionist. It rests, however, with the colonies to say whether they are willing to make any reasonable offer in this direction, as it would rest afterwards with the people of the United Kingdom to decide whether or not the offer should be accepted. But till a specific offer is made, in an authoritative form we fear that nothing can be done.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I beg to call the hon. gentleman's attention to this point in what he has read : the proposal of the times that he thinks might become practical hereafter is absolute free trade between England and the colonies and a duty against the rest of the world.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And no such proposition has ever emanated from hon. gentlemen on that side of the House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Nor any one else.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The proposition was that there should be free trade between Great Britain and her colonies, and that Great Britain should place a duty upon such articles as we chiefly produce, such as food products, in favour of the colonies against the world. This is the proposition which as I say received favour before this Congress of Chambers of Commerce and was endorsed by the Times newspaper. But I will say this: The keynote of that whole discussion—I should not perhaps say the keynote, but the result of that discussion—was that English statesmen took the ground that the proposition should proceed from the colonies.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend will see that proposition would imply that English goods of very kind should be admitted into this country and to every other colony absolutely free from duty, and no one had proposed to accept that proposition here.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It does not imply anything of the kind.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It says so in effect. Those are the express words. It is not an implication.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I note what my hon. friend has pointed out, but the point I desire to make is that in a discussion of such great importance as this, the man who would commit himself to any particular method and who would take the position that he would not deviate one jot or tittle from that position would manifest his inability to discuss public questions and certainly would show himself entirely divested of any ability of statesmanship.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not know that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—After all this was but a conference. Before any project of so great a character as this could be crystallized into practical form there must be a give and take on the part of those who take part in that discussion. Such a system can only be built up by compromise. Such a system can only be reached by a fusion of the ideas which colonial and imperial statesmen may hold upon this particular subject. It would be folly to say that because certain subjects of this kind are discussed in a congress of this character or at such a congress as we had in Ottawa some years ago, and because those who constitute the congress cannot arrive at some absolutely particular method by which such a system as this can be practically carried out that it therefore must fail. This is precisely the position which the liberal party take in vindicating the attitude of the premier at a meeting of the premiers in London during Jubilee proceedings. Now upon that particular occasion this subject was discussed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I beg my hon. friend's pardon; does he say any resolution of that kind was carried at that meeting?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am not prepared to say that. It was afterwards endorsed in the Times newspaper. I have not the proceedings so complete as my hon. friend has, but judging from the meagre report I have before me I should judge it was.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I intended to have read the only resolution carried on the subject, but I was rather wearied of reading and stopped. The others were all withdrawn. It was the old resolution of the United Empire League without any meaning to it. That is the only one that was carried.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Be that as it may, when we find a representative of the Imperial government, a representative of the statesmanship and of the influence of the present Colonial Secretary taking the position which he did on that occasion, following that position up consistently since, I say there is every reason to feel a degree of assurance throughout the whole country that if proper statesmanship is brought to bear upon this particular question it can be so crystallized into law as to become a practical commercial system. But if our statesmen will take the attitude that the prime minister of this Dominion did during the late Jubilee proceedings and refuse to discuss it and commit himself unequivocally to the doctrine of free trade and accept medals at the hands of a free trade club, and place himself in direct antagonism to public thought and discussion upon such an important question, then I say this country will yet rue the day when the Prime Minister attended those Jubilee proceedings and sacrificed the best interests of the country he represented.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Hear, hear,

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I should like to ask the hon. gentleman what his position is; if Great Britain was to tax the food and the raw material required by the people of Great Britain, whether they would not become poorer and less able to buy our products.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I regret I have not time on this present occasion to go into the subject in so exhaustive a way as would be satisfactory to my hon. friend, because that would necessitate a discussion of the entire problem. But what I do wish to say is that I do not for one moment consider myself bound to any of the particular schemes submitted upon this important question from time to time, or I do say that I am an adherent of any of the particular plans which have been advocated in any of those conferences. I, however, do say that there is a general principle running through the whole of those discussions which must of necessity appeal to the people of Canada, and we are nothing short of blind to our interests and absolutely ignorant of the destiny that awaits us if we absolutely refuse to consider the proposals which from time to time are made in this direction. During the presence of the premier in London this same subject was discussed. We find in the Imperial blue book that upon that occasion at a meeting of the premiers Mr. Chamberlain spoke as follows:

I pass on to another question, and that is as to the future commercial relations between this country and her colonies.

How far is it possible to make those relations closer and more intimate?

I have said that I believe in sentiment as the greatest of all the forces of the general government of the world, but at the same time I should like to bring to the reinforcement of sentiment the motives which are derived from material and personal interest.

But undoubtedly the fiscal arrangements of the different colonies differ so much among themselves, and all differ so much from those of the mother country, that it would be a matter of the greatest complication and difficulty to arrive at any conclusion which would unite us commercially in the same sense in which the zollverein united the empire of Germany.

It may be borne in mind that the history of that zollverein is most interesting and most instructive.

It commenced entirely as a commercial convention, dealing in the first place only partially with the trade of the empire, it was rapidly extended to include the whole empire; and it finally made possible, and encouraged, the ultimate union of the empire.

But this is a matter upon which at the present time, rather than suggest any proposals of my own, I desire to hear the views of the gentlemen present.

Here was a representative of the Imperial government laying before the colonial premiers a proposal or rather suggesting that they should enter into a discussion of the best method to adopt by which commercial relations of an inter-imperial character should be established between Great Britain and her colonies, and we find the premier of this Dominion absolutely setting his foot down upon the project and refusing to discuss it. We find him leaguing himself with the Cobden Club and accepting at their hands a badge of their order which at once established him to be one of their leading champions. We find upon that occasion a speech made by the president of the Cobden Club in presenting him with this celebrated medal and a response made by the premier of his faithful allegiance to Cobdenism, and this just at a time when the eyes of Canada were upon the premier, when our ears were open to hear what would be said by him in regard to his promoting preferential trade which in June, 1896, he so strongly advocated without reserve in the city of London, Ontario, immediately previous to the June election. Let me read you for a moment part of the speech which he then made, and let us consider how it is possible for a gentleman occupying the high and important position which he does to-day and which he did at that time to reconcile the position which he took in June, 1896, in London, Ontario, and the position which he took in that greater London the commercial metropolis of the world, the capital of the empire to which we belong. His speech in London, Ontario, in July is as follows:

Now the statesmen of Great Britain have thought that the governments of the colonies have come to a time when a new step can be taken in their development.

What is that?

That there shall be a commercial agreement between England and the colonies.

That practical statesman—Mr. Joseph Chamberlain—(applause)—has come to the conclusion that the time has come when it is possible to have within the bounds of the empire a new step taken, which will give to the colonies in England a preference for their products over the products of other nations.

What would be the possibilities of such a step if it were taken?

We sell our goods in England, we send our wheat, our butter, our cheese, all our natural products, but there we have to compete with similar products from the United States, from Russia, and from other nations.

Just see what a great advantage it would be to Canada if the wheat, cheese, and butter which we would send to England should be met in England with a preference over similar products of other nations.

The possibilities are immense.

Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, the new and progressive Secretary of the Colonies, has declared that the time has come when it is possible to discuss that question.

But, sir, if England is going to give us that preference, England would expect something from us in return.

England does not expect that we should take her own system of free trade, such as she has it, but I lay it before you, that the thing the English people would expect in return is that instead of a principle of protection we should adopt the revenue form of tariff pure and simple.

These are the conditions upon which we can have the boon.

The Canadian people have now to make their choice.

What will be their choice?

Their choice will be for a revenue tariff and for preferential trade.

And if my memory serves me right on that occasion the hon. gentleman was going to appoint a commission, and by the next boat that sailed after the general election would send that commission over to England to negotiate or discuss such a system as the one outlined in his London speech. But instead of adopting that course he adopted the contrary course, and it was with astonishment that the people of Canada heard of the attitude which he took upon that occasion in opposing unequivocally the proposition then made by the Colonial Secretary that the colonies should enter into a discussion for the adoption of a system of preferential trade with the empire. But it would seem that when the glittering bauble was held out to that hon. gentleman upon that occasion, and when the Cobdenites of London bowed down before him and cried "Great is Diana of the Ephesians," he could not resist declaring himself in favour of the doctrine of free trade, which previous to his departure for England he strenuously apposed. The president of the Cobden Club said:

There is a party amongst us who would willingly discriminate against German and Belgian goods, and who look upon the denunciation of the German and Belgian treaties as a step towards what they have been pleased to call commercial federation of the empire—a system under which commercial union between different parts of the empire would be fostered by laws excluding or discouraging foreign goods. If this was to be the consequence of what you have done, I need scarcely say that we of the Cobden Club should not now be here. It is because we believe that your efforts are founded on an opposite principle, and will be followed by opposite results, that we, followers of Adam Smith, and of Peel, of Bright, and of Cobden, are here to congratulate and to thank you. You do not ask us to abate one jot of our free trade principles; you ask for no preferential treatment; you make yourselves as large a step in the direction of free trade as your present circumstances will permit, and you desire to treat the rest of the world as you are now treating us. It is needless for me to dwell upon the part which you, sir, have had in this great movement, nor is this the time or place to enlarge upon its political and moral bearing. Let me conclude, however, by saying that in our opinion, as in that of the great man whose name we bear, the statesman who helps to remove the artificial barriers that short-sighted legislation has erected between nations furthers not only the material interests, but the highest aspirations of humanity.

After these noble sentiments we find our premier accepting the medal and responding as follows:

Deeply touched was Sir Wilfrid at the testimonial conveyed to him, for, as he put it, the "poor effort he had made in behalf of free trade. In Canada we have had the protection system, and we have to deal with it gradually and carefully." The only reform we have achieved is this—that no duty shall be levied simply for protection, but only for revenue.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Nothing very wrong about that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Only extreme inconsistency between professions and acts.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Only it is not correct—that is all.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The London Daily News speaking of his acceptance of the Cobden medal and his free trade professions:

These particular treaties are denounced because they would have prevented a reduction in the Canadian tariff, which is the first step to free trade for the Dominion. Sir Wilfrid Laurier so regards it, and nothing would give him greater pleasure than to open the Canadian ports as freely as Sir Robert Peel opened the ports of England. He is not entirely opposed to any system of free trade within the British Empire which would involve, protective duties upon goods manufactured or material grown outside, and he is credited with having driven that non sense out of Mr. Chamberlain's head. The recognition of the Cobden Club could not therefore have been more appropriately bestowed.

It seems to me that the prime minister of this country will require the rest of his natural days to reconcile the inconsistent positions which in one short year he took upon this important question. My hon. friend the leader of this House, in his address, spoke of the utter impossibility of any English statesman successfully advocating such a system of preferential trade within the empire. I am surprised at the little faith which that hon. gentleman has in the possibilities of the people of the empire in devising a system of trade by which to their national advantage and mutual interest they can trade between themselves irrespective of the outside world. I might for the advantage of my hon. friend the Secretary of State, who seems to have placed very great confidence in the reports which he evidently received from London as to the influence exercised by the premier in securing the denunciation of these treaties. point out to him the fact that during the Jubilee the premiers met and passed a resolution in regard to the denunciation of the German and Belgian treaties.

I say it was in pursuance of the addresses from time to time sent by the Canadian parliament in pursuance of the address sent by the Intercolonial Conference which met in Ottawa, and in deference to colonial sentiment that the Imperial parliament denounced those treaties at that particular time. My hon. friend must think that we are possessed of a great measure of credulity if he believes for one moment the mere statement made by him or by any body else that it was entirely owing to the intervention of the premier of this country when at the Jubilee proceedings that those treaties were denounced.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Did not the Cobden Club say so?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am not disposed to take the statement of the Cobden Club as establishing anything outside of their own ancient and embalmed theories.

Hon. Mr. POWER—They probably knew what they were talking out.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—They are somewhat antiquated in their ideas and are not seriously regarded, I think in England or any other country, on modern trade questions.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—If the hon. gentleman will allow me to say what I was told in England, I may tell him that the Cobden Club was merely the remnant of those people who took such a great part in bringing about free trade in 1846. The senior of the club was the Hon. Mr. Villiers, who died last month, and the necessity for maintaining the Cobden Club ceased, because all England fully appreciated the necessity for free trade.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have to apologize to the House for taking up so much time on this subject. I did not intend to do so, but the remarks of the Secretary of State led me to go into the matter more fully than I intended. The next subject of importance in the speech is the contract which has been recently entered into by the government with Mackenzie & Mann, and upon which so much has been said, that I am afraid very little remains for me to say on the subject. I would like to preface what I am about to say by directing the attention of the government to the fact that in connection with the administration of the Yukon country they have removed from the territories a large proportion of the police and in fact have jeopardized life and property to an extent which is simply alarming. I am not making this statement with a view to making criticism upon the government, but simply directing the attention of the government to a fact which I think has escaped their attention. I need not call the attention of the government to the serious state of affairs which arose there in 1885 in connection with the North-west rebellion owing to the absence of a sufficiently strong police force in the vicinity of Indian reserves and half-breed settlements. The government is fully aware of those facts—facts of a most regrettable character and which at that time cost the country some eight millions of money. At this time we find the police, and particularly those police who have been stationed in the vicinity of Indian reserves removed from their quarters and sent to the Yukon country. Take for instance the district in which I live, where there are no less than eight or ten thousand Indians within a day's march or so of the town of Calgary, the police have been so displaced in their removal from time to time that should there be an Indian uprising life and property would be sacrificed. A very large amount of capital has been invested in that country, particularly by ranchers, by large cattle men who have been relying entirely on the protection of the force in policing that country, but entirely irrespective of this fact we find the police removed from there and at a time when greatly needed. If the police in the eastern part of the territories and those parts where the Indian population is not so numerous were removed instead of in the Alberta district one could recognize perhaps the wisdom of the course pursued by the government.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—They are taken away from the eastern part as well.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That renders it more serious than I anticipated, because I understand all the men in the district from which I come are under orders to be ready to move at any time to the Yukon country. I point this out to the Minister of Justice so that he may be apprised of the state of affairs which I mention and which is creating some alarm in that country.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The white population there is very much more numerous than the Indians.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That may be, but they are scattered whereas the Indian population is not.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not scattered in Calgary.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The Indian population is living upon reserves and could easily organize and prove a very destructive element in the event of their rising at any time.

But dealing with this Yukon charter which is now before us, I have to express my dissent from the statements made in the address in regard to the desirability of this contract being entered into and carried out. Now, it seems to me that the government has done violence to the professions which for many years they had been making. Almost every profession which had been made by the liberal party when in opposition I find has been violated in regard to this particular contract. In the first place we have a contract presented to us involving the granting of a very large amount of the public domain. No intimation whatever is made to the public of the desire of the government that contractors should tender for the building of the road.

Now, the speech of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice was specially directed to the fact that urgency precluded them from adopting this course. It is a well known fact that when the Minister of the Interior went through that country last fall this matter was under consideration. It was known that numerous applications had been made for the building of a line of railway over this particular route, or approximately so, it was well known that the public demanded that capital should be invested by somebody or other for the building of such a road and no individuals were more seized with the trend of public sentiment in that direction than ministers of the Crown. That happened last year, and yet not a word do we find of anything being done in the way of asking contractors to tender for this particular work until almost immediately before the meeting of parliament. The first intimation we had of such a contract being entered into was in the speech of the Minister of Public Works in Montreal when he rather startled the community by outlining the contract in question. It is not necessary for me to say that public sentiment, entirely irrespective of political thought, at once condemned the contract.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seemed to do violence not only to every pledge and profession of the liberal party, but it did violence to well established parliamentary practice. Now, if these gentlemen could have vindicated the position which they had taken by placing upon the table of this or the other House, or by giving to the public any information to justify their entering into this contract there might have been some excuse, some defence, some justification for the course they pursued. When my hon. friend from his place in this House undertook to explain the attitude of the government upon this particular subject, I certainly awaited with a considerable degree of curiosity the information that was to be imparted to us, because, I will undertake to say, that never in the history of this Dominion or in the history of responsible government will you find a government coming down to parliament and saying, we are about to alienate four million acres of the public domain to a company for the pupose of carrying out a particular work about which we have no information whatever. They tacitly admit not being able to justify the grant they are about to make, but ask us in the absence of information to swallow it holus bolus, on the ground that the work is necessary, and they made the best bargain possible. It came out in the discussion within the last few days that these gentlemen must have some information, indefinite as it may be, that there were others who offered to carry out a contract, and that there were others who were prepared to say what they would do based upon accurate information of some kind. We find it reported in to-day's Citizen that the representatives of the Rothschilds made a proposition to the government to build a particular road.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, they did not: it is not correct.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not on that line—another line.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not refer to this particular line, but to a line going into the Yukon country.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Under the control of the United States.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No more than the other.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend has made a reference to a point with which I desire to deal. It would appear evident that others than the present contractors had been in treaty with the government for the building of this road. It would appear that those other parties made a proposition very much more reasonable then the contractors to whom the contract has been given, so much so as to justify the government in further dealing with them, in making further efforts with them to carry out the line in question.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You are entirely wrong. There was really no other proposition. There were informal discussions with the members of the government, but no company, or responsible party ever put on record a proposition that could be considered.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Do I understand from my hon. friend that it was impossible to get other responsible parties to tender?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There were several who discussed it informally, but would not touch it under any reasonable conditions. The gentleman who represented himself to be the agent of the Rothschilds—I do not know whether he is or not—was opposed to this route altogether. He said he would be willing, although he made no proposition, to build a line from the head of the Lynn Canal on much more favourable terms; so would Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann; but we said: We cannot entertain any such proposition.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—These men, no doubt, would have built the road for less, beginning at the head of Lynn Canal, which is not under our control or jurisdiction, and which might be closed against us any day; and so far as this road was concerned the party claiming to act on behalf of Rothschilds did contemplate making the government an offer. The government postponed the consideration of the question to give him an opportunity of making an offer, and ultimately he came to the government and said his friends in London were not ready to go on.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—Then the government did not receive any offer to build this road for 5,000 acres?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not for this road. There may have been a discussion with some members of the government, but there was no offer made to us; they might just as well have proposed to construct the whole road on the United States boundary as to construct the road under the existing circumstances. This was the only road open to us. The government decided that this road from the head of navigation in the Stikine River into the country was the only one they could undertake to construct, because it was the only route they had at the present time the control of. We were prepared to receive offers from those who represented wealthy institutions in England, but when they communicated with the capitalists in England they would not have anything to do with their arrangement, and after we had delayed entering into any contract for the purpose of constructing a road to give them an opportunity, they came to us in the end and said they had failed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Let me say this that what has fallen from the lips of the leader of the House proves most conclusively to my mind that ample time was at the disposal of the government to advertise for tenders.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There was not.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If these gentlemen had sufficient time to enter into treaty with the Rothschilds of London and refuse the overtures that were made and had time to discuss the various phases of the question as to whether this road should be built from the head of the Lynn Canal or from the head of navigation on the Stikine River to Teslin Lake then surely they had sufficient time to advertise for tenders on so important an undertaking.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not at all.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then all I can say is this government is a very much slower institution than I had thought. I understood this government, was a government of quick action, that it was going to show great alacrity in the administration of public affairs, that it would take advantage of time. But no; we find a public undertaking which last fall was known to be under way practically—at least it was well known that it would be placed under way—we had the Minister of the Interior going all the way to Skagway we had a discussion of the matter in the public press. I remember distinctly seeing an interview which took place between some members of the press and the Minister of Railways in regard to the building of the Teslin Lake road, in which he said emphatically that no aid or subsidy would be given to any company, that the bare franchise was a sufficient compensation to give to any company. That was many months ago and yet notwithstanding the flight of time we find no advantage taken of it. Notwithstanding the pressure of this enterprise, notwithstanding the starvation which my friend the Secretary of State so pathetically dwelt upon yesterday, the starvation of those poor mortals in Dawson City, notwithstanding these facts, we find those gentlemen falling into a state of desuetude, so to speak, upon this important subject, and not doing anything until a few days before the meeting of parliament. Now, then, this cry of no time and this cry of urgency is not sufficient to justify the government in the position they occupy upon this all important question. No such defence as this will justify an absolute violation of well established practice and of the pledges and promises which those gentlemen have made from time to time when in opposition. If there was no time to advertise for those tenders there might have been time for those gentlemen to have brought some information to the House as to the merits, if any, of this particular road. We certainly should have been seized with some information as to the feasibility of the route, the navigation of the water route and as to the probable cost of constructing such a road, but there is not a word about it, but on the contrary these gentlemen seem to think that the very absence of information and the plea of urgency justify them in the course which they have taken.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman seems to forget that we are not discussing this Yukon bill. We are discussing the Governor General's speech.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We are discussing a paragraph in it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—But the hon. gentleman complains that all sorts of information is not on the Table of the House. When the bill comes to be discussed I presume the government will make the House seized of all the information they have, but it is unusual to expect that, before the bill is submitted to us.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—To answer my hon. friend from Halifax, I have simply taken the statement of his leaders in this House that they have no information to give. Because my hon. friend said when he proceeded to enter into a defence of the government for entering into the contract he had two reasons to give why he could not give sufficient information to satisy the members. One was there was so much urgency there could be no information given.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend said there was so much urgency for the building of this road that it was impossible to get information in time regarding all the facts which they would otherwise have obtained.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend has been for years supporting propositions to build railways. The Canadian Pacific Railway was one that was made without advertising for tenders, a private arrangement to build a line that was not surveyed, and that is true of every railway in the North-west Territories, from which the hon. gentleman comes, or which have received appropriations from the government.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend surely will not say there is any analogy between the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway and this particulary railway.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We are not giving a dollar to this railway.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The contract of the Canadian Pacific Railway was entered into after mature consideration.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And after three millions of dollars had been spent.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—First of all the government was defeated. That was one of the prelimilary steps to a consideration of the question. Then the government advertized not only on this continent but in Europe for tenders for the building of that road, and it was a matter about which this continent and also Europe were fully seized with the information that was required to enter fully into a discussion of it as well as the building of it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman will remember that a second company sent in a tender. They offered to build a road without a monopoly clause, and they deposited one million of dollars in a bank as evidence of their good faith and readiness to contract with the government.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But the point I desire to make is this, that when parliament was called to discuss the Canadian Pacific Railway contract, parliament was in full possession of all information, so that they could arrive at a satisfactory conclusion and an accurate judgment on that great undertaking, and furthermore sufficient time was given for parliament to exercise its judgment upon that question before the country was absolutely bound to hand over the land subsidy and money grant which accompanied that contract.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I would ask my hon. friend to point out to this hon. House the difference between giving a contract to this company to build this road aided by a land grant, and any one of the railways that are branches of the Canadian Pacific Railway that run through the North-west Territories. Charters have been given in this House where no surveys were made, no plans filed and a promise of a certain number of acres per mile to aid each enterprise.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I will give my hon. friend the answer. Before parliament entered into that contract, parliament spent hundred of thousands of dollars on surveying and inspecting the route to be adopted.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But it was not adopted. I am speaking of other roads. Take for instance the Manitoba and North-western, and half a dozen other roads in the North-west Territories. Charters have been given and lands promised and no surveys made, no deposits required and my hon. friend has supported them.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Precisely, but nothing was done under those charters until they came down to parliament.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Oh yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHHEED—If my hon. friend will look at the contract he will find, that notwithstanding the bill is not yet approved by parliament he has bound these contractors to proceed with the road before the 1st of March. They have deposited $250,000 which I understand from the Secretary of State is to be forfeited in the event of any non-fulfilment of the contract, and we find these men bound to the completion of this road within a date, which would render it practically impossible for them to have it started and completed except it was fully expected by the government that irrespective of parliament they should go on and build that road. I am not finding fault with the government for entering into the contract before a session of parliament, but I find fault with them for entering on a contract about which they have no information that would justify them in alienating such a large part of the public domain. I find fault with them for entering into the contract without giving an opportunity to other contractors to tender upon this particular undertaking and to thus probably save to the country the difference between its actual value and the amount it will cost the country under the present contractors. I find fault with them for entering upon a huge undertaking of this kind without such information as would thoroughly justify them in adopting a particular route. But my hon. friend raised a point a few moments ago which I should like to discuss, and that is the reason of the government for refusing the offer of the Rothschilds.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They made no offer.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Of course I accept the statement of my hon. friend, but I understand that there was an offer to build the road from the head of Lynn Canal for a subsidy of 5,000 acres per mile.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The company which made the offer is the Rothschilds Exploration Company with headquarters at San Francisco.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—A United States institution.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend has suddenly taken a strange antipathy to United States institutions?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I understood the liberal party for many years had been denouncing the conservative party for their hostility to the United States and their refusal to enter into reciprocal relations of all kinds. I speak without very accurate information, but it seems to me that the routes from the head of Lynn Canal to open navigation would have been of very much greater service to the Dominion than a road from Stikine River to Teslin Lake.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If that were Canadian territory from the head of Lynn Canal.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Let us deal with that phase of the question. In running through the Stikine River from Wrangel until you get into the Canadian territory you at once render yourself subject to all the obnoxious customs regulations and coasting laws that the United States have ever called into motion against Canadian navigation. We have never had, so far as my knowledge extends—I do not say it extends so far back as that of some honourable gentlemen before me, but I do not think my hon. friend can point to a single instance in Canada or the United States in which we have had any serious trouble by reason of having one of our railway termini in the United States. The relations of Canada with the United States for half a century back has been disturbed almost continuously with friction respecting the navigation laws between Canada and the United States. Scarcely a year has passed but we have had trouble with the United States by reason of obnoxious customs regulations and coasting laws incident to navigating the various streams and bodies of water between the United States and Canada. No hon. gentleman knows that better than my hon. friend who leads this House, and he admits and admits quite freely that those same difficulties confront us in regard to the navigation of the Stikine River from Wrangel until we get into our territory, hence we are subject to all the trouble and difficulty which we have been combating in Canada for years past.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We have treaty rights on the Stikine River.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—You have only rights to use that river for commercial purposes. One of the first purposes you will require to use that river for is the transport of troops.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They can go in civilian clothes through United States territory.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend knows it would lead to serious international complications if we attempted to transport troops in that way through United States territory. The very point that has been agitating public opinion within the Dominion for the last few months arose through that criticised visit of the Minister of Interior to Washington when he conceded to the United States the right of sending a body of American officials, suspected to be troops, through Canadian territory to the Yukon, although they were going ostensibly as a relief organization or something of that kind. They were to go in civilian clothes. They were nothing more nor less than citizens of the great United States commonwealth, but we had the press from the Atlantic to the Pacific commenting against such a liberty being extended to them, yet my hon. friend says "send them in civilian dress."

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is the way we get our police force in.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The police force in the Red River rebellion of 1870 had to undergo a most perilous journey through Canadian territory, to get into our north-western country when the United States absolutely prohibited them from passing through American territory.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The mounted police went up the Yukon River in 1895 and 1897: the mounted police went through this United States territory, and some of them are there now.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We had to get special leave to take them there. They simply went there to police that district, and it was equally for the benefit of the United States people with ourselves that such was the case. But my hon. friend whispered the other night as a justification for the passing of this bill that there were grave and serious state reasons.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—So there are.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—State reasons for the building of this road and the passage of the bill! The only state reasons that could possibly arise to justify the building of that road would be anticipation of trouble between the United States and Canada. Such trouble as that must necessarily involve the transportation of the military into the Yukon country. Will my hon. friend say, in view of these state reasons which he has intimated, that the Americans would for a moment allow us to transport our troops from Wangel to the Stikine River through United States territory into the Yukon country? Why the very statement made by the hon. gentleman is the very best refutation of the argument he has made that our troops could go by the Stikine route. I can point to instance after instance in the Dominion of Canada where one termini of a Canadian railway is on United States soil. The Canadian Pacific Railway Short Line through Maine, the Grand Trunk Railway, the Sault Road, in fact all the great systems of Canadian railways have termini in the United States, yet we have never had any trouble with the United States in regard to our railway system. But in regard to our navigation laws, we have always had trouble with our neighbours and if history repeats itself, we always shall. Therefore, I say, with the limited information before us, it would appear more advantageous to Canada to build from the head of Lynn Canal than from the head of navigation on the Stikine River. Another very serious matter is this : My hon. friend was not able to give information upon it, the hon. gentleman does not know anything as to the feasibility of the Stikine River route. I understand the navigation of that river is very limited indeed. In fact, on my way to Ottawa last week I met on the train a civil engineer from England who was familiar with this route and who told me positively that it could not be used more than four months of the year. I see a statement in to-day's press it cannot be used more than two months. We know that it is a very shallow river and vessels drawing more than 16 inches of water cannot navigate it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is a mistake.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am simply giving the information I am in possession of. My hon. friend has rung the changes in every possible way that this road is peculiarly a Canadian road. The government advances that as one of the strongest arguments in justification of the building of the road. I wish to point out to my hon. friend that the building of that road by this route is quite as advantageous to the people of the United States as it is to the people of Canada. There is not a city on the Pacific coast but will participate in the advantages of this road quite as largely as any of the Canadians cities. San Francisco, Portland, Tacoma, Seattle—all those cities that lie on the Pacific coast and which are practically in possession of that trade to-day will profit as much by the building of the road as Vancouver or Victoria. He cannot gainsay that statement. They will sail up the coast, tranship at Wrangel or on the Stikine River, and ship their goods in the same as Canadians.

Hon. Mr. POWER—They have to pay duty.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—They are paying duty to-day, yet they have most of the trade of that country. Certainly they will continue to pay the duty and keep the trade. The building of the road will not change those conditions of trade. Therefore, I fail to see any force in the argument that has been advanced over and over again that this is a purely Canadian route. If you want a purely Canadian route, there is the route by Edmonton which would open up a vast territory fit for settlement, it would prove of incalculable benefit to that vast western country, and would positively restrict the market to Canadian products. Let us for a moment see how the United States have practically possession of so large a portion of the trade in that Yukon country. Take into consideration their capital, take into consideration their commercial prestige, take into consideration the very large proportion of United States citizens in that country and it will readily be seen that the disproportion between the population of the Dominion of Canada and that of the United States, will manifest itself exactly in the volume of trade which will be carried on in that country. I do not think there can be a doubt of it. The United States transportation companies will profit as largely by the building of that road as the transportation companies of Canada. Those companies are numerous, energetic and enterprising, and we in Canada are building a road apparently for the purpose of working into the hands of the United States transportation companies and commercial men of that country without their contributing a dollar towards it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I understood the hon. gentleman favoured the Lynn Canal route.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I say whatever route you open up there you open up for the benefit of the United States as well as of Canada, except you pass legislation which will discriminate in favour of Canadians against others. Any public work you carry out there will be more to the advantage of the people of the United States than to our own people.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then the hon. gentleman is opposed altogether to a railway from the coast in?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No. I say this, and say it with a feeling of certainty, that if this government will advertise for tenders for the building of a road with monopolistic privileges they will secure numerous offers from reliable companies who will build a road into that territory for the franchise alone without giving them an acre of property; the very figures advanced by the contractors themselves, illustrate beyond all question or doubt that the franchise itself with the enormous profits incident thereto will be more than an inducement for the construction of that road.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There are a number of charters now in existence—two by the Lynn Canal and one from British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Let the government advertise that they are willing to accept tenders for the building of the road which will have a monopoly for five years of the trade of that country, and I venture to say they will receive several tenders from companies of strong financial backing for the building of the road. Mr. Mann stated the other day that his company would carry in from two hundred and fifty to three hundred thousand tons of freight this year over that route. The statements made by liberal members in the House of Commons on this same subject intimate from 50,000 to 100,000 people will go there this summer. I do not think it is an exaggeration to say 100,000 people will go by that route this coming year. The proceeds of the freight and passenger traffic from such a large number of persons would more than compensate the contractor for the building of the road—pay for it twice over.

Another most extraordinary provision has been introduced into this bill and one which is without parallel, is that it entirely excludes the application of the Railway Act. My hon. friend who is familiar with parliamentary procedure and parliamentary history cannot recall a precedent I venture to say in which a bill has been put through for the building of a railway in which the Railway Act has been wholly excluded in its application. I, however, have no intention of going into the various details of this bill, because I apprehend the opportunity will be given us at an early date to discuss it more fully. Suffice it to say that although much has been said against this bill, yet not too much has been said against it. It is establishing a precedent which is extremely dangerous, and above all that the liberal party should establish such a precedent of this character is beyond my comprehension. But they have been singularly unfortunate in their railway legislation since their accession to office. The action of the government in increasing the subsidy by $2,000,000 to the Crow's Nest road over the amount of subsidy offered by the late government, and the introduction of the bill for the Drummond County road, which this House threw out, and for which they received the approval of the country, and now followed by this particular bill, the climax of their legislation upon railway matters, are all matters which might well cause comment and which warrant one in looking with a degree of caution upon contracts of this character. I say, therefore, that legislation of this character warrants from this chamber the most careful scrutiny. If all the safeguards which have surrounded legislation of this character are to be at once set aside, and we are to accept the statement that time, urgency and state reasons, &c., justify the action taken by the government, we might as well abdicate the functions imposed upon us as a parliament, and give to the government a free hand to legislate upon all matters irrespective of public opinion.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is a pleasure to listen to the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat, and it is a pleasure to answer him. I only regret that just at the present moment I have not the physical vigour which would enable me to answer him in a satisfactory way—I mean in the matter of voice. But I propose to make a few observations on what he has said. The first point which the hon. gentleman made was that the hon. gentleman who leads this House occupied a position inconsistent with his previous professions, that he or the party with which he had been associated, had been in favour of reducing the number of ministers, and consequently he should not have accepted office. The natural answer to that is that no member of the liberal Party ever proposed to abolish the Department of Justice, and if any department was to be abolished it would be some other one; and, for my part, I am very glad indeed that the hon. gentleman who now occupies the position of Minister of Justice did not propose to abolish this department but would let some other department go. Then the hon. gentleman made a statement which I was rather surprised to hear from a gentleman of his astuteness and his familiarity with the law which deals with parliament and government. The hon. gentleman said that the gentleman who was last Minister of Justice had contravened the independence of Parliament Act by sitting in this House when he proposed, or expected, to be appointed LieutenantGovernor of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I did not say any such thing. What I did say was that the liberal party had strongly urged that no member of parliament should be allowed to remain in the House in anticipation of resigning, and taking a public office or portfolio other than that of Minister of Justice. My hon. friend is not familiar with the platform of his party yet.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman is making a distinction without a difference. I understood the hon. gentleman quite correctly. He contended that the position of Sir Oliver Mowat when he sat in this House, in view of his subsequent appointment to the Lieutenant Governorship of Ontario, was inconsistent with liberal principles.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Liberal professions, not liberal principles.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am surprised the hon. gentleman should say a thing of that kind, because in the first place, there is no evidence whatever that Sir Oliver Mowat knew he was going to be Lieutenant Governor of Ontario at that time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He refused it once.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And, in the next place, it would not in the slightest degree contravene the independence of Parliament, because Sir Oliver Mowat already filled an office of emolument under the Crown when he was Minister of Justice; and the thing which the liberal party have objected to, and the thing which is contrary to the spirit of the independence of Parliament Act, is that a member should sit in either House as a private member holding a secret promise of office from the government. It is pleasant to listen to the hon. gentleman saying these things. He says them in an agreeable way, and they are sometimes amusing, at any rate; but I just wish to indicate that there is really no serious weight in some of the things he said. Then the hon. gentleman having before him the trade returns for the last many months, having the continuous statements which appear in the commercial colums of the great conservative papers through the country to the effect that the country is prosperous, and that trade is good, tells us, as a set-off to all this, that in Toronto the other day 500 idle men held a meeting in the City Hall. I do not suppose there has ever been a time when you would not get 500 idle men in the city of Toronto, and we know from the best authority that, at all times, we have the poor with us. It is a little surprising that the hon. gentleman, coming from the part of the country that he does, should undertake to deny that the country is prosperous as a whole, because no portion of the country has experienced a greater improvement in the way of prosperity than the country west of the great lakes. I have seen it stated—and I do not think it has been denied; and the hon. gentleman I think has some familiarity with the transactions of loan companies; I think he is interested in some companies—that in a great many cases loans in the North-west which had been written off as bad debts have within the last year been paid off by the borrowers.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is correct, to a limited extent.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is a very good indication of prosperity I think.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The loans were at a very low rate.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That makes no difference. These debts were looked upon as so hopeless by the loan companies that they had been writen off, and were not regarded as valuable assets; and, under the impulse of the improved condition of that part of the country, the loans have been paid off.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—To whom would you give credit for that? The government of the country, or Providence?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have not given any one credit for it at present. My hon. friend is too impetuous. I am simply dealing with the statements of the hon. gentleman from Calgary, and showing he is not just as accurate perhaps as he might be. With respect to the Canadian loan, I have not very much to say. I do not pretend to be familiar with those questions of finance, not perhaps as familiar as the hon. gentleman who preceded me is, but I know that certain papers which support the conservative party have expressed their satisfaction at the fact that this loan had been effected at a very low rate of interest and at a very reasonable figure. That is the general impression, I think. Then the hon. gentleman tried to make out that this loan of 15,000,000 dollars represented the extravagance of the liberal party since they came into power. As a matter of fact, the bulk of the loan was needed to pay off debts incurred by the predecessors of the government, and to pay out moneys for the purpose of carrying out the obligations contracted by the late government. The hon. gentleman seemed to think that the fact that Canadian banks had subscribed for a considerable portion of this loan was a piece of evidence adverse to the success of the loan, but it does not so strike me. I think that if Canadian bankers, who know most about the condition of affairs in this country, are willing to invest their funds largely in Canadian loans it is simply an indication that those who know most about the country have ample confidence in its financial position. Then the hon. gentleman took up what had been said by the hon. Secretary of State with respect to preferential trade, and he tried to fasten—I do not know whether I should call it an accusation, but something like it—an accusation of suppression of an important fact on the hon. Secretary of State, because he did not deal with some proposal which had come before this meeting of the Boards of Trade. I listened to the statement of the three proposals which were laid before that Board, made by the hon. gentleman from Calgary, and I noticed that the second proposal was identical with that which was made on various occasions by the conservative party, and by the leaders of the conservative party, and by the conservative government. Their proposal always was that if we should undertake in this country to give any preference to England, it should be in return for some preference given to us by England, and it is perfectly clear from the speeches made by members of the present English government, and members of the late English government, that England would not give us any preference, and the reasons were set forth fully by the hon. Secretary of State, and I think also by the hon. gentleman from Shell River. The proposal which the hon. gentleman thought the Secretary of State should have set before the House was one that would not be entertained, and could not be entertained at the present time at any rate, by any one dealing seriously with the financial business of this country. That proposition was that in this Imperial zollverein no duty should be charged by the colonies upon English goods. The hon gentleman must see that the proposition is not a practical one at all. It would be impossible to carry on the government of this country without completely revolutionising our methods, if we were to adopt any such proposal as that. The proposal made by the hon. gentleman from Shell River would be a much better one than that, more practical I think, and more beneficial. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Before the motion carries, I would like to ask the senior member for Halifax a question. In his opening remarks, referring to the number of portfolios and the necessity for the retention of the office of Minister of Justice, he indicated that one of the others might go. Is he in a position to inform the House whether there is any immediate danger of any such contingency ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the hon. gentleman will put his question in writing, I shall answer it.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned.

THE ADDRESS.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The Order of the Day being called—

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech on the opening of the Third Session of the Eighth Parliament—

Hon. Mr. POWER said :—I trust the House will excuse my shortcomings in dealing with the Speech from the Throne. I had hoped when the debate was adjourned on Friday that I should have felt in my usual fairly good fighting trim. I regret to say I do not. When the House adjourned I was dealing with the speech made by the hon. gentleman from Calgary (Mr. Lougheed), and I trust the hon. gentleman will not think it is through any want of respect for him that I do not continue doing what I was then engaged in doing. Before undertaking to deal with the speech, I may be permitted to make an observation or two on some remarks made by the hon. leader of the opposition, who, I am sorry to see, is not in his place ; one of which, at any rate, I regretted to hear. The hon. gentleman made a reference to the hon. Secretary of State which pained me. The hon. leader of the opposition and the hon. Secretary of State have both exceeded the term of years which the Scriptures allows to man, and they have arrived at that time of life when the passions which are generally strong in early life have cooled off, and gentlemen cultivate, or are disposed at any rate to entertain, friendly feelings towards one another. The hon. leader of the opposition referred to the position of the hon. Secretary of State in this House and adverted, not in a cordial or friendly way, to the fact that the hon. gentleman was not now leader of the House ; that first Sir Oliver Mowat, and next the present Minister of Justice, had been made leaders of the House. I do not think that that is a subject which particularly concerns the opposition ; and I do not think there is anything remarkable in the circumstance. Sir Oliver Mowat is a gentleman who has occupied for some years an almost unique position in the public affairs of the country. He was by some years the senior of the hon. Secretary of State ; and the Secretary of State had held office as a subordinate member in the Ontario government, of which Sir Oliver Mowat was the head. So that it was only natural that when Sir Oliver Mowat came into this Chamber he should take the lead, particularly as the Department of Justice is recognized as being a more important department than that of the Secretary of State. The hon. gentleman who now presides over the Department of Justice had also been together with the hon. Secretary of State a member of the Mackenzie administration, and had in that government filled a most important and prominent office—that of Minister of the Interior; and it was not very remarkable that, under the circumstances, that the hon. gentleman, filling the important office which he now does, should have been selected to lead the House. I was the more surprised at the attitude assumed by the hon. leader of the opposition, because that hon. gentleman's own experience in connection with the matter of leadership was not s ch as was calculated to make him disposed to raise questions on that point with reference to other persons. The hon. gentleman did become the leader of the government, as we know, and the hon. gentleman ceased to be the leader of the government which preceded the present government; and the hon. gentleman, it was generally understood, was not particularly anxious to retire from the position of leader, but did so as a result of the intrigues of a body whom he designated as a "nest of traders." There was this striking fact in connection with the way in which the hon. gentleman ceased to be the leader of the government of that day, that he was obliged to commit political hari-kari—he was obliged to commit suicide as a political leader. Under these circumstances, I am a little surprised that he should have raised any question on this subject. The hon. gentleman referred also to one or two matters which did not appear in the speech of the Governor General. One was the cable to Australia, and the hon. gentleman thought that the speech should have contained a reference to it, and his impression was that Canada should take very vigorous measures to secure the construction of that cable. Now, hon. gentlemen, although Canada is interested in the laying of the cable to Australia, she is not nearly so vitally interested in that matter as the Australian colonies or the mother country, and if the mother country and Australia did not think it necessary to proceed with the work, and as far as we are aware we have no evidence that they thought it necessary, I do not think that we here in Canada should be very much disturbed over the matter. I have always felt that when Canada constructed the Canadian Pacific Railway from the Atlantic to the Pacific she had done her duty for some time in the matter of improving communication between the different parts of the empire; and it is for those portions of the empire which are more directly and vitally interested to devote attention to any further steps that may be deemed necessary.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Is the Canadian Pacific Railway maintained at the government's expense?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The Canadian Pacific Railway is not maintained at the government's expense, but the Canadian Pacific Railway could not have been constructed without a vast expenditure of money and land on the part of the people of Canada. Taking up the speech now, I shall try and deal with some of its paragraphs. It is not necessary for me to deal with the first paragraph, which refers to the political and material prosperity of Canada; and I have already said something about the loan, which is regarded by people who know more about financial matters than I do as being, on the whole, a very satisfactory loan, particularly as it fixes the rate of interest upon our future loans at one-half per cent lower than it had been. The third paragraph, the one which speaks about the jubilee ceremonials and the action of the Imperial government in denouncing the treaties with Germany and Belgium, deserves all the consideration it has received. There were distinguished men, leaders from all parts of the empire, gathered at the capital to do honour to Her Majesty on the occasion of her diamond jubilee, and amongst all the colonial and Indian magnates who were present on that occasion, I think I am safe in saying that no one man attracted such attention from the press and from the people who were gathered there as did the Premier of Canada. I do not think I am saying too much when I say that, next to the Queen, our Premier was the central figure of the Jubilee celebration. This was, no doubt, largely due to the action of the Canadian Parliament in deciding to give a preference to British goods in our market, but it was also due in a large measure to the personal qualities of the Premier. On every occasion—and he was to the fore on many important occasions—he bore himself in a manner which was calculated to impress favourably those who met him and listened to him, and to awaken emotions of pride in his fellow-countrymen. I may say, hon. gentlemen, that in no case was this more conspicuous than in the case of the speeches which the hon. gentleman delivered in France. No particular reference has been made to these; but speaking for myself, I say that nothing impressed me more favourably than the speeches made by the Premier in France. He was there amongst people who spoke his native language, people of his own origin, and there was a natural temptation to say the thing which would please those people; but on every occasion when the Premier made an important speech in France he took care to inform his hearers that he and his countrymen here in Canada were loyal to England, that they admired the British system and had no desire whatever to change their allegiance, and it seems to me that for that he certainly deserves our thanks. The hon. leader of the opposition in discussing His Excellency's speech set very little store upon the preferential feature of the tariff. I think it is a matter of very serious consequence. When it was being discussed last year the hon. gentleman took the same ground, but the results have shown that my hon. friend was mistaken. Facts, as they say, are stubborn things, and the facts are all against the hon. gentleman. The fact is, that while the party of which the hon gentleman was for some time leader, and which he now leads in this House, had been expressing for years their great anxiety to secure the denunciation of the German and Belgian treaties; they had so managed things, had so loaded their propositions with conditions, that they made no progress whatever in the desired direction; and this preferential clause in the tariff of 1897, small as the hon. gentleman tries to represent it as being, has succeeded in bringing about that which the conservative leaders had been professing their anxiety to bring about for so many years. It secured in a very short time the denunciation of the German and Belgian treaties. Perhaps some hon. gentlemen may say that I have no authority for the statement which I make, but I have the very best authority which I shall with the indulgence of the House, quote. I have in my hand an English blue book, the "Proceedings of a conference between the Secretary of State for the colonies and the premiers of the self-governing colonies at the colonial office, London," in June and July, 1897. I find that Mr. Chamberlain, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, deals with this matter of the commercial relations between England and the colonies. It will be seen that he takes an entirely different views of that question from the view taken by the hon. leader of the opposition in this House. He speaks about a zollverein and says:

> This is a matter upon which at the present time, rather than suggest any proposals of my own, I desire to hear the views of the gentlemen present.

According to the hon. gentleman from Calgary, the Colonial Secretary had views of a very pronounced character, but he is represented here as being desirous of hearing the views of the colonial premiers. However, that is not the paragraph to which I desire more particularly to direct the attention of hon. gentlemen. The proposal which I desire to call attention to is this: he is speaking now of the denunciation of of the treaties with Germany and Belgium, and he goes on to say:

> It should be borne in mind that that is, for us, a most important question. Our trade with Germany and Belgium is larger than our trade with all the colonies combined. It is possible that if we denounce those treaties, Germany and Belgium would endeavour, I do not say whether they would succeed, but they might endeavour to retaliate, and for some time at any rate, our commercial relations with these two countries might be disturbed. Therefore, a step of that kind is one that can only be taken after the fullest consideration, and in deference to very strong opinion, both in this country and in the colonies.

Now this is the point to which I wish particularly to attract attention:

> Now the question is brought to a practical issue, or may be brought to a practical issue, by the recent action of Canada.

It is not the action of the former Conservative Government of Canada, nor of the Colonial Conference, nor anything of that kind, but the recent action of Canada.

> As all are aware, Canada has offered preferential terms to the mother country, and Germany and Belgium have immediately protested and claimed similar terms under the treaty. Her Majesty's Government desire to know from the colonies whether, so far as they are concerned, if it be found that the arrangements proposed by Canada are inconsistent with the conditions of those treaties, they desire, that those treaties shall be denounced. If that be the unanimous wish of the colonies, after considering the effect of that denunciation upon them as well as upon us, because they also are concerned in the arrangements which are made by these treaties, then all I can say at the present time is that Her Majesty's Government will most earnestly consider such a recommendation from the colonies, and will give to it the favourable regard which such a memorial deserves.

And then he goes on to deal with what Canada has done and adds:

> But of course the whole difficulty——

That is the difficulty with respect to other countries which have favoured-nation clauses in their treaties with Great Britain.

But of course the whole difficulty can be avoided, I only point out in passing—the whole difficulty can be avoided by any colony which desires to make the preferential arrangement with the mother country, if that colony will confine its offer nominatim to the mother country and not make it to a foreign country, but if it is offered to a foreign country then as I say it will be controlled by the most favoured-nation treaties throughout the world.

I gathered from the speech of the hon. Secretary of State the other day that the intention of the government was to act upon that suggestion, and that the preferential clause of the tariff would be modified in accordance with the suggestion of the Colonial Secretary.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Then, when the premiers of the various colonies met to consider the speech made to them by the Secretary of State for the Colonies:

The commercial relations of the United Kingdom and the self-governing colonies were first considered and the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:—

1. That the premiers of the self-governing colonies unanimously recommend the denunciation at the earliest convenient time of any treaties which now hamper the commercial relations between Great Britain and her colonies.

2. That in the hope of improving the trade relations between the mother country and her colonies the premiers present undertake to confer with their colleagues with a view to seeing whether such a result can be properly secured by a preference given by the colonies to the products of the United Kingdom.

I think it is quite clear that the denunciation of the treaties is due to the action taken by the parliament of Canada last session in connection with the preferential clause of the tariff; and, apart altogether from the effect which this provision in the tariff has had upon the action of the Imperial Government, the reduction of twenty-five per cent in the tariff upon goods which come from England and from certain colonies, is a matter of very considerable consequence. It is a step in the direction of a revenue tariff.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Was not that only done to equalize the duties between the United States and Great Britain, rather than to give a preference to British goods?

Hon. Mr. POWER—No; the provision is that upon goods imported from Great Britain—I speak now of what it will be after the 1st of July next—there is a reduction of twenty-five per cent upon the regular tariff. That is as clear and distinct and marked a preference as one can well have.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Hon. gentlemen will recollect that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries claimed that the duties levied against the importation of English goods were 25 per cent more than those levied against United States goods, and thus the change equalizes the two. It is not abolishing the tariff or anything of that kind: it is equalizing what was supposed to be an inequality before.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not remember that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries made the statement that the hon. gentleman has referred to.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—He moved a resolution in the House.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I know that some years ago the hon. gentleman who is now Minister of Marine and Fisheries made a speech in the House of Commons in which he showed that the tariff of the conservative government was so arranged that goods which were imported from Great Britain did pay, on an average, a higher duty than those imported from the United States; and the change which took place last year is calculated to remedy that evil, as a matter of justice to the mother country. Where England and the United States are, for instance, competing for our markets, say for woollen goods or cotton goods, it gives the English article a preference of 25 per cent in our market, which I think is a very important matter indeed, and the fact that no reduction is made in favour of countries outside the empire which maintain hostile tariffs against the empire and against us, is not a very serious objection. I for one should perhaps have been gratified if further steps had been taken in the direction of a revenue tariff or of free trade; but looking at the spirit in which Canada has been dealt with by foreign countries, particularly by the great country south of us, I am not disposed to regret that no steps have been taken to materially lower the wall upon our side.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—So that you will keep up protection?

Hon. Mr. POWER—We cannot have free trade at once. We have made a very considerable step in the direction of a revenue tariff, and I think we have made it the right way. We have made it so that it benefits the country to which we are under great obligations and does not benefit the countries which have not been friendly to us. At any rate, the gentlemen in opposition should not quarrel with that view.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—They do not. They ought to be on your side.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. member from Shell River is a gentleman with whom I agree in theory very largely, but I feel that it would be impossible, in a country like this, where we have had so high a tariff for so many years, and where so many interests have grown up under that tariff, it would be almost impracticable to do what has been done, for instance, in New South Wales. In New South Wales their tariff was not nearly as high as the tariff which we had in Canada. It had been in operation only some four years, and the shock of coming down to a free trade basis in that country was nothing compared to what it would have been if we had undertaken at once to do what they have done in New South Wales. It is not necessary that I should quote any further evidence, but perhaps it may be just as well that I should make some reference to a statement which has been made, although the authority has not been given for it, that certain proposals were made by Mr. Chamberlain to the Canadian premier. There is no evidence in these official documents, which are all that we can go upon, to show that any offer was made. I find in the Toronto Globe, however, of the 13th November last, a statement, which I presume, is at least as reliable as the statements made by hon. gentlemen in opposition, to the effect that Mr. Chamberlain made the proposition that there should be absolute free trade between Britain and her colonies on the condition that the former placed a small customs tax on commodities from foreign countries, and it is stated in the same place that Sir Wilfrid Laurier, speaking for Canada, said that he could not accept such an offer, that the Canadian government had already arranged for an abatement of duties on British goods to the extent of 25 per cent, and as the whole fabric of Canadian finance as well as Canadian industry was founded on customs duties we could not consider a proposal to remove them in toto. In the course of the hon. gentleman's speech he laid down some sound theoretical doctrines with respect to free trade, and I took the liberty of indicating my concurrence in his views by saying "hear, hear." The hon. gentleman apparently thought that my "hear, hear" was ironical. I wish to assure him that it was not, and I hope the day is coming, and within our time, when we shall get down to a revenue tariff, if not to free trade, as it is in England. The hon. gentleman said—and I was rather surprised at his saying it—with respect to the tariff, that the duty on iron had been reduced and the bounty had been increased, and that that was making matters worse. I am rather surprised at that. Looking at the matter from the hon. gentleman's point of view, I should not think that. The objection to the duty is that it makes every one who consumes pig iron pay more for the iron which they consume, while the bounty takes the money directly out of the treasury and confers a benefit on the maker of pig iron without increasing the burden on those who use pig iron; and for my part I prefer the bounty to the duty. I prefer it also for this reason, that the bounty is a thing which impresses the average man more, and is less likely to remain than the duty.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The objection I raised was not to the increase of the bounties, but to giving the bounty for the production of iron from imported ore.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The object of the duty and the object of the bounty are the same. The object is to encourage the manufacture of pig iron in Canada, and it has been found by experience that it is necessary to employ a certain quantity of foreign ore to mix with the Canadian ore for the purpose of making the iron, and the bounty as it stood before was practically of comparatively little value. I hope we shall before long be in such a position that our industries will all stand upon their own bases and will not require either bounty or duties beyond the duty that may be necessary for revenue. With respect to the tariff, that hon. gentleman or some hon. gentleman wished to know if I was satisfied; I am not altogether satisfied with the tariff in its present position. I think it is better than it was a year ago, built as it is susceptible of improvement still, and I hope to see it improved. Speaking simply for myself I may say one of the points about the tariff which strikes me as objectionable, from a revenue point of view at any rate, is the admission free of duty of vast quantities of goods which are denominated raw materials. If the absolute necessities of life were admitted free, I could perhaps see the fairness of admitting raw materials free. That is the English practice, but it seems to me that while there are duties on the necessaries of life, the manufacturers' raw material should pay a small duty too. Last year the amount of raw materials imported free was somewhere in the neighbourhood of forty millions of dollars. Remember, I am speaking simply for myself. It occurs to me that a small duty of, say, five per cent on that forty millions of dollars would bring in something in the neighbourhood of two millions of dollars to the revenue, and I do not know any way in which the government could better get a revenue than in that way. The manufacturers' products are amply protected, and I think that they might pay a small revenue duty on their raw materials as other people pay duty on the necessaries of life.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That is getting further away from free trade.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think so; it is a revenue tariff and that is the way to get revenue. It is not treating manufacturers as favourites of parliament when every one else is not favoured, but putting all on the same footing. The small duty of five per cent could not hurt the manufacturers materially, and it would help the rest of the community very materially. I dare say the hon. gentleman from Shell River would be pleased if I should devote more attention to the tariff, but I regret to say, and I think the House will say that I have already devoted too much to it. I hope before long to see a further reduction of the duty on coal oil, but in saying so, I speak for myself alone. The fourth paragraph of the speech deals with the recent gold discoveries on the Yukon and its tributaries. The paragraph also refers to the contract entered into subject to our approval. This matter has been dealt with at very considerable length already in the course of this debate. I am not objecting to it. I think perhaps on the whole the government have reason to congratulate themselves on the fact that the opposition have devoted so much time to this Yukon contract. Strictly speaking, it would be more regular to wait until the government measure, which is now before the other House of parliament, came to the Senate, before discussing it at such length, but the course which has been adopted has its advantages as well as its disadvantages. Looking at this contract, every one must say that there is great necessity for prompt action, for exceedingly prompt action. Every one does agree with respect to that point: there is no difference of opinion. Thousands of people are hastening to get into that country, and I presume that later on in the season, when the winter winds begin to blow in the Klondike region again, most of those thousands of people will be in a great hurry to get out again, and it is an absolute duty on the part of the government, having done their best to warn the people against going in, to try and furnish them with the means of getting out. Hon. gentlemen should consider what the effect of the Senate rejecting this measure would be. Suppose we throw out the measure which is now before the other House; we cannot stop those who are going to the Klondike from going in, there will be almost no means of getting those thousands out again or getting food in to them—and if there was great difficulty getting food in for those who were there when winter set in last fall, the consequence would be very much more serious at the close of the coming season. When we consider what the effect of our rejecting the measure would probably be and what the country would think of the result, we should be very careful and deliberate in making up our minds. I do not say more than that. I do not say that if on the whole the measure does not commend itself to the judgment of the House they should pass it, but we should be careful and deliberate before making up our minds to reject it. We should approach the question in the spirit indicated by the hon. gentleman from Monck (Mr. McCallum), who said he would like to see the contract and consider it and deal with it on its merits. Just what view the hon. gentleman from Monck may ultimately take I cannot say. I am afraid that the hon. gentleman was a good deal like his fellow countryman, who said he was open to conviction, but he would like to see the man who could convince him. It is of vital necessity that an improved method of entry and exit shall be secured during the coming summer. If the government did not do this they would be condemned, and condemned with a certain degree of justice. That is one point. There is no question about that. It is equally clear that no railroad could be secured during the present season without help from the government. There was some vague intimation from some hon. gentleman that there were companies who were ready to build without any help from the government; but there were two companies, one at any rate was supposed to be a very strong company, which received powers from this parliament last session—the British Yukon Company and another, which proposed to go in by the Taku Inlet, and the name of which I do not now remember; but neither of these companies, as far as I am aware, has done anything in the way of building a railway, and neither of them has made any offer to the government of a practical character. Now, hon. gentlemen, if public help was to be given to a road into the Klondike region, the road should be such as to confer the largest practicable benefit on Canada, Canadian farmers, manufacturers and business men, consistent with its being opened during the present year. Has that been provided for in the contract entered into by the government? I think it has. I say that, after giving the contract as careful consideration as I reasonably could. I think the contract if it is carried out will have that effect. There is only one danger, one serious interruption to navigation, between the head of Teslin Lake and Dawson City, and that is an interruption composed of three or four boulders in the course of the river, which I understand can be removed at a trifling expense.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—What is stopping Major Walsh?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The cold weather. That, I am informed by a gentleman whose business it is to be informed on the subject, is the fact, that those three or four boulders are the only obstacles to navigation from Teslin Lake down, and that these can be removed at trifling expense, the figure mentioned being something less than $10,000. Then, I am also informed by the same gentleman, that there are, when the water is high, over four feet and almost at all times three feet of water in the Stikine River, so so that the 150 miles of railway which are provided to be built under this contract, will connect with satisfactory navigation at each end; both the termini of this railway will be in Canadian territory; and the Stikine River is free to our commerce under the treaty of Washington. Hon. gentlemen may say that although it is free under the treaty of Washington, still we may be hampered in our use of it by our neighbours. That is possible, but can any hon. gentleman tell me any other route of which the same is not true, and of which the same is not more true than of this one? If you go up to the head of the Lynn Canal, or anywhere in that neighbourhood, you have to go for miles over United States territory. If you go up the Yukon, the navigation of which is made free to us, you have to spend a much longer time, and the difficulties are such that it would be impracticable to navigate the Yukon if the United States authorities interfered with our steamers getting fuel on the way up. The only difficulty in the case of the Stikine River is just the fact that there may be some little difficulty raised with reference to our goods being forwarded in bond, being transhipped at the mouth of the Stikine River, but I do not think there is reason to suppose there will be any serious difficulty in connection with that matter; and there is no other route which is less open to the raising difficulties by our neighbours than the route by the Stikine.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The Portland Canal?

Hon. Mr. POWER—It will take more than one summer to build a railway to the Portland Canal.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Yes, it will take two years anyway.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And in this case one of the things the government had to bear in mind was that the way should be opened during the coming summer. If we are hampered in the Stikine River, it may be well just to refer briefly to the reason why we are hampered. Under the convention of St. Petersburg between Russia and Great Britain signed at St. Petersburg in 1825, the sixth paragraph contains this provision:

It is understood that the subjects of His Britannic Majesty, from whatever quarter they may arrive whether from the ocean or from the interior of the continent, shall for ever enjoy the right of navigating freely and without any hindrance whatever all the rivers and streams which in their course towards the Pacific Ocean may cross the line of demarcation upon the line of coast described in article three of the present convention.

We were put on just the same footing, the footing of complete equality, with Russia by that treaty; and when the United States took over Alaska from Russia, they took it over subject to the provisions of that treaty. Unfortunately some four years after the United States took over that country from Russia, a gentleman was sent from Ottawa to Washington to represent Canada at the deliberations which resulted in the treaty of Washington, and that gentleman knew so little about the previous history of the question that he accepted, instead of that complete and free use for all purposes of all the rivers running through this strip of country to the Pacific Ocean—he accepted the free use, for commercial purposes, only of three rivers. If we are in rather a box, the person responsible is the gentleman who was for so long a time the leader of the Conservative party.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Is it not a fact that the rights granted under the Russian treaty fell entirely to the ground when Alaska was ceded to the United States, and we could only have rights under the treaty of Washington?

Hon. Mr. POWER—No. After the treaty of Washington had modified the terms of the treaty of St. Petersburg, I presume it would be useless to contend that we could go back to the treaty of St. Petersburg; but if the representative of Canada had been as familiar with what had taken place between Russia and Great Britain as he should have been, he should simply have held on to what we had already, and not given it away and taken something less.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I remember very well in this House when the treaty of Washington came up for discussion and the navigation of the Yukon, the Porcupine and the Stikine Rivers was spoken of, hon. gentlemen laughed at the idea of those rivers being open for us. Now we are receiving the benefit of that bargain.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That only shows there were other people who were not very wise as well as the gentleman who negotiated the treaty.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Our rights date from the Washington treaty.

Hon. Mr. POWER—They do now. One great advantage which the route selected by the government has is that it will not pass over any United States territory or over any waters to which the United States have exclusive rights. Another advantage is that if our neighbours act in an unfriendly manner, the railway can be continued from Telegraph Creek or Glenora to some port in British Columbia. In paragraph five of the contract provision is made for this contingency. As I have contended the route selected by the government has a great many advantages; now what are the drawbacks? One drawback is that it is open only for part of the year, but that same statement is true of every route from the Pacific Ocean to the Klondike region. It is also true that if our neighbours are disposed to be unreasonable—I trust they will not be so disposed—they may somewhat hamper our traffic. That also is true of every other route, but more so of other routes than of this one, because the only point where any difficulty can occur at all on this line is at the point of transshipment. We should look at the thing in a calm and deliberate way. I do not think that any hon. gentleman in the opposition here is anxious—I am sure no hon. gentleman ought to be anxious—to hurt his political opponents by finding fault with an agreement which on the whole is a good one. My own honest feeling is that the government have chosen what is, under the circumstances, the best available plan for reaching the Klondike.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—We do not oppose the route at all. It is the payment we oppose.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I shall deal with that a little later on. We have very strong evidence of the fact that the government have chosen what, on the whole, was under the circumstances, the best available route for getting into the Klondike, in the fact that the leader of the opposition, a gentleman who is familiar with the question, who has been out in British Columbia and who has been interesting himself in the best method of getting into the Klondike region, was in favour of the government scheme and approved of it. He was in a better position to understand the question than most members of either house of parliament, and he declared, in the most open and unreserved way, his approval of the route selected and of the general character of the agreement. It is true that we have had indications recently that the views of the hon. gentleman, as expressed on three or four different occasions, and expressed without any reservation at all to the representatives of important newspapers, are not the views expressed by some of the hon. gentleman's followers. It has occurred to me that possibly, in the case of the hon. gentleman who now leads the Conservative party, and who succeeded the hon. gentleman who leads the opposition in this House, there may be developing some kind of combination which the hon. leader of this House designated as a nest of traitors. I notice that two of the gentlemen who were conspicuous on the former occasion have been very active in their condemnation of the route and contract which their present leader had cordially endorsed. I have said enough to show that the government were obliged to take some steps such as they have taken, and that the route they selected was on the whole the best they could have selected. Not the weakest reason for thinking so is the view that was taken by the present leader of the opposition in the other House of parliament. That of course is all subject to this condition: is the agreement for the use of this route and for the construction of the railway by this route, fair and reasonable in its terms? That of course we can only gather from looking at it. I do not propose to deal at any length with the different paragraphs of the agreement. At this stage, that would not be fair. The first paragraph in the contract contains one provision to which I shall direct attention:

> The said railway, when fully completed, to be of the general standard and gauge of the Kaslo and Slocan Railway, in British Columbia, and according to the specifications to be approved by the Minister or Railways.

As I understand, the Kaslo and Slocan Railway carries very heavy loads of minerals, and the rails are 45 lb. rails, and not 30 lb.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—What is the gauge?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Three feet or three feet six. The specifications are to be approved by the Minister of Railways. It would be impossible to construct a broad gauge railway in the time the company have, and it is said this Kaslo and Slocan Railway carries very heavy loads. The contract also provides that while the railway is to be the property of the company, it is to be subject to inspection and approval by an engineer to be named by the government before being accepted by the government. There is provision made for the extension of the road northward to Dawson City, and for an extension of the road south to an open port in British Columbia. There is also provision made for building branch lines, but the right shall not be exercised without the consent of the Governor in Council. I think that is a wise provision, because after having this road built on a route, which we think to the best advantage of Canada, it may not be desirable that a road should be built to Lynn Canal across United States territory. The fourth paragraph of this agreement is one to which objection has been taken, but in my humble judgment it is one to which no reasonable objection can be raised:

> For five years from the 1st September, 1898, no line of railway shall be authorized by parliament to be constructed from Lynn Canal or thereabouts, or from any point at or near the international boundary between Canada and Alaska into the Yukon district, and for five years from said date no aid in land or money shall be granted to any person or company other than the contractors and the contractors' company to assist in building any such railway.

Having selected this route as the one most beneficial to Canada, it would be inconsistent and unwise on the part of the government to allow the construction of a road through United States territory to Lynn Canal and other points where our United States neighbours would have more advantages over us than they have in connection with the route proposed by this contract. The next paragraph, which is also supposed to be monopolistic in its character, is not objectionable:

> The contractors and the contractors' company shall be entitled to receive in preference to any other person or company during ten years from the said 1st of September, 1898, such aid or assistance in land or money as the government may be authorized and may see fit to grant in aid of a line of railway from the Stikine River to an ocean port in British Columbia, provided that the contractors or contractors' company are willing to undertake the construction of the same at once, and completion thereof within a reasonable time, upon receiving notice thereof from the government.

It would be eminently unfair and injudicious to authorize another company to build, say from Telegraph Creek or any other such point, to tide water in British Columbia, if these contractors were willing to build that line of road; everything should be done to encourage Mackenzie and Mann to continue their line from Telegraph Creek to a harbour in British Columbia, where we shall be safe from all annoyance. The sixth clause of the bill contains this provision:

The tolls to be collected by the contractors or contractors' company upon the line of railway hereby contracted for between Stikine River and Teslin Lake shall be first fixed by the Governor General in Council.

That is a very important provision. It is to be supposed that the Governor in Council will see that the tolls are not unreasonable. Then the paragraph goes on:

And the tolls so fixed shall not be liable to reduction until the said railway has been in operation four years.

I do not think that is an excessive period, provided the tolls are fixed at reasonable figures in the first instance:

But such tolls shall be reduced by the Governor in Council by twenty-five per cent from and after such four years, and after the said railway has been in operation seven years they shall be reduced by twenty-five per cent off the tolls as previously reduced, but after the said railway has been ten years in operation the tolls shall be subject to the general railway laws of Canada in that behalf.

Then there is a provision that the contractors shall immediately construct the sleigh road, which I believe they are trying to do now to let people go in early this spring. The ninth paragraph says:

The contractors or the contractors' company shall provide or arrange with others to provide steamboat transport of freight and passengers between the terminus of said railway on Teslin Lake or other terminus northerly thereof and Dawson City to and fro.

Then the contractors have to deposit $250,000. I shall not go into the provisions with respect to mining areas, because the Secretary of State on Friday went into the matter at considerable length and showed quite clearly that the contractors will have no opportunity to get a monopoly of the mining lands.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is just what they have.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman says it is just what they have; but the agreement says that they have not. The agreement says they shall only have the alternate blocks.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—They can lay out their base lines on creeks and rivers.

Hon. Mr. POWER—They cannot twist their base lines.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—They do not wish them twisted.

Hon. Mr. POWER—They cannot get a monopoly. At any rate they get only 3,750,000 acres. They get only that out of about eighty millions, that is one-twentieth of all the land.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—If they got 500 acres it would be a large piece there.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman appears to leave out of sight another fact which is set out in paragraph 16:

Any and all mining claims actually held and recorded pursuant to government regulations by a free miner or free miners, and being within a block of land taken or selected by the contractors hereunder shall be excepted from the grant, and shall not pass to the contractors provided that such claims have been so actually held and recorded prior to the base line, along or with reference to which such block is taken being actually run and marked on the ground by the contractors.

This provision is of very great consequence. In the first place, a great many claims have been taken up already. The company cannot take up a single acre of land until they have completed ten miles of railway. That will certainly not be before the first of July of this year, I presume, and the free miners have up to that date the liberty to go and take up claims wherever they please. There is no restriction on them.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—May I ask the hon. gentleman what is the size of a miner's claim?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—About 250 feet.

Hon. Mr. POWER—About 250 feet each way, I think. There will be no restriction whatever upon all these free miners up to that time. As soon as the ten miles are completed the contractors will be able to take up 92,000 acres, and they are obliged to take up the whole of their land within a certain time after the first of October.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—In order to show what the value of these lands is in the eyes of Mackenzie & Mann, they have offered a mining engineer $25,000 a year to go up to the Yukon for them. That is a mining engineer of British Columbia, who has been paid a salary by the province, and he is now offered $25,000 by this company to go up there.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is rather an argument in favour of the contract.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—It shows what they expect.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It shows they do not expect to let those lands lie fallow. The company cannot select an acre of land until ten miles of the railway have been built. The miners are now in there and they can get in certainly quicker than the road can be built.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Am I rightly informed that a miner can only take up one claim? I have been told that the amount is not as large as the hon. gentleman has stated.

Hon. Mr. POWER—A large number of miners can associate themselves together and take up a quantity of land. The 23rd paragraph of the contract reads as follows:

> Provisions shall be made in the Act incorporating the contractors' company against any discrimination by such company in operating its railways between customers, whether by discriminating rates or treatment or otherwise, or by means of its steamships or other connections or otherwise.

That is a very important thing in the interests of the public. Looking at the thing from the point of view of a fairly impartial man, I fail to see any objection to this contract. It provides for the doing of the work promptly and by the best plan, and it does not take a dollar out of the treasury. What does it do? It proposes to take the administration of about one-twentieth of the mineral land of the Yukon region out of the hands of the government and put it into the hands of the company.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—To put it fairly, they are taking the pick of the land.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That reminds me of the surprise with which I witnessed my hon. friend hold up his hands in holy horror about this agreement as being a most infamous agreement. But what does it amount to? There are seventy or eighty million acres of mineral lands in the Klondike. This company are not to have their pick; the free miners have had several months already and have some more months to go and choose what they please. The company are to be allowed to select 3,750,000 acres out of that immense quantity. Supposing half of the mining lands were given to the company, I honestly cannot see that it would be such a very serious matter for eastern Canada. It simply means that this company will exploit these mineral lands instead of having them exploited by individuals, the majority of whom would probably be foreigners.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Bind them down to do so and it is all right.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—You are speaking of eastern Canada, but it is different with the North-west.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It does not make any difference to the people of the North-west Territories. Mackenzie & Mann do not propose to do as has been done with the lands in the North-west. They do not propose to allow them to lie fallow until they have been made valuable by the expenditure and work of other people. They propose to go in and spend their own money and make these lands valuable.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—And pick them?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Pick some of them. The hon. gentleman should not keep picking at that all the time. Does the hon. gentleman suppose that any company would undertake to construct such a railway as that without getting something in return?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Why do not other people make an offer if the lands are so valuable?

Hon. Mr. POWER—There has been no offer to do it. We pay no money for it, and I repeat that I do not see that it makes any serious difference to the country whether the mines are exploited by Mckenzie & Mann or by the miners who will go in there and who are mostly foreigners.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—What did the people of Nova Scotia think when the mines down there were given over to the Duke of York? Were there not a great many deputations sent over to get relief, and when this is imposed on the people of the North-west will there not be the same trouble and complaint?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The Duke of York did not operate the mines.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—He sold them to a British company and they had a monopoly of them for years. There was a great agitation about it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I say there was a monopoly in that case, and there is no monopoly in this case, except as to one-twentieth of the mineral lands. Then Mackenzie & Mann do not carry those lands out of the country. They have to pay a royalty on them, of one per cent. It has been contended that it is most unfair that they should pay less royalty than other people. Well the royalty is imposed on all that Mackenzie & Mann get out. They could take up the lands without any such contract as this; and it has been contended by hon. gentlemen who are members of the opposition that the royalty of ten per cent is altogether too high, and if hon. gentlemen opposite had their way I suppose the royalty would be reduced to possibly two per cent or something like that. Now, Mackenzie & Mann have to pay royalty and have to pay wages; and it has been shown, I think by the hon. leader of the opposition not in this House but in the other House, that all that remains as a rule to a mining company is about this—that out of $22,500 they have to spend $20,000. They are sending in a very expensive engineer, and will spend a great amount of money in developing the country, or developing the mines rather, because there is nothing in the country except the gold and rock. So that I really cannot understand the attitude of hon. gentlemen who oppose this measure in such a strenuous way. I can understand that a gentleman, after weighing both sides, being influenced by his political feeling, may think that on the whole it is not a good agreement, but that any one can honestly believe that it is such an indefensible and outrageous agreement as it has been described to be, I cannot understand. We are told at one time that the government have taken a leap in the dark, I think the hon. gentleman from Calgary, told us that—that they have undertaken to build a railway without sufficient information, that they have attempted a huge undertaking. That was the expression he used. At another time we are told, and I think by the same hon. gentleman, that they have not moved fast enough, and have not moved soon enough. They cannot very well be open to both charges. As a matter of fact, the government waited till they had the reports of Mr. Jennings and others, and they then decided upon their line of action in time to have the work begun and to have a road open for sleighs in the middle of March and a narrow gauge railroad opened by the 1st September. I do not think they can be found fault with for their action in the matter. It is perfectly clear that by the time they got all their information there was not time to ask for tenders in the usual, way, and they had asked some people to tender, and they gave the agent, or gentleman who was represented as being the agent, of some Rothschild syndicate an opportunity to tender which he would not do. It seems still more surprising, hon. gentlemen, that we should be so very exacting and hard to please in the matter of this contract when we remember the case of the Canadian Pacific and of most railways through the North-west country.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—There is no similarity in the two cases.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No, there is no similarity between them. In the first place there was no urgency, no risk of people dying of starvation if the roads were not built; there was no impossibility of going into the country for the purpose of administering government there as in the present case, but in the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway the land was given in alternate blocks. There had been surveys, but the company were not obliged to follow any particular line, they were allowed to select their own line. They departed from the line which had been surveyed by Sir Sanford Fleming and his engineers, and there is no doubt the company made a mistake in the location of the line through the Rockies; and in the case of those roads to which we are voting large quantities of valuable lands in the North-west and in some cases money grants, we have less information than with respect to this road; and I cannot understand why hon. gentlemen should become so excited over this particular case.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Does the hon. gentleman think that Mackenzie & Mann would take 3,000,000 acres of land in the North-west, and build that road—I mean the country between Manitoba and the Rocky Mountains—arable land?

Hon. Mr. POWER—On that point I might refer to the hon. gentleman from Shell River. It just happens than Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann have completed a railway in the Dauphin Lake region under grants, not made by this government, but where they had been paid some money and some land grants, and I am satisfied that Mackenzie & Mann would probably have made money in the end on that road if they had built it for a land grant of 3,000,000 acres. There is no money in three millions of acres of rock in the Klondike.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is where the money is.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have detained the House for some considerable time and I propose not to say anything more upon this contract. I noticed that in the closing portion of the speech we are told that:

> Measures will be submitted to us respecting superannuation the repeal of the present Franchise Act, and a plebiscite on the question of prohibition.

I do not propose to go into these matters except with reference to superannuation. I do not know whether the measure this year will be the same as that submitted last session, but that measure contained one provision of which I very decidedly approved: that whatever money a civil servant would be entitled to under the terms of the Act if he had lived would go to his family in case of his death. That would remedy one great defect in the existing superannuation system. With respect to the details of the measure I reserve my opinion.

Hon. Mr. O'DONOHOE—I had expected to have heard more from my hon. friend as to what was being given for these 150 miles of railway. As far as I can observe, the public mind is agitated, very highly and very fervently, about the parting with such a quantity of land for 150 miles of tramway. Take the 150 miles of tramway and advertise for tenders for its construction. What will it cost? What will you get a tender from competent contractors to build it for? We have had those narrow gauge roads throughout the province of Ontario in many places. What did they cost? About $8,000 a mile, the most expensive of them; and so unfit were they for the work to be done by them that I believe nearly all of them if not the whole of them have been changed to the broad road. It is a fact that in changing one of those narrow roads you might as well make a new one, and you will never have as solid a road after you change it to broad gauge as you would have had by putting down the broad gauge first; and on the other hand, when you come to meet any of the railways of the world, you can neither allow their cars to go over it nor send your rolling stock over theirs. No union can ever take place between this piece of road and the roads that are now in existence throughout the North-west Territories. The hon. gentleman tells us it is a world of rock we are giving. The hon. the Secretary of State said about the same thing—we are giving rock. Is it rock that is attracting the people all over the world to the Klondike, or is it the mineral? My hon. friend who has just sat down said that these contractors are not taking the land away. No, they are not; but what is the land worth to us when what is in it of value is taken out? No good at all. If there be gold there it seems to me, and I think you will find that it seems so to the public that we are throwing away that gold for hardly any consideration at all. Your 150 miles of narrow gauge road is not worth talking of, or being put in the scale, against the value, the prospective value at all events, of what we are parting with. We have made no examination of the richness of those lands worth speaking of, but we find the man of all others who seems to know most of it, in a lecture delivered by him just after coming out of it saying that in a certain portion of it there is, without question, $30,000,000 of gold to be taken out within a very small area. Now I rose only to say to my hon. friend that I expected him to dwell upon the point of what they were parting with and what he places its value at.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—In proposing to offer a few observations on the speech with which we have been favoured by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of this session, I cannot do so without expressing the deep regret which I feel at the absence from his seat of the hon.

gentleman who led the house in such a creditable manner for the two last sessions. I believe I am expressing the views of every hon. gentleman in this House that Sir Oliver Mowat during the time he was in this House as its leader acted in a manner that recommended itself to every hon. gentleman here, and that when he was removed from this House to occupy another sphere of usefulness, he carried with him the good wishes of every member of this body ; and I may say further that I am not at all sorry when this change was made, and we lost the services of so very able a leader as Sir Oliver Mowat that in making new arrangements the government saw fit to still continue the important portfolio of Justice in this branch of parliament ; and I am pleased to find that in filling that office they have selected a gentleman who occupies so good a position in this House and in the country as the hon. gentleman who now leads the government in this House. While I say so, I must express my regret that the government did not avail themselves of this opportunity of carrying out the pledge which they made of reducing the cabinet ministers, so that they would have had the credit of fulfilling one pledge which they made to the people of this country. But there is also a matter that we may note in connection with the vacancies that have occurred in this House in which the government have fallen short of their duty in another important respect. We have noticed that in addition to Sir Oliver Mowat being removed from us two other chairs in this House had become vacant by the promotion of their occupants to Lieutenant-Governorships. While I have not a word to say against the appointment of these gentlemen yet we must bear in mind that a very strong plank of the platform of the party that is now in power was that members of parliament should not have such positions dangled before them because it would tend to affect their independence ; and one of the members of this government went so far as to introduce a bill in the House of Commons which would remedy what he called a very great evil, and which provided that no member of parliament could accept any office of emolument under the Crown until twelve months had elapsed from the time that he vacated his seat in parliament before he accepted the office. The gentleman to whom I refer is no less a personage than the Postmaster General in the present administration. I find these are the remarks that he made on introducing his bill :

> If the government of the day can dangle public offices before their followers and induce a few, and perhaps an increasing number, to aspire to those positions they become mere parasites upon the administration.....Not only do they do that sir, but moving among their colleagues they become as it were corrupting agencies amongst their own ranks, and so a small percentage of persons in that position are likely to impair the independence of the whole body. So it has become now in my opinion a very crying abuse, and parliament is cast down from its high position, and not only is the will of the people interfered with but all through the country the electorate noticing these things are coming to the conclusion that the highest aim a man can have in seeking public life is that he may through parliament find his way into a comfortable position for life.

I do not endorse these views of the Postmaster General by any means. I do not say that they are my views, but they are the views of a prominent member of the government and views that were coincided in by other members of the government as well, and therefore, I wish to draw attention to the fact that in this respect as well as many others the government have departed entirely from their policy, the policy they proclaimed before the electors. Hon. gentlemen in speaking in the interest of the government, especially my hon. friend the leader of the House, referred in glowing terms to the prosperity that exists in this country at the present moment. They did not go quite so far as to claim that that prosperity was altogether due to the actions of the present government since they came into power ; it is only a coincidence, they say, but I would say to these hon. gentlemen that it is perhaps a little too soon to crow very much about the prosperity connected with their administration. It would be more prudent to wait until nearly the end of their term and then a better estimate can be made as to how much of the prosperity we have in the country can be traced to their legislation or their administration I would just remind these gentlemen that in 1878 when their party were going out of power, there was no such prosperity as this existing in the country ; according to their own statement the country was in a very deplorable condition. I dare say hon. gentlemen have not forgotten the remarks made by Sir Richard Cartwright on that occasion when he said :

> It is not often in the commercial history of any country that we are called upon to chronicle so great a reduction not merely in the total volume of our trade but also in the revenue derived therefrom, as we have seen in the last two or three years * * Whereas a few years ago with a total population of 3,600,000 souls we imported something like $127,000,000 worth of goods, we found ourselves with a population of 4,000,000 importing a little over $94,000,000 worth. In other words the total imports have fallen off from an average of $35.25 per head to something like $23.50 per head. There has been an enormous shrinkage in the lumber trade from $28,000,000 to $13,000,000. There has been a great shinkage in bank stock and one of these institutions has gone altogether. The depression in real estate has been general and long prevailing and entails an enormous loss. Our imports have fallen off because we have been so poor that we have not been buying much.

That was the state of things when these gentlemen and their friends gave up the reins of office in 1878. That is their own version of what the state of the country was at that time, and the glowing things they say now regarding the state of the country at the present time is rather a compliment to their predecessors because the prosperity has come in when the labours of the previous administration were beginning to bear fruit.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Fourteen years.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I hope when my hon. friend has been in power even less than fourteen years he can point to the country going forward in a state of prosperity such as he says Canada enjoys at the present moment. The hon. gentleman had a peculiar manner of showing that the people's burden would be lessened in a few years, viz., by increase of population. It would be very much more assuring to the House and to the country if my hon. friend would tell us that the public burdens were to be lessened by a strict policy of economy and reduction of expenditure on the part of himself and his colleagues. I think that is what we have a right to expect from my hon. friend instead of this assurance that when there comes a very large population into this country the burden will be lessened because there will be more shoulders to bear it. It is quite true when the population is increased there will be more shoulders to bear the burdens, but if the policy of my hon. friend and his colleagues, as shown in the last two budgets brought down in this parliament is continued, they will at least in the matter of public expenditure keep pace with any increase that may occur in the population of the country. My hon. friend the leader of the House expressed himself to the effect that our position now was a very happy one from the fact that Canada had secured the friendship of England through the efforts of the Laurier administration. In reply to that I would say we have had the friendship of England for a long time in quite as great a degree as at the present moment. It is not a new thing for Canada to enjoy the friendship of the mother country, but my hon. friend is wrong in his views as to our receiving the friendship of England now for almost the first time—one would infer that was the state of things to which he was referring—I have in answer to him to say that in my humble opinion the conduct of the government of which he is a member, and particularly the leader of that administration, has been to minimize the advantages we had a right to expect to arise from that friendship for Canada. We have had a great desire in Canada for a number of years to obtain a preference for the products of Canada in the British market. On that question a great deal of discussion had taken place, and there was a consensus of opinion in Canada that that was a very important question and fraught with great benefit to us. I thought there was but one opinion in Canada on that subject. Not very long ago the only doubt we had was whether we could impress or had impressed the public mind of Great Britain on that question to such a degree as would lead them to look at the subject as we were looking at it. But very fortunately within the last few years, an important change has taken place in the minds of many of the public men of England on the commercial relations of Great Britain towards the colonies. The first really notable instance of that change of sentiment on that question is found in the very remarkable speech delivered before the Canada Club in England by the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, Secretary of State for the Colonies, in March, 1896. On that occasion—I have the speech in my hands—the right hon. gentleman indicated that, speaking for himself as he said, and it was found later on that he spoke for many prominent men as well as himself—he declared himself willing to depart from the strict principles of free trade in order to meet any desire that might exist in the colonies to establish some closer relations between the mother country and the colonies. As far as I could hear him the hon. Secretary of State purported to read from that speech and claimed that the Hon. Mr. Chamberlain had on that occasion expressed himself very strongly against any such proposition as commercial union or anything of that kind with the colonies. My hon. friend must either have failed to read the speech attentively, or he read it with a view of extracting from its contents something that would serve the purposes of his friends.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The speech from which I have read was delivered some months afterwards at the conference at the boards of trade.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I will come to that speech. The remarks I have applied to the speech before the Canada club will have to apply to my hon. friend's comments and extracts from the other speech delivered before the congress of boards of trade of the different parts of the empire a few months later. In the speech before the Canada club, the Hon. Mr. Chamberlain discussed this question, and while he held then, as he did in other speeches, that an absolute federation of the empire politically and commercially was not practicable at the present time, he expressed the strong conviction that the day was coming and not far off when it would be regarded as practicable, and he went on to comment on the speech made by Mr. McNeill in the House of Commons, and the motion made by that hon. gentleman, which attracted a good deal of attention at the time, and Mr. Chamberlain showed that that proposal would not meet the views of the British people. It is true he went that far, but what is the conclusion he arrived at after having reached this point? Was is that the whole question was one not open for discussion? Nothing of the kind. It was that the colonies should better their offer and he went on to speak of a despatch which has been referred to also by the Secretary of State that of the Marquis of Ripon of the previous year, 1895, concerning resolutions passed in this very room by the great colonial conference of 1894 with reference to improving trade relations within the empire and he, Mr. Chamberlain, pointed out that even Lord Ripon's despatch was not an absolute negation of the whole question of improving the trade relations of the empire or even of a zollverein of the empire. And he laid down four propositions. The first was that there is a universal desire for closer union. The second was that such union can be best approached on the commercial side. He said we should reach the question on the line of the least resistance. The third proposition was that proposals already made by the colonies were not sufficiently favourable to Great Britain, and the fourth proposition was that a true Zollverein is a proper subject for discussion. He went even further and he pointed to the fact that it need not be on a strictly free trade basis; that it could be on a basis of a revenue tariff, and he pointed to the fact that Great Britain although strongly free trade in her policy, imposed heavy duties on articles which he enumerated for revenue purposes, and the different colonies might be allowed to select articles on which they could collect duty for such purposes. He furnished ground on which such an arrangement could be made. He went further and said that although he was a disciple of Cobden he had not such a pedantic admiration for the doctrines of free trade, that he was not willing to depart from such principles for a substantial consideration. He wanted a quid pro quo, and he said that was what Cobden did when he negotiated the French treaty and added surely we are not expected to be greater free traders then Cobden himself. But my hon. friend says that he referred to another speech, to a speech made by Mr. Chamberlain when addressing the Chambers of Commerce for the empire some three months later than his speech before the Canada Club, and it was from this speech my hon. friend claimed he found such comfort in addressing the House as furnishing an absolute negative of the doctrine of preferential trade. I have the speech in my hands and I shall read a few extracts from it. He said :

> The establishment of a commercial union throughout the empire would not only be the first step, but it would be the main step, the decisive step towards the realization of the most inspiring idea that has entered the minds of British statesmen.

That does not look like a negation of the whole principle and he spoke of several propositions before the public on this question. He said :

> The first of them is a proposal that the colonies should abandon their own fiscal system and should accept ours; that they should carry out fully the doctrines of free trade; that they should open their markets not only to us but to all the world; and that they should abandon entirely the protective duties, upon which now they rest very largely for the revenues which they collect. That is a proposal which is supported by the Cobden Club by extreme—I suppose I ought to say orthodox—free traders, and there is, no doubt, a great deal to be said for it. I do not deny that possibly it might be, for all concerned, the best solution. (Hear, hear). At the same time, I am bound to point out that that would not bring about commercial union in the sense in which we have generally understood the word, because that would be in the direction of cosmopolitan union, but it would offer no peculiar advantage to the trade of the empire as such. But, to my mind, a much more fatal objection is the fact that, speaking generally, the colonies will not adopt this proposal. We must consider it, therefore, as counsel of perfection and if we are to wait until the colonies generally are converted to our views in regard to the advantage of free trade, let us recognize the fact that in that case we must postpone the hope of a commercial union to the Greek Kalends. (Laughter and hear, hear). Gentlemen, free trade in this country has been developed, no doubt to the great advantage of this country for the period of half a century (hear, hear) but, in spite of that, it has made no converts. We do not find, and again I am speaking generally because I know there are exceptions, we do not find that there is any considerable approach to our system on the part of the colonies, and there is no approach at all to it on the part of foreign countries. (Hear, hear,

It is very remarkable that my hon. friend the Secretary of State, with this speech in his hand did not see any of this. I am reading from the speech just as it comes before me. It is very remarkable that my hon. friend's eye never happened to strike this part of the speech of the Hon. Mr. Chamberlain.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I read the specific statement, not the sentimental parts.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—He is now dealing with specific propositions. There is no sentiment at all in what I have read. He had discussed one proposition which came from the orthodox school of free traders in England, and he dismissed it. He now comes to speak of another proposition, and that is the one which the colonies are making. He says :

I pass on then to the second propcsal which has been laid before a similar congress to this, which found expression at the great congress held at Ottawa a year or two ago. This is a proposal which has been advocated with great force and eloquence by colonists and is the very reverse—in spirit at any rate—to the proposal which I have just been considering. For whereas the first requires that the colonies should abandon their system in favour of ours, this proposal requires that we should abandon our system in favour of theirs ; and it is in effect that, while the colonies should be left absolutely free to impose what protective duties they please both upon foreign countries and upon British commerce, that they should be required to make a small discrimination in favour of British trade in return for which we are expected to change our whole system and to impose duties on food and on raw material (hear, hear.) Well, gentlemen, I express again my own opinion when I say there is not the slightest chance that within any reasonable time this country, or the parliament of this country, would adopt so onesided an agreement. The foreign trade of this country is so large and the foreign trade of the colony is comparatively so small that the small preferen e given to us upon that foreign trade by the colonies would make so small a difference would be so small a benefit to the total volume of our trade that I do not believe the working classes of this country would consent to make a revolutionary change for what they would think to be an infinitesimal gain. (hear, hear) Well then, gentlemen, you will see that so far we have only arrived at a dead lock. We have a proposal by British free traders which is rejected by the colony and we have a proposal by colonial protectionists which is rejected by Great Britain. We have, therefore, if we are to make any progress at all.

My hon. friend the leader of the House says hear, hear, when he hears the statement that the British proposal is rejected by the colonial protectionists. Surely my hon. friend will not say that Canada is now represented by the protectionists, but my hon. friend must consent to put himself in the position of a colonial protectionist since he applauds the rejection of the British proposal. Mr. Chamberlain goes on to say :

We have, therefore, if we are to make any progress at all, to seek a third course, a course in which there shall be give and take on both sides, in which neither side will pedantically adhere to proconceived conclusions, in which the good of the whole shall subordinate the separate interests of the parts. I admit, that, if I understand it correctly, I find the germs of such a proposal in a resolution which is to be suhmitted to you on behalf of the Toronto Board of Trade.

Now, what was the resolution of the Toronto Board of Trade ? We will thus get at what was meant by Mr. Chamberlain when he found what he thought was the germ of a practical proposition on which this great problem could be worked out. Here is what the Toronto Board of Trade says :

Resolved that in the opinion of this conference the advantge to be obtained by a closer union between the various parts of the British empire are so great as to justify an arrangement as nearly as possible of the nature of a Zolverein based upon principles of the freest exchange of commodities within the empire, consistent with the tariff requirements incidental to the maintenance of the local government of each kingdom, dominion, province or colony, now forming part of the British family of nations.

We have the distinct declaration of Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, that he saw the germs of a practical proposition in this resolution of the Toronto Board of Trade.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What became of the resolution ? It had so poor a reception that it had to be withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think it was withdrawn. But that does not affect Mr. Chamberlain's position.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The present tariff is a step in that direction.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We will see about that. Mr. Chamberlain said he saw the germ of a practical solution of the question in that resolution of the Toronto Board of Trade and that being so, I cannot see for the life of me how those gentlemen can attempt to deny that Mr. Chamberlain had committed himself to this question as a practical issue. Now, I have quoted somewhat at length and discussed these two speeches of Mr. Chamberlain's. Then we have a speech by the Duke of Devonshire which was made at the landing of the colonial premiers in England—an address of welcome. He said :

Very few disciples of free trade fifty years ago would have believed for a moment that at this time France and Germany would be carrying on an enormous trade under strictly prohibitive conditions, and not only that they would not have opened their markets to us, but they would be competing over us for the possession of as large a portion as possible of the surface of the earth, not for the purpose of opening it up out of the universal benefits of free trade, but for the purpose of excluding from those portions English trade. The world has not become the commercial paradise which was predicted in the early days of free trade opinion, when it was hoped that free trade would bind all the nations of the earth so closely together that it would be a matter of comparatively little importance by whom they were ruled, or under what influence they were governed. We have since learned by painful experience that no old nor new markets are being thrown open to us by the influence of free trade alone, and that if we want to provide for increasing commerce, which is necessary for the support of our increasing population, we must find those markets for ourselves, and must use every opportunity either of expending or consolidating our colonial possessions.

These views are found to be in harmony with the opinions expressed by Mr. Chamberlain on these two notable occasions, before the Canada Club and before the Associated Chamber of Commerce. But if any doubts were held at all as to what the views of Mr. Chamberlain were I think I can quote an authority that is entitled to the respect of the hon. leader of the House and the hon. Secretary of State as showing what the position of Mr. Chamberlain was in regard to this question. I am quoting from a speech made in London, Ont., in 1896, a little before the last general elections by the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, premier of Canada, and this is what he says :

We would have for our goods a preference which would not be given to the goods of another nation. That practical statsemen Mr. Chamberlain has come to the conclusion that the time has come when it is possible within the bounds of the empire for another step to be taken which will give to the colonies in England a preference for their products over the products of other nations.

Here the Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier speaking in London in 1896 complimented Mr. Chamberlain in coming to this conclusion, and said that the time had come when such a step would be taken :

What would be the possibilities of such a step if it was taken. We sell our goods in England. We sell our wheat, our butter, our cheese, all our natural products.

He knew exactly the articles on which preference would come :

But there we have to compete with similar products from the United States, from Russia and from other nations. Just see what a great advantage it would be to Canada if the wheat and cheese and butter which we send to England be met with a preference over similar products of other nations. The possibilities are immense. Mr. Joseph Chamberlain the new and progressive Secretary of the Colonies has declared that the times has come when it is possible to discuss that question. But sir, if England is going to give us that preference England would expect something from us in return. What is it she would expect? England would expect that we would come as closely to her own system of free trade as it is possible for us to come. England does not expect that we would take her own system of free trade such as she has it; but I lay it before you that the thing the British people would expect in return is, that, instead of a principle of protection, we should adopt the revenue form of tariff pure and simple. These are the conditions upon which we can have that boon.

Hon. gentlemen say they have fulfilled these conditions. They tell us sometimes, but rather in bated breath, that they have given us a revenue tariff. Well, if they have, according to Sir Wilfrid, they put themselves in a position to get that boon of preferential trade, and why do they not get it? I will discuss that question later on. The right hon. gentleman, apparently desirous of putting himself further on record in regard to this matter, spoke in Montreal as follows :

In regard to this question of preferential trade I desire to say that Sir Charles Tupper is no more in favour of the idea than I am myself * * * My hope is—nay my conviction is that on the 23rd of June the liberal party will be at the head of the polls, and that it will be the liberal party, with its policy of a revenue tariff, that will send commissioners to London to arrange for a basis of preferential trade.

Well, if I know what occurred at all, I know there was a certain commissioner went to London, the premier himself went there, but it would be the severest irony to say he went there to make a treaty for preferential trade with Canada. It would be entirely contrary to the truth, as I will show before I resume my seat. When Sir Charles Tupper made a remarkable speech in Montreal during the winter of 1896, upon this question of preferential trade, the Toronto Globe, the organ of the gentlemen opposite me, asked "why should Sir Charles Tupper waste his time and breath in advocating preferential trade, when it is a policy that every one in this country will hold up his hands in support of. The battle has to be fought in England." Here was the declaration of the organ of the party that there were no two opinions in Canada on this question of preferential trade. Now, I will show the other side of the picture. The premier went to London last year to attend the great Jubilee celebration. On landing he was met by the Duke of Devonshire, who made the remarkable speech from which I have quoted. The Duke of Devonshire is better known as Marquis of Hartington, and he was leader of the liberal party on Mr. Gladstone's retirement, but is now leader of the liberal unionists. He is one of the most powerful men in the public life of England, and when he met these delegates and made the important statements which I have read, one would have thought the premier of Canada in rising to respond would have uttered the sentiments which he expressed in Montreal, when he said a commission was going to England after the elections to push and advocate the question of preferential trade and to get it too he said because the reform party had the correct principle working at home. But what did he say:

> I claim for the present government of Canada that they have passed a resolution by which the products of Great Britain are admitted in the rate of there tariff at 12½ per cent and next year at 25 per cent reduction. This we have done, not asking any compensation. There is a class of our citizens who ask that all such concessions should be made for a quid pro quo. The Canadian government has ignored all such senitments. We have done it because we owe a debt of gratitude to Grant Britain. We have done it because it is no intention of ours to disturb in any way, the system of free trade which has done so much for England.

This was before he landed, or just on his landing, before mingling with English people at all, before anything could have occurred on that side of the Atlantic to change the views he had previously expressed here.

> What we give you by our tariff, we give you in gratitude for the splendid freedom under which we have prospered. It is a free gift. We ask no compensation. Protection has been the curse of Canada, we would not see you come under its baneful influence for what weakens you must weaken us.

Here we have this gentleman claiming to represent Canada as the premier of the country, going back on the declarations he had made before he had crossed the Atlantic, and while he was seeking popular favour here, and giving away this important question in this ignominious manner. What did Mr. Chamberlain say when he found that Sir Wilfrid Laurier had abandoned preferential trade. He said:

> It would have been hard enough to carry through the idea had all the colonies been persistent and enthusiastic advocates of it, but Canada does not favour it, and New South Wales opposes it. These are the leading colonies, and with them in practical opposition, it becomes impossible, and I would not now touch it without a pair of tongs.

In the bitterness of his heart, he uttered these words, finding that the advance he had made in the citadel of free trade, where he had rallied around him the ablest men in Great Britain, was being checkmated by Sir Wilfrid's backdown. He found that all the work he had done was trampled under foot by the premier of Canada, who spurned the olive hand of commercial friendship which he—Mr. Chamberlain—was stretching out to all the colonies on behalf of the people of Great Britain. If there could be any doubt as to the effect of the speech of Mr. Laurier, see what Mr. Rosebery said. He was the opponent of Mr. Chamberlain, and he was perhaps enjoying the discomfiture of his opponent, although there is reason to believe from Mr. Rosebery's utterances that he was not very far from sympathizing with some of the views Mr. Chamberlain had been giving expression to. He said:

> Mr. Chamberlain had a proposal which had some force and gained some strength, but now it must be approached with the reverence due to a corpse, for Canada's premier has said that if the British Empire is to be maintained it can only be on the condition of the most absolute free trade.

Now I will read an extract from the London Trades Journal, a very important commercial organ in Great Britain as hon. gentlemen will admit. It discussed this question a little later, and the Trades Journal said this:

> From the day he (Sir Wilfrid) landed in England until the day he left he seems to be oblivious to the fact that in his mission he was the representative of all Canada. He seems rather to have imagined that he was sent there for his own self glorification and in the interest of his party * * * When he arrived in England he found a large and influential section of the politicians and press full of enthusiasm over the preferential policy of Canada, and energetically discussing the corresponding duty of finding some equivalent advantage which Great Britain might confer on Canada, even if by so doing it might be necessary to modify the free trade policy of the past fifty years.

That is what the Trades Journal said was the condition of things there. A large and important section of the politicians and press of the country were looking round to see how they could meet Canada in the matter of preferential trade. The article continues :

The complacent Sir Wilfrid following up his usual policy of conciliation which means abandonment of claims, relieved the merchants, manufacturers and politicians with the press from all necessity of further discussion, by informing them that they were troubling themselves without cause, because Canada neither wished for, nor would accept any favours. It is little wonder that he achieved much popularity through such a surrender of Canada's claims. * * * It may have been quite fair that Sir Wilfrid Laurier should claim credit for the fact that Canada granted preferential tariff treatment to England without any stipulation for an equivalent, but it was an act of supreme folly for him to tell the British government and people that Canada neither hoped nor desired any preference for its products on the markets of the mother country.

That is what the Trades Journal said and no political opponent of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in Canada could put the case more emphatically than this commercial organ of Great Britain put it. Now, I noticed that my hon. friend the senior member from Halifax, who was speaking a moment ago, read an article from the Toronto Globe which purported to find an excuse for Sir Wilfrid in going back on his professions during his stay in England. I was surprised to find my hon. friend reading this extract from the Globe :

Conservative newspapers keep up a constant fire of criticism on Sir Wilfrid Laurier because as they allege he refused to agree to a preferential tariff between Britain and Canada as proposed by Mr. Chamberlain. It is just as well that the real faults of the nation should be known. During the visit of colonial premiers to England, Mr. Chamberlain made the proposition that there should be absolute free trade between Great Britain and her colonies, on condition that Britain placed a small customs tax on commodities from foreign countries.

I have read you from Mr. Chamberlain's speech in opening the Chamber of Commerce. I have also in my possession a copy of the remarks that were put before the conference of colonial premiers when they met in June last in London by that hon. gentleman, and I fail to find that there is one iota of truth in this declaration of the Toronto Globe which my hon. friend read to the House. It cannot be found in these documents that Mr. Chamberlain laid down any such proposition. On the contrary in the Chamber of Commerce meeting he laid down the very opposite of it, for that is one of the two proposals which he said was practically impossible to expect Great Britain to give up everything, or the colonies to give up everything. Neither one was practicable. The settlement was to be found midway between the two extremes. There is not a word of truth in the Toronto Globe's statement.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend showed the accuracy of that statement in the fourth proposition from Mr. Chamberlain's speech.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend is unfortunate in his interruption. He must consider the order of time a little. Sir Wilfrid landed in England before the conference met at all, and the Toronto Globe also rather forgot the order of time when it set up that plea for him, because his change of views regarding preferential trade occurred before his landing on the shores of England, before the conference met at all, and therefore nothing which may have been said there could possibly have influenced him.

And my hon. friend was still more unfortunate in regard to the order of time, because this fourth proposition which he referred to was made nearly two years ago, a full year and a half before the landing of the premier in England at all and did not occur in any shape or form at the opening of the colonial conference of the premiers in 1897 besides the fourth proposition was that a true zollverein was a proper subject for discussion. Therefore my hon. friend has not helped his leader at all, but rather has put him in a worse position than he was before he rose from his seat. I will not go back, I have already discussed that fourth proposition. I have already pointed out that Mr. Chamberlain mentioned exceptions from free trade and named the articles to which these exceptions would refer. It mentioned food, sugar and timber, as articles on which the colonies might be given a preference. Therefore my hon. friend is very unfortunate in his interruption, because he has only left his premier in a worse position, if anything, than he was before.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He could not do that ; that is impossible.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We have followed the premier during the speeches he made in 1896 in Canada, we have followed him to England, in 1897, and we find he went back there upon what he said in Montreal and Toronto, and when he came back to Canada he went back on what he said in England. We find that shortly after his return he addressed a meeting in Toronto at a banquet and said :

> Certainly, if I thought I could have obtained for my country, for the products of Canada, a preferential treatment in the markets of Great Britain, I would not only have been wanting in patriotism, but I would have been wanting in reason—I simply would have been an idiot—if I had failed to obtain such preference.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He knew it was impossible.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Indeed, he said in Montreal during the last elections that all that was necessary to get preferential trade was for the liberal party to come into power when a revenue tariff would be adopted. They will say that they have just done exactly that—all that was necessary to be done was to put the liberal party in power and adopt a revenue tariff, and that progressive statesman Mr. Chamberlain was ready to take them by the hand, and give them preferential trade. He went to England, and before he met Mr. Chamberlain he went back and said I do not want any of your preference ; but now he says he would have been an idiot if he could have obtained for his country such a preferential treatment and have failed to obtain it. I have no desire to describe the premier of this country as an idiot, but I cannot object to the classification which he himself has written down in a manner which is far from complimentary to his intelligence.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He says it was absolutely impossible.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Where did the light strike ? Where did this conversion take place ? It must have been about as sudden as the celebrated conversion on the journey from Jerusalem to Damascus. He had left here full of yearnings for preferential trade, and before he touched English soil, before he had met English opinion on the other side of the Atlantic he gave it all up. Where did he become convinced that it was utterly and completely impracticable ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We have made the first step towards it. It may come in the next ten years. A great change would not come in twelve months.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That looks as if somebody was going to change again. According to my hon. friend the vision must have occurred on the broad Atlantic, some supernatural communication must have been made to the hon. premier of Canada to account for this wonderful change which has no parallel since that remarkable conversion which occurred some eighteen hundred years ago on the road to Damascus. I have no hesitation in saying, hon. gentlemen, that Canada instead of being placed in a more advantageous position on account of the friendship of England at the present time than she had enjoyed before we have lost ground that has been worked up for Canada and for the other colonies with great industry in the face of strong obstacles by the most eminent men in the colonies and most eminent men in Great Britain together, notably among these men who have fought and toiled day in and day out, year in and year out to put this question in the happy shape in which it stood when Sir Wilfrid Laurier went to England, is Sir Charles Tupper, the leader of the conservative party in Canada ; and the work he did was responded to by Mr. Chamberlain and there was every prospect of an agreement being reached and a solution being found when there was so much real desire for preferential trade within the bounds of the empire, but all this has been lost for the present and a set back has been given to that question, the effects which I am afraid will last many years to come by the action of the premier of this country in this Jubilee year. But I am very glad to find from a recent speech made before the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce, on the 18th January of this year, th ugh bitterly disappointed with regard to the premier action in the meeting of the colonial premiers last summer, that Mr. Chamberlain is pretty well back on his old ground again. He is not going to give up the fight. Probably he has found out that when Sir Wilfrid Laurier was in England he did not speak the views of Canada on this question. We find that Mr. Chamberlain addressing the Chamber of Commerce of Liverpool last month said :

> Our policy is to bind the colonies closer to us by all means in our power, and if not practicable yet to pave the way for a future union which will be closer than anything that is now practicable.

We shall not attempt—that would be foolish to put pressure on our colonists to go one step farther than they themselves desire to go. It is not for us to take the initiative. We would rather follow the lead; but what I think we have already accomplished is to convince them that wherever they live, however far their home may be from the centre and from the motherland, we, at any rate, are prepared to meet them more than half way in any approach which they may make to us, in any desire which they may express for a closer union, and gentlemen, it will come, if not in our day, then in that of our successors.

He says now, proudly, notwithstanding all the set backs received it will come, if not in our time, in that of our successors.

In what form I know not. It would be foolish to attempt to predict. It may be in the shape of commercial union of the Imperial zollverein, which I do not believe to be so absurd as do some political economists. It may be in the shape of some Imperial council which will represent the federation of the British races, and which has been advocated by men as different in other respects as the late Mr. Forster, Lord Rosbery and Lord Salisbury; but in whatever way it is presented to us, we shall not be deterred either by the economic pedantries or the selfishness—which is a virtue with some politicians—from giving favourable consideration to any proposals which our brethern across the seas may make to us. And in such consideration I for one do not believe the English people will keep a strict account of profit and loss.

The hon. Secretary of State read where some two years ago Mr. Chamberlain was counting up the profit and loss; but now, he says, we have got a step further, we will not keep a strict account of profit and loss.

That they will seek to be assured of a present pecuniary gain for so much concession on their part. No! I think they will look, and look wisely, rather to a future time when we shall find our reward and that the splendid isolation with which our foreign critics sometimes taunt us, will be transformed into a union of the British race, and when the sons of Britain throughout the whole world shall stand shoulder to shoulder to defend our mutual interests and common rights.

Reference has been made to the flattering reception which the premier received in England, and the eloquent speeches that he made. In these respects we are all pleased. We are pleased notwithstanding his waywardness upon this great question—that as the representative of Canada, he was received with enthusiasm, and we are also pleased to know that apart from this question upon which he has made such a great and fatal mistake, he acquitted himself in a manner that was creditable to Canada. We are proud of his eloquence. We are glad that since it fell to the liberal party to represent us in England that it devolved upon him as far as eloquence was concerned to have performed the task, regretting as we do at the same time that he fell so far short of his duty in respect to the most important of all questions with which he had to deal when he was in the motherland. Reference has been made by my hon. friend from Monck to a great mistake which was made in conferring the Cobden medal upon the wrong man, I agree with him, and I am serious in it. I think that the Cobden medal was not conferred upon the gentleman in Canada who had the fairest and the best right to it. If the free trade club had intended to confer any honour or distinction upon a man in Canada who has stood up for the principle of free trade they should have conferred it upon a gentleman who was in England also at the time, my hon. friend from Shell River, and not upon the premier of Canada, who I claim has no title whatever to any recognition of that kind from the Cobden Club, because so far from being a faithful adherent of the principles of free trade he stands to-day in the very opposite position in Canada. Now, I will read what Lord Farrar said when making the presentation to the premier of Canada. You will see how entirely they were mistaken with regard to Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the attitude of his party on the trade question in Canada. He said:

There is a party amongst us who would willingly discriminate against German and Belgian goods, and would look upon the denunciation of the German and Belgian treaties as a step towards what they have been pleased to call the commercial federation of the empire—a system under which commercial union in the different parts of the empire will be fostered by laws excluding or discouraging foreign goods. If this were to be the consequence of what you have done, I need hardly say that we of the Cobden Club would not have been here.

They would not have presented him with that medal if they understood that he was going to take advantage of the denunciation of the treaties for the purpose of giving advantage to British goods over foreign productions, yet we have my hon. friend the Secretary of State announcing a tariff change already, exactly in the direction that the Cobden Club said that if they suspected that was what Sir Wilfrid Laurier was going to do they would not have been there to present him with the medal. What the government called the reciprocal clause in the tariff of last year turned out not to be a reciprocal clause or a preferential clause, they hardly can tell themselves to-day what its scope and bearing is, but it is going to be made preferential with the will of parliament in the present session. Parliament is going to be moved by the gentlemen opposite, the Secretary of State and his colleagues to convert it into a preference in favour of British and colonial over foreign goods. So this medal of the Cobden Club was obtained under false pretenses.

Hon. MEMBERS—Send it back !

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have no hesitation in saying they would not have presented him with the medal if they had suspected the stand which he is now taking. He took the medal, comes home and his Secretary of State says he is going to give a preference for British goods over foreign products. It being six o'clock I move that the debate be adjourned.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate then adjourned.

THE ADDRESS.

THE DEBATE CONTINUED.

The Order of the Day having been called—

Resuming the further adjourned Debate on the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech on the opening of the Third Session of the Eighth Parliament.

Hon Mr. FERGUSON said :—When the House rose yesterday afternoon I was speaking of the presentation of the Cobden medal to the premier of Canada during his visit to Great Britain last year, and I was pointing out that that medal was presented to the right hon. gentleman with what might be called a condition attached, which I learned from my hon. friend the Secretary of State in this House the other day, is about to be violated. The condition was that if the Cobden Club, speaking through the mouth of Lord Farrar, believed that the object and intention of the government of Canada in obtaining the denunciation of the German and Belgian treaties was to give a preference to Great Britian, they would not have been there. Yet the hon. gentleman accepted the medal. Now, I have to carry that point further and take the position that the right hon. gentleman must have known when he heard that condition expressed that he could not comply with it, because it was at least one month earlier, viz., on the 24th of June that the meeting of the premiers took place in London, and in the opening Mr. Chamberlain explained to that conference (I have the official report in my hand) that it would be necessary for the government of Canada to change what they call the reciprocal offer of last year, because even if the German and Belgian treaties were denounced, the favoured-nations clause in the treaties with other countries would still remain and under its operation Canada could not give a preference to any foreign country without granting the same favour to all nations having by treaty a right to most favoured treatment. He (Mr. Chamberlain) pointed out, that in the case of Holland, if a preference was given to her, other countries would have a like privilege, and he explained to the premier of Canada and to that conference that it would be absolutely necessary either to go back on that Canadian reciprocal resolution altogether, or to confine the preference to Great Britain and her colonies. The only opening for the hon. premier to get out of the position in which he is placed with regard to the accepting of that medal under this condition is that he may have, at that moment, intended to go back entirely on the reciprocal resolution and not to give a preference to Great Britain at all. If that was his position when he accepted the medal he maintained his honour that far, but I cannot conceive how he can continue to retain his honour and at the same time retain the medal when his colleague the Secretary of State has announced in this House the intention of the government is to confine that preference to Great Britain.

But I take other grounds to show that the premier is not entitled to wear that Cobden medal. I take the ground that in Canada his party do not claim to-day that they are standing on free trade principles. It would be folly for them, before the people of this country, or any one who knows the history of their tariff, or the effect of the tariff, to say that it is a free trade measure. It is by no means a free trade tariff. Even my hon. friend from Halifax pointed out some respects in which it is not a free trade tariff. He said the manufacturers were protected enough. He acknowledged the principle of protection was in the tariff, and he thought they had enough protection, and there might be a duty of 5 per cent imposed on raw material; and he pointed out another notable instance of the way this tariff is not only protective, but extremely protective, and that is in the matter of coal oil. It is notorious that in the contest which took place in Centre Toronto not very long ago, the candidate and the speakers in the interest of the government, claimed that the government had given the manufacturers a strong protection, which was to be continued. Therefore, I claim, that apart altogether from the condition which Lord Farrar attached to that medal having been violated by the announcement made by the Secretary of State: the policy of the government in the shaping of their tariff, and the effect of their tariff in Canada, precludes the hon. gentleman from honourably wearing the medal presented to him by the Cobden Club. In connection with that, and before passing from it—and that is the only further reference I intend to make to that question—I want to say that I think the present government are entitled to commiseration on account of the position they occupy with regard to the tariff and its protective character. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition in the House read to you extract after extract of speeches of almost every leading man in the ranks of that government when he was in opposition, telling the country what he was going to do in the way of demolishing protection—eliminate every vestige of protection—cut the head off protection and trample on its body—this villainous system of legalized robbery—scoundrels great and scoundrels small—applied to the manufacturers of the country were made to fly like rockets in our political atmosphere for 18 years. A chorus against protection was raised by the present members of the government when they were in opposition, and it was joined in by their speakers and writers and the press, for a great many years, and culminated in their Ottawa platform as we all know. In the face of that we have, to-day, a strong protective tariff, almost as much so as the Conservative party would desire. In view of all these facts, and in view of this position which the government occupies to-day, it would be interesting to recall a warning and prediction made by Sir Richard Cartwright, Minister of Trade and Commerce, a solemn warning which he uttered to his own party only two or three years ago in connection with this very subject. Here is what the hon. gentleman said:

> There are two lessons which I think the Reformers of Canada should learn. One is presented for our example and warning in the fate that has befallen the Democratic party in the United States. It shows to all who chose to read the signs of the times, that when a party places itself at the head of a great popular movement, if the party tenders a stone instead of bread, it is half-hearted in the prosecution of the great aim it sets before it, and will be deservedly swept out of power by the very people who would have sustained and advanced it.

That is a prediction which the Minister of Trade and Commerce made himself, a solemn warning which he uttered to the members of his party, and I feel assured that it was a truthful and ominous warning, and the hon. gentleman, if he does not get out of the boat, will find the fate overtake him which he predicted would overtake all public men who, after having put themselves at the head of a great popular movement, would go back upon it, ignore it, and trample it under their feet. Now, we have heard a great deal about the denunciation of these treaties and it is claimed that the government have given evidence of a very great amount of statesmanship by the course which they have pursued in regard to this matter. When the so-called reciprocal resolution was submitted to the House of Commons last April by Mr. Fielding, the conservative leaders in the House of Commons at once told him and the premier across the floor of the House of Commons that they were proposing an unconstitutional resolution and one which they could not carry out. They warned them if they persisted in that resolution it would become the duty of the Governor General to withhold his assent from it; that it was impossible for the Governor General to assent to such a resolution. They based that opinion on the despatch of Lord Ripon of June, 1895. Any one would have thought it was so plain that school boys would have known its meaning and would have governed themselves accordingly. It said :

> For this reason and in order to prevent inconveniences, it will be desirable if such preferential duties are included in a general tariff bill, that a proviso should be added that they are not to come into operation until Her Majesty's pleasure had been signified.

Here was the instruction that was addressed to the Governor General of Canada and the governor of every colony in the British Empire. It was a circular despatch in which they had the plainest orders set before them that they were not to give Her Majesty's assent to any bill which contained preferences of any kind. In the face of that, the government went on for weeks, ignoring all that was said to them and arguing that their proposal did not come under the terms of Lord Ripon's despatch at all. They set up two contentions : first, that these treaties—the German and Belgian—did not apply to us, because Canada had not been consulted and Canada had not ratified those treaties as a separate colony of the empire. The second ground was that the proposition did not mean a preference at all ; it was simply a reciprocal provision, and for both these reasons or either of them, the German and Belgian treaties did not apply. The Hon. Sir Louis Davies, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who became the mouthpiece of the government in regard to this matter, said this :

> When this resolution was tabled the hon. gentleman (referring to Sir Charles Tupper) declared it an illegal and unconstitutional resolution. Can he lay his finger upon a single paragraph published in any newspaper of weight in the world endorsing that extravagant statement of his ? Can he produce the opinion of a prominent lawyer or even of a fledgeling lawyer endorsing the absurd and ridiculous statement made by him that the resolution was unconstitutional and illegal ?

This was the declaration of the mouthpiece of the government. Shortly afterwards however they actually brought down an amendment which partly removed the difficulty and which showed they had no confidence in their own contention. It extended the provisions of the resolution to all nations with which Great Britain had treaties in regard to trade. With that provision attached, the royal assent would be given to it, but they still contended that the German and Belgian treaties did not apply to Canada and even if they did apply in general they did not apply to this provision because it was a reciprocal provision and was not in the nature of a preference to any country in particular they all would have to earn this advantage by making a tariff as low as ours. This was the argument and with that argument the premier left for England. What do we find ? We find that the law lords decided against the government. They say those treaties with Belgium and Germany were denounced on account of this resolution that our Parliament had passed. It is significant however that the treaties were denounced before the English law lords heard the argument of the Canadian representatives. I do not pretend to say that that resolution was altogether without weight in the consideration of the entire question. It may be that it was detrimental in some respects. I will prove that it was regarded as a detriment to the abrogation of the treaties by some men and assurances had to be given that there was no danger before they were denounced. By some the Canadian resolution may have been regarded as an auxiliary, but we have it from Mr. Chamberlain himself, in the report of the conference and from a subsequent speech made by him, that when he received the resolution of the conference—the unanimous resolution of the conference—asking for the denunciation of the treaties which hampered the rights of the colonies to give preference to Great Britain, he laid the matter seriously before the government and the government decided to denounce these treaties. But, hon. gentlemen, I want to point out to you that there were in the minds of very eminent men in England at that time, and not much wonder, serious doubts as to whether the denunciation of those treaties would not lead, in Canada particularly, rather in the way of the disintegration of the empire than to consolidation. On the day previous to the prorogation of the British Parliament, on the 5th of August last, Mr. Courtney, one of the members from the county of Cornwall, brought the matter up before the House of Commons and I will just give a short extract from what he said on that occasion. He said :

> A few years ago there was a strong party movement in Canada in favour of promoting almost complete fiscal freedom between the United States and Canada. But that could not be accomplished without differential duties as between goods imported by the United States and European countries, if not between this country and Canada. This step towards the fiscal freedom of the colonies was a step rather towards disintegration than integration, towards separation rather than combination.

This was the serious difficulty that presented itself to the mind of Mr. Courtney, a very able man, as Mr. Chamberlain admitted when he came to discuss the matter with him. How did Mr. Chamberlain reply to that? Mr. Courtney remembered that the party that was in power in Canada had a few years ago advocated commercial union with the United States. He feared, and it was no wonder, that when these same men came asking for the denunciation of these treaties, their object was simply to obtain it so that they could differentiate against Great Britain, as the liberal party in Canada had proposed a few years before.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does he say that?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—He does say that:

A few years ago there was a strong party movement in Canada in favour of promoting almost complete fiscal freedom between the United States and Canada.

And then he goes on and says he feared that the denunciation of these treaties was a step towards the disintegration of the empire—to give these people a chance to go on with their nefarious work—that was what his language pointed out; and in order to show that I am not misinterpreting what he says, we will see what Mr. Chamberlain said in reply:

My hon. friend introduced some remarks to which I am inclined to take exception. He laid it down that if Canada had proceeded to make arrangements with a foreign government by which differential duties would be imposed on the mother country, then, as a matter of fact, the mother country would have had to submit. Now, I do not think that the most enthusiastic free trader ever laid that down as a policy of this country, and I repudiate it altogether.

He repudiated altogether that if Canada was to differentiate against the mother country Great Britain would submit to it. That is what we told the Liberal party in their wayward course, we told them that Great Britain would never allow it. Oh, they said, the advantages she will get by the good-will of the United States will compensate for all this, and Great Britain will be happy and glad to have all difficult questions out of the way and see Canada and the United States in a commercial embrace. Mr. Chamberlain said no, Britain would not allow it, no more than she would allow these gentlemen to legislate in the face of a circular despatch from the British Government, such as the Marquis of Ripon had sent out in 1895. But I will read on:

I am happy to say it has never been the policy of the representative government of any colony, though it may have been advocated by some politicians; but there are, as we know, politicians who will advocate anything. (Laughter.)

There are politicians the right hon. gentleman said who will advocate anything; and in this connection he was discussing Mr. Courtney's pointed reference to the Liberal party in Canada when they were advocating commercial union with the United States. But, he said no representative government of any colony has ever done this; it is only politicians, such politicians as will advocate anything that were doing it. He continued:

We must not judge the politics of a country (we are inclined to thank Mr. Chamberlain for that) by the views of the individual politicians. But it is, I think, most undesirable that a politician in the position of my right hon. friend should, as it were, hold out an invitation to a colony to take a step which would be certainly most unpatriotic, coupling it with an assurance that there would be no objection on the part of this country. A step of that kind would be a step that must lead to further and very important results—results, I am convinced, not desired by the colonies or the people of this country.

Now, so far from their policy or their past history or from anything that they had done, giving strength and force to the movement for the denunciation of these treaties it turns but that their past waywardness on these commercial questions interposed a serious objection in the minds of some of the best and ablest men in Great Britain and furnished doubts and reasons why these treaties should not be denounced at all. On these grounds I think they are entitled to no credit whatever with regard to the denunciation of the Belgian and German treaties. But it appears, as I have already indicated, and as many of the hon. gentlemen of this House now know, after the announcement made the other day by the Secretary of State, that they were even more radically wrong in this so called reciprocal resolution than we had claimed or pointed out that they were. Not only were they proposing to fly in the face of Lord Ripon's despatch, not only were they disposed to ignore treaties that every school boy ought to know were binding on the government of Canada, not only were they doing all this, but they entirely misunderstood and misinterpreted the force of the favoured-nation clauses which Great Britain has in her treaties with a great many other countries, and after having secured the denunciation of the German and Belgian treaties they were still confronted with the difficulty which Mr. Chamberlain pointed out to them. Even after that is done he said you will have to go back and modify and change this resolution of yours, you will have to do away with it altogether or you will have to confine your preference entirely to Great Britain and the chains were fastened around them so strongly that the Secretary of State had to announce the change, although in announcing it he placed the premier in a questionable position with regard to the condition on which he accepted the Cobden medal. Whenever I think of their devious course with regard to the denunciation of these treaties, and when I hear the gentlemen on the government side of the House claiming credit to themselves for what they have done and for that wonderful resolution of theirs and what it effected, I am reminded of the heading of a chapter in Pickwick papers where Dickens tells the story of how Mr. Winkle instead of shooting at the crow and killing the pigeon, shot at the pigeon and wounded the crow; or in another version of it he fired at a rook in a tree in the lawn and disabled a duck in the back yard. Even Dickens's sense of humour was not however strong enough to say that Winkle turned round and claimed the applause of the bystanders on account of the accuracy of his shot, but that is just what these gentlemen have been doing—they shot at a crow in a tree on the lawn and wounded a duck in the back yard, and they asked the people of Canada to applaud their markmanship. It is one of the greatest comedies of errors in the history of the country. It has been a series of blunders. Every step they have taken has been a blunder. They have to rescind almost every feature of their famous resolution, and the premier, in the end, will have to send back that Cobden medal. I have taken up so much of the time of this House in discussing this preferential clause of the tariff and the larger questions to which I have been referring, that I will have to restrict the remarks that I, otherwise, would feel inclined to make on a subject that is engaging the attention of the people of Canada just now to a greater degree than any other quection—I refer to the Yukon Railway contract which is on the table of the House, and a bill for which is now being considered in another place. My hon. friend, the Secretary of State, in defending the government with reference to this matter, put up a very alarming and erroneous emergency plea for them. He said in extenuation of the extraordinary dearth of information in the mind of the Minister of Railways when he introduced the bill, and for the extraordinary lack of argument of his colleagues, and for the weakness of the bargain which was apparent to almost everybody, that they were in the presence of a great emergency. When parliament rose last year nobody, said the hon. gentleman, had any conception of such a great development as has occurred in that extreme northern part of our country. No one anticipated such a rush of people to the Klondike and therefore we have been all taken by surprise, and it was necessary to do something to meet the emergency. We had to do the best we could. That is the substance of my hon. friend's plea. I must give the hon. gentleman credit by saying it was the very best plea he could put before the House for this contract. But if we only look a little into the matter we will find that this plea was not as good as the hon. gentleman appeared to think it was. I have in my hand reports of Mr. Ogilvie, the government surveyor, who has been in that country for so long a time. I have those reports and I will read some extracts from them which have been in the possession of the government for a long time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—How long?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I submit that however much hon. gentlemen in this House who were not in the secrets of the government may have been taken by surprise, and many of them may have had substantial reasons for not knowing that a great development was taking place there—the government could not put up that claim. They, at least, knew the extraordinary circumstances developing there. On the 6th of December, 1896, Mr. Ogilvie made his first report to the government with regard to the discoveries of gold in the Klondike. That is more than a year and a-half ago.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—When was it received?

Hón. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman can tell that; I cannot.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think it was received for nearly a year afterwards.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It was certainly not received in the course of the week or the month in which it was written.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It would take six months

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Making all reasonable allowance for the time that it would take that report to reach Ottawa, I think the hon. gentleman will have to acknowledge that there was full and ample information in the hands of the government early enough for action to be taken, and not this precipitate action as late as about the beginning of this year. Mr. Ogilvie reports:

I am very much pleased to be able to inform you that a most important discovery of gold has been made on a creek called Bonanza Creek an affluent of the river known here as the Klondike. It is marked on the maps extant as Deer River and joins the Yukon a few miles above the site of Fort Reliance.

The discovery was made by G. W. Cormack, who worked with me in 1887 on the coast range. The indications are that it is very rich, indeed the richest yet found, and as far as work has been carrid on it realizes expectations. It is only two weeks since it was known, and already about 200 claims have been staked on it and the creek is not yet exhausted; it and its branches are considered good for 300 or 400 claims. Besides there are two other creeks above it which it is confidently expected will yield good pay, and if they do so we have from 800 to 1,000 claims on this river which will require over 2,000 men for their proper working. Between Thron-Diuck River and Stewart River a large creek called Indian Creek flows into the Yukon and rich prospects have been found on it, and no doubt it is in the gold-bearing country between Thron-Diuck and Stewart Rivers, which is considered by all the old miners the best and most extensive gold country yet found. Scores of them would prospect it but for the fact that they cannot get provisions up there and it is too far to boat them up from here in small boats.

This new find will necessitate an upward step on the Yukon, and help the Stewart River region.

News has just arrived from Bonanza Creek that three men worked out $75 in four hours the other day, and a $12 nugget has been found, which assures the character of the ground, namely, coarse gold and plenty of it, as three times this can be done with sluice boxes. You can fancy the excitement here. It is claimed that from $100 to $500 per day can be made off the ground that has been prospected so far. As we have about 100 claims on Glacier and Miller Creeks, with three or four hundred in this vicinity, next year it is imperative that a man be sent in here to look after these claims and all land matters, and it is almost imperative that the agent be a surveyor. Already on Bonanza Creek they are disputing about the size of claims.

I would have gone up and laid out the claims properly, but it would take me ten or twelve days to do so, and meantime my presence might be more urgently required elsewhere.

From the indications I have mentioned, it will be seen that this corner of the North-west is not going to be the least important part of it, more especially when we consider the fact that gold-bearing quartz has been found in it at numerous places, and much will no doubt be worked. It is apparent that the revenue and business of the country will more than offset the expense of administration.

That letter was written on the 6th September. On the 6th of November it was supplemented by another letter from Mr. Ogilvie. This was in 1896, and after giving very full description he says:

From all this we may, I think, infer that we have here a district which will give 1,000 claims of 500 feet in length each. Now, 1,000 such claims will require at least 3,000 men to work them properly, and as wages for working in the mines are from eight to ten dollars per day without board, we have every reason to assume that this part of our territory will in a year or two contain 10,000 souls at least.

They were without information were they

For the news has gone out to the coast and an unprecedented influx is expected next spring. And this is not all, for a large creek, called Indian Creek, joins the Yukon about midway between Thron-Diuck and Stewart Rivers, and all along this creek good pay has been found. All that has stood in the way of working it heretofore has been the scarcity of provisions and the difficulty of getting them up there even when here. Indian Creek is quite a large stream and it is probable it will yield five or six hundred claims. Further south yet lies the head of several branches of Stewart River on which some prospecting has been done this summer and good indications found, but the want of provisions prevented development. Now gold has been found in several of the streams joining Pelly River, and also all along the Hootalinqua. In the line of these finds farther south is the Cassiar gold field in British Columbia; so the presumption is that we have in our territory along the easterly water-shed of the Yukon a gold-bearing belt of indefinite width, and upwards of 300 miles long, exclusive of the British Columbia part of it. On the westerly side of the Yukon prospecting has been done on a creek a short distance above Selkirk with a fair amount of success, and on a large creek some 30 or 40 miles below Selkirk fair prospects have been found; but, as before remarked, the difficulty of getting supplies here prevents any extensive or extended prospecting.

That letter was written on the 6th November, 1896. It closes by saying:

Before closing I may say that every report that comes in from Bonanza Creek is more encouraging than the last. Prospecting has only begun, and up to date of mailing, November 22nd, very rich prospects have been found on the few claims prospected on: from one dollar to the pan of dirt up to twelve dollars are reported and no bed rock found yet. This means from $1,000 to $12,000 per day per man sluicing.

The excitement is intense, but at this season of the year it is very naturally very local.

Then on the 9th December, he wrote again:

Since my last the prospects on Bonanza Creek and tributaries are increasing in richness and extent, until now it is certain that millions will be taken out of the district in the next few years.

On some of the claims prospected the pay dirt is of great extent and very rich. One man told me yesterday that he washed out a single pan of dirt on one of the claims on Bonanza and found $14.25 in it. Of course that may be an exceptionally rich pan, but $5 to $7 per pan is the average on that claim it is reported, with five feet of pay dirt and the width yet undetermined, but it is known to be 30 feet even at that: figure the result at 9 to 10 pans to the cubic foot, and 500 feet long; nearly $4,000,000 at $5 per pan—one-fourth of this would be enormous.

He ends up this letter by saying:

The miners here are, I understand, getting up a petition to the Minister asking for aid in opening a way from the south and building along it shelter for winter travellers, with suitable supplies scattered along.

Here was a demand for a right of way, for access to get in and out of this country, and this was written as early as the 9th December, 1896.

As it is now a winter trip out from here is on account of the long haul and want of shelter tedious and hazardous, and their representations are worthy of consideration.

Then, writing from Cudahy under date of the 11th January, 1897, he says:

The reports from the Thron-Diuck region are still very encouraging; so much so that all the other creeks around are practically abandoned, especially those on the head of Forty Mile in American territory, and nearly one hundred men have made their way up from Circle City many of them hauling their sleds themselves. Those who cannot get claims are buying in on those already located. Men cannot be got to work for love or money, and development is consequently slow; one and a half dollar per hour is the wages paid the few men who have to work for hire, and work as many hours as they like. Some of the claims are so rich that every night a few pans of dirt suffices to pay the hired help when there is any; as high as $204 as been reported to a single pan, but this is not generally credited. Claim owners are now very reticent about what they get, so you can hardly credit anything you hear; but one thing is certain we have one of the richest mining areas ever found, with a fair prospect that we have not yet discovered its limits.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—From where does he write?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Cudahy. He says that as much as $204 was taken out in a single pan, and he speaks of Miller and Glacier Creeks as follows:

Miller and Glacier Creeks on the head of Sixty Mile River, which my survey of the 141st meridian determined to be in Canada, were thought to be very rich, but they are poor both in quality and quantity compared with Thron-Diuck.

Chicken Creek on the head of Forty Mile, in Alaska, discovered a year ago and rated very high, is to-day practically abandoned.

The last letter was dated 23rd January, 1897. My hon. friend the Secretary of State asks "but when were these letters received?" Now, he must know the date when they were received, but I do not. I think we have pretty good evidence that they were received pretty early in the spring of 1897.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no, I assure the hon. gentleman they were not. I know there was four or five months we did not hear from Mr. Ogilvie.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That would allow four or five months, from September when the first announcement was made. I was allowing seven or eight months.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was certainly long after parliament rose last summer. We did not know anything about it until after parliament rose.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend will have to recede from that statement in a few minutes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We had general reports but no specific information.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—On the 21st May the government made their famous mining regulations which I hold in my hand establishing the royalty of ten per cent. Does my hon. friend tell this House that he would fix these royalties at ten per cent without the information I have read? On the 21st May the government had this information. They must have had it. Even though it would take four or five months on the way they must have had it some time before that. They were not so expeditious in moving as they would wish us to infer. The probability is they had three or four months notice and proceeded very tardily in making the mining regulations and only proceeded to make these regulations when they could not help themselves. But we know this that on the 21st May they had made these amended regulations which I have in my hand, these extraordinary regulations establishing and collecting a ten per cent royalty on these mines, and surely my hon. friend will not pretend to tell this House that they made these regulations without having the information I have read to the House, establishing the wonderful richness of the mines of that country? Now, the emergency plea which my hon. friend the Secretary of State offered this House the other day for this extraordinary contract will not hold water at all. There is no foundation for it. They had all this information long before parliament rose last year, and what did they do? They passed these mining regulations which have been condemned and condemned very properly all over the country—regulations that they have been patching and changing from time to time ever since. They passed these regulations, and that is absolutely about all they did until within a very recent period. The whole world was talking Klondike long before the House rose in June or July last, and people were moving from almost every part of the habitable world in that direction, and yet the government were oblivious of all this, and, instead of attending to their duty they went up and down in the country and out of the country junketting east and west, revelling, and having a good time, and did not awake to the importance of this great question until a few weeks ago, and then they spring this extravagant, extraordinary bargain which they propose to make with Mackenzie and Mann, and they come to the House in the person of my hon. friend, the Secretary of State, and say it is a great emergency. "We found ourselves confronted with a great emergency and we have to do the very best we can." In discussing this question in the House hon. gentlemen appear to have placed particular stress, particular reliance upon what we would call whispered arguments. They could not give us just such information as would settle everything in our minds at once; they had some valuable information in their minds and possession that they could scarcely whisper themselves, but if we only knew what they knew, the diplomatic reasons and the diplomatic forces that were at work, we would be willing to swallow the contract as they have swallowed it. That is the burden of the statement made by the two members of the government in this House. I have looked over the question as carefully as I am able to do, and I must say that I entirely concur with the observations of my hon. friend from Brandon in reply to my hon. friend the leader of the House, when he said he could see nothing substantial in these whispered arguments which the members of the government had been giving in the House, with regard to diplomatic difficulties that surround this question. I cannot imagine that there are any diplomatic troubles in the matter but which are on the face of it, which we all can see, and which the people of the United States and Canada are studying just as well as the gentlemen in the government are studying them at the present moment. It is possible there are some, but the man who is looking on can see as far into a millstone as the man who is picking it. We have all the advantages possessed by the hon. gentlemen opposite, or nearly all. They may get sometimes a day or two ahead of us, but such is the rapidity with which news is carried that the public will soon overtake them on any such questions as this. The hon. Secretary of State spoke of the difficulty on account of this strip of United States territory at the head of Lynn Canal which interposes between the open waters of the Lynn Canal and British territory, and I asked the hon. gentleman if he had applied for permission to go over that strip with a railway, and he said, No, we have not. The telegrams from Washington last Saturday say that the United States government have applied for permission to build railways into our territory and that it has been refused. That is the statement which comes from Washington. I can therefore very well understand that if the government have refused the Americans permission to locate railways in our part of that northern country, the Americans would naturally refuse to give us similar facilities. I can very well understand that the members of the government having refused such permission would not be very likely to go and ask the United States for permission in the same direction.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That only brings into prominence the fact that it is not a Canadian route—not an all-Canadian route.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have just mentioned the answer I received from my hon. friend the Secretary of State and the reply that he gave and the statements that are telegraphed from Washington, which we have in the newspapers, that permission has been refused to the Americans to build a railway into our territory, and consequently it is all the more likely that our government would not apply after having given such a refusal. For my own part I admit there are difficulties in this coast strip.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does the hon. gentleman think that we ought to be content with a road from the head of Lynn Canal into our own territory?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I shall come to that very soon.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I thought my hon. friend had come to it and was passing it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I admit there are difficulties in connection with this coast strip, but I take this ground: I can see no reason for refusing permission to the people of the United States to build a railway into our country, if we get a reciprocal advantage of locating a railway over that coast strip, unless a provision is contained in the contract which is not yet in it that Mackenzie & Mann will be precluded for ever from passing their charter over to foreigners. What is the use of refusing permission to Americans to build a road over our territory if you leave the gate open to them to acquire or buy a railway for which we are giving a domain? I cannot see it. I think it is a most extraordinary thing that that contract should come down to us without a provision forbidding these contractors from assigning that property to United States companies.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No; they will not have the opportunity of doing it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If the hon. gentleman leaves the door open to them, they will have an opportunity if they want it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They will not have the door left open; you need not be afraid.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have not such unbounded confidence in the hon. gentleman and his contractors that I would leave them the power to do what they choose. This is a dangerous thing, and I am not going to take the ground that we should not reserve to Canadians the trade of that country, by securing an all-Canadian route into it. I am inclined to believe that is what we ought to do, even though it should cost us a good deal, but I say it is extremely inconsistent for gentlemen of this government to say that they would not ask the Americans for permission to locate a railway on their territory, and refuse them to penetrate our country with railroads, while they leave this contract without a provision for preventing the passing over of this railroad, that is going to cost us so much, into the hands of United States capitalists. The bonding system has also been discussed, and it appears that difficulties are met with in respect of these privileges, and perhaps some of the whispered arguments may refer to difficulties over the bonding system. There is also another difficulty with regard to transhipment, that difficulty will be met with, I think, more pointedly at the mouth of the Stikine River than perhaps at any other place, because it is a question of navigation which we would not meet at the head of Lynn Canal. I do not know whether we can get over the bonding system by the Stikine River route. It is certain we will meet this difficulty at the other point at the head of Lynn Canal, and I think it is likely we shall meet it at the Stikine as well. That brings me to the subject which was referred to by three hon. gentlemen who have spoken on the other side of the House. The Secretary of State gave an explanation to the House, and gave us some very interesting information with regard to the difficulties about this boundary. I followed him with close attention, and was pleased with the information which the hon. gentleman gave us with regard to the line of demarcation between the United States possessions and those of Great Britain on that coast; but he made this statement: that the Russians were simply allowed to use that coast on sufferance for the curing of their fish.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am sure I did not use the word sufferance.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I may be wrong in using the word sufferance, but the hon. gentleman said it was for the purpose of curing their fish. As I understand the history of it, the Russians held that coast by right of discovery. There was no question about the right of Russia to that coast and their claim went even further south than the end of Prince of Wales Island, but while it was settled that that should be the southern limit of their possessions on that coast, the British held the interior of the country through the Hudson Bay Company and other British subjects pressing very near to the coast, and that accounts for the strip that was settled by the treaty of St. Petersburg of 1825. There was another point referred to very lightly by my hon. friend the leader of the House and was followed up by the Secretary of State and then dealt with very strongly and very fully yesterday by the hon. gentleman from Halifax. The ground taken was this, that we lost at the time the treaty of Washington was agreed to very important rights which we had there, as my hon. friend from Halifax put it, through the want of information on the part of the gentleman who represented Canada at Washington in 1871. My hon. friend from Halifax read a provision from the treaty of St. Petersburg, the one negotiated in 1825, in which very wide privileges were given to British subjects and which were not reciprocal. Whether going from the interior to the coast or from the ocean to the interior British subjects had the free use of all the rivers flowing through that strip of country for all purposes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As freely as the Russians had.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—They had the right to use them freely. When my hon. friend read that treaty he appeared to have forgotten that a very serious war broke out between Great Britain and Russia in the fifties, the Crimean war, and surely hon. gentlemen know that whenever a state of war exists between two countries all existing treaties are abrogated.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend the leader of the House shakes his head. If my hon. friend will take the trouble of looking at the treaty of 1859, he will find that that position is acknowledged from the fact that the provision in the treaty of 1825 is revived and I think the diplomats who negotiated the treaty of 1859 for Great Britain and Russia would not have gone to the trouble of renewing it as they did in order to get back on the old position as far as it was possible, if these treaties had not been abrogated by the war.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend, if he will allow me, will find this to be the case, that while treaties are abrogated by war, treaties settling international rights, treaties of boundaries, treaties of cession of territory, treaties giving absolute right of navigation —the rights so defined are not affected by war, are not so even affected by the abrogation of the treaty.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That is my hon. friend's view.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is the rule of law.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am not a lawyer, but lawyers themselves will have to settle such questions as this by reference to precedent. It is not a matter of law merely, it is a matter of precedent and constitutional law; and before I leave the question I will say that my hon. friend may read a little more upon this question, and he may perhaps be satisfied before he has done with it that the rule of law is not at all so firm as he puts it before this House. I know my hon. friend is an authority on these questions, but we know that the best of doctors will err, and patients will die; and this is a subject upon which my hon. friend may, before he is through, find that he is not altogether on so solid ground as he thinks he is. In 1859 it would seem to be settled at all events by the diplomats who represented Great Britain and Russia, that the treaty of 1825 did cease with a state of war, for if not, what was the necessity of their getting together and solemnly re-enacting this provision at that time?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is not.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend says it is not; and his opinion is entitled to more weight than mine, but I will undertake to say that his opinion is not of greater weight than that of the diplomats who settled this matter in 1859, and the fact that they found it necessary to revive the provision of that old treaty by solemn treaty again at St. Petersburg, shows that they held to my contention, that the state of war between two countries did abrogate that treaty. Now, I have the clause in the treaty of Washington here, and my hon. friend from Halifax said that Sir John Macdonald, the British commissioner, did not know of the existence of these provisions in the two treaties of St. Petersburg in 1825 and 1859. If they will turn to protocol 26 of the negotiations which took place in 1871 they will find these words:

> The British commissioners replied—(that is when the demand was put up for the navigation of the St. Lawrence)—that they would not admit the claims of American citizens to navigate the River St. Lawrence as of right, but that the British Government had no desire to exclude them from it. They however, pointed out that there were certain rivers running through Alaska which should on like grounds be declared free and open to British subjects, in case the River St. Lawrence should be declared free.

And we find that a provision was placed in the treaty of Washington which the Americans insisted should be reciprocal, giving them rights to use these rivers when they penetrated British territory in return for the rights we got when the rivers penetrated the territory of the United States. But there is another ground. Hon. gentlemen contend that we have lost the free use of these rivers. Hon. gentlemen say, having this right restored by the treaty of 1859, how was it then that we did not have it continued? Why was it receded from? The answer is that the cession of this country to the United States terminated these treaties. With regard to that I know my hon. friend will not agree with me; he will tell me what the rule of law is. I will tell him what precedent is, and I will tell him what occurred in other circumstances like these. I will point out to him what occurred in the case of the Island of Madagascar; Lord Salisbury made a speech only a few days ago in which he admitted that France had got the better of Great Britain as regards Madagascar. He said:

> The French armies had invaded the island with the avowed intention of maintaining the protectorate. If they had adhered to their intention the British treaties with the Queen of Madagascar would have been safe, but when the French were masters of the situation they suddenly changed the protectorate to annexation, and with the latter the British treaties fell.

Here was Lord Salisbury's opinion; I am not going to set up my own opinion against my hon. friend the leader of the House, but I will, with all confidence, set up Lord Salisbury's judgment against his as an opinion at least equally worthy of weight. Then in the treaty of 1763 of England with France and Spain, England had the right of the navigation of the Mississippi River; when the territory passed to the United States, England lost that right and it has never been claimed since. Why did England lose it? If it was a territorial right, England would have demanded it, but with the cession of Louisiana the British rights of navigation of the Mississippi River passed away. In 1863 the Ionian Islands were annexed to Greece. England had treaties with these islands for the freedom of ports of commerce, and after the cession it became necessary to make new treaties with Greece for the continuation of these free ports. Here we have illustrations, and I think I have some others in my notes that would equally prove the view that I take. If, however, the contention of the leader of the House is correct, the treaty of Washington could not abrogate or curtail our rights under the treaty of St. Petersburg, and we have still the free use of the Stikine River for all purposes. This is important, and more particularly since the hon. member from Halifax thought it necessary to dwell on it at considerable length, and went so far as to say that the distinguished gentleman who negotiated on the part of Canada the treaty of Washington had displayed ignorance. However, hon. gentlemen may have differed from him during his life, on political questions, I feel assured there is not a gentleman in this House or the country or anywhere else, who will doubt the great ability and the great information possessed by Sir John Macdonald—and when I heard my hon. friend from Halifax impute ignorance to Sir John Macdonald, I really would have given my hon. friend credit for a great deal better judgment. However, I am glad I have these facts in my hands, which I think are sufficient to show that Sir John Macdonald made no mistake whatever in 1871. I will now refer to the difficulties of navigation of the Stikine River and the bonding difficulty, and the difficulty about the location of the railroads. I will take this position, that I think this House and probably the country would risk a good deal and would be willing to expend a good deal of money to give a good all-Canadian route to that country. I am afraid that this contract and this plan that we have before the House is not going to effect that object; it cannot effect it inasmuch as without there is a provision that this road cannot be assigned or conveyed to foreigners, we are not assured that it will be a really all-Canadian route. But even with that there are difficulties in the way of navigation of this Stickine River, there are difficulties about transhipment, there are difficulties that have been alluded to with regard to the bonding privileges, there are difficulties even in the summer time and still greater in the winter which will render it difficult to use that river: owing to the rapidity of the current the ice would not be sufficiently strong in some parts for winter travelling, probably it may, but there are doubts on that score about the Little Cañon and other parts of that river, and then I think we would have to use American territory in getting up in the winter season. There are all these difficulties in the way, difficulties international and physical, in connection with the Stickine route. But I am willing to admit this, that the railway it is proposed to build from Telegraph Creek to the head of Teslin Lake is apparently in line with what would form a good trunk line, would form a section of a good trunk railway from the navigable waters of British Columbia to Dawson, say from Portland Canal, and on that account I have some feeling for a railway between those two points. But I say the contract we have before us with regard to this line, provides that this shall only be a tramway, a three foot or three feet six gauge—we do not know which it is to be—and it cannot properly furnish even a link in a trunk railway leading from Portland Canal or Port Simpson, or whatever point may be selected in Canadian territory, right up to the Yukon country. Then, again, the enormous consideration we are giving for building the link—not a link, because it will not be of such a character as to form part of a trunk line—that the consideration we are asked to give away is so great that it would, to a great extent, tie our hands in the future with regard to obtaining a through line all the way and paying for it. Now, I have a statement here of the comparative distances. They are approximate—I suppose as nearly correct as we can get—and the estimate is that from Victoria to Dawson by the Stikine River route is 1,638 miles. Of that, 750 miles will be ocean, 178 miles rail; the contract provides for 150, but, I think, it is pretty clear from Mr. Jennings's report that the railway will be at least 178 miles long—and inland navigation on the Stikine River and over Teslin Lake, and the other rivers and streams that connect between Teslin Lake and Dawson, about 710 miles; and the estimate is for an electric railway—I do not know whether it is the intention of the government to build an electric railway, but that is the only information we have of anything of an official character—the estimate is $2,850,000. We have also figures that we gather from Mr. Ogilvie's report that via the Lynn Canal and the Chilcat Pass the distance is 1,585 miles from Victoria to Dawson; 1,000 miles of that would be ocean (250 miles more ocean than via the Stickine), by rail it would be 245 miles by Mr. Jennings's report from the head of Lynn Canal to Fort Selkirk, and the inland navigation 340 miles, and the cost according to Mr. Jennings's estimate of the railway portion would be $5,636,000. There is still another route, via the White Pass, for which there is a charter as far as this parliament of Canada is able to give it, to the British Yukon Canadian Company, and for that route the distance would be 1,000 miles by ocean, 123 miles by rail, and by inland navigation about 600 miles: altogether 1,723 miles, and at a cost for the railway according to Mr. Jennings's report of $3,236,000. These are the three propositions that seemed to stand out boldest for reaching the Klondike. Now, however, we have only the government plan before us, and we have only that to deal with as set forth in this contract, and that is for building a railway from the head of Stikine River to Teslin Lake, and to depend upon water communication for the rest of the journey. And now for the building of that road what is the consideration that we are asked to give? I have already said that if that road were of a broad gauge and of a substantial character, and if a policy were announced of reaching Fort Simpson or the head of the Portland Canal, get an open ocean port there, the building of that road would be a matter well worthy of the consideration of the House and the country. But even then we would have to look carefully into the consideration we were giving for the building of that road. What is that consideration. We are asked first in this contract to give the company 25,000 acres of mineral lands in the North-west Territories for every mile of railway. It is true that that railway is spoken of in the contract as 150 miles long, and there is also a provision that the Governor in Council or the Minister of Railways can object to the granting of lands for a greater length than is considered necessary to connect the two points Glenora or Telegraph Creek and the head of Teslin Lake. But after going carefully over Mr. Jennings's report I think most of us will come to the conclusion that the railway is going to be more than 150 miles long. It will certainly be very much longer if it starts at Little Cañon as Mr. Jennings thinks it ought to start. In that case it will be 208 miles. Even if it starts at either Telegraph Creek or Glenora and reaches Teslin Lake, after reading Mr Jennings's report we come to the conclusion that the railway is going to be more than 150 miles long, and if that is so there will be more than 3,750,000 acres to give to the contractors as a consideration. I look upon this grant of four or five millions of acres to these contractors as in itself a most extraordinary consideration. My hon. friend the senior member from Halifax pointed out what he thought was a modification of this extraordinary grant. He pointed out the the fact that the company would only be able to claim 92,000 acres at a time, that for every ten miles of railway they would build they would get this proportionate amount, they were not, he said, able to go in and gobble up all the country at once. He thought that ought to be taken into account, as something that would guard the public interest. To my mind it makes the matter more dangerous than it would otherwise be, for then these gentlemen will be able to hold their hand and operate in detail. They will be able to make every miner and prospector that goes into that country an agent of theirs, and when any valuable gold is found before any considerable body of miners can go in there and fix locations the company can strike a base line and gobble up the locality. The mineralized territory is very large, and prospectors will wander up and down that country, and the experience of the past has been that hundreds may pass over ground and find nothing, and the next man may come along and find gold, and gold will be found from time to time in places that were not thought to be richly auriferous at all in the first stages of exploration. But this company having enormous interests there with their surveyors and mining engineers and experts of every kind, that money can command will be able to watch the movements of these miners, and as soon as ever a strike is made in a particular locality which is found to be valuable, they can run a base line, and at once secure the ground. The miner who is in there may be able to remain although there is no provision in the contract that he has the right to use any fuel. There is a reservation of water courses but no reservation of timber for fuel, and any solitary miner who gets into a valuable belt of country would be driven out as soon as the company strike their base line, because he could not use a stick of timber for fuel and we know that in placer mining fuel is absolutly necessary, and it is not very plentiful in that country. The hon. Secretary of State in reply to the hon. gentleman from Victoria pointed across the House and told him "why is the hon. gentleman so alarmed about this grant of land? The British Columbia government have been making enormous grants of land for railways, and why is he so alarmed because such a grant as this is made in the Yukon country far away in the north." Let me tell my hon. friend that I have gone over the acts of British Columbia very carefully and I find no such grant of land as this has ever been made by the government of British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. There were two or three companies that received land grants, 20,000 acres per mile.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—As far as the bare statement of so many acres a mile goes the hon. gentleman may be right, but he is just right that far and no further. How far have mineral rights been given to them?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is the point.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes, that is the point.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I should like to ask the hon. gentleman whether he approves of giving lands which would probably develop the resources of the North-west Territories to develop the resources of British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I will reach that later. My point is that there is not in the legislation of British Columbia or any province of Canada, or I doubt very much whether there is in the legislation of any country under the sun such a proposal as to hand over an immense block of mineral lands in the way these hon. gentlemen are proposing to hand over these lands. There are only two cases in the legislation of British Columbia where I have been able to find precious metals have passed at all to railway companies. In granting aid to a railway, on the very same route as this from Glenora to Teslin Lake, there is a grant of aid in the British Columbia statute-book of 5,000 acres per mile on each side of the railway in alternate blocks, and precious metals are entirely reserved. There is no right or privilege given with regard to precious metals at all. There is another Act, and this stands out alone of its character in the statute-book of British Columbia, as far as my investigation has gone—and I have gone over the statutes with a good deal of care—there is what is known as the Cassiar Central Railway aid to extend from the head of the Stickine River to the Dease River in the northern part of British Columbia, and there it is proposed to give a lease of land to this company for 35 years, and there is a process by which the lands are to be selected, and precious metals do pass in that contract, but that is the only one in which they pass. But what are the restrictions in connection with it? They are these: that any free miner notwithstanding the grant of these lands to the company, can go in and locate and work and secure a mine upon any of these lands, with a further provision by which the company may go in as a partner with him, and they can buy him out or sell to him, but it is provided that the free miner shall have every right and privilege there subject to the selling out or buying out. He shall have fuel and he shall have water and every other privilege and right to carry on his business under the mining and land laws of British Columbia. In every other Act of grants of land that I can find on the statute-book of British Columbia there is this general provision:

> Nothing in this Act contained shall prejudice the rights of free miners to search for, get and win precious metals and to use timber for mining purposes, subject to the mineral and land laws of the province.

There is not to be found in the legislation of British Columbia or any other legislation in Canada any parallel to this extraordinary proposition made to this House on the present occasion to grant away absolutely this 4,000,000 or 5,000,000 acres of land to this company as a consideration for building a tramway. Some of the government organs said it took their breath away when they heard it in the first place and I am not surprised because that is the impression it has upon me when I consider it at the present moment. The government say there are 80,000,000 acres of mineral lands there and what signifies 4,000,000? If it were 4,000,000 taken in one slice at the side or any part of that 80,000,000 there might be something in that excuse but even then it would be extraordinary. It is a most extrordinary contract in every way you look at it. Then there is another provision, or lack of provision, in it that is remarkable. In the Acts of the province of British Columbia, I find reservations with regard to town sites. There is here a reservation with regard to arable land. They might safely put that in. I fear there is not much arable land up there and the amount of advantage to the public from reserving the arable lands I do not think is great. But why has there been no reservation regarding town sites? In many of the Acts of British Columbia—I think in most of them—there is a provision of this kind that wherever town sites are laid out the company has to pay the government $5 an acre for the land so laid out and the government reserve one-fourth of all these lands used for town sites. So that the government benefits by the development of the country and the laying out of towns, but there is no such provision here. The company are going to have the town sites, the minerals, the timber, everything in sight, going to have it all and there is no restriction of any kind placed upon them. My hon. friend the Secretary of State said: "oh, but 100,000 acres, if they were free to select it just wherever they liked, might pay for the whole thing." When my hon. friend made that statement he gave away the whole case, because he knows very well that while they will have to take some land which may or may not contain quartz along with the river beds which contain placer mines, they would take very good care they will run no base lines except where they find there are good tracts. They need not be in any great hurry. They can wait and watch. They will spread all the country over with their agents and officers, and they can which their time as I said before when miners strike rich mines they can go in before many of them get to work or even after they are in, and by the peculiar method of settling the blocks they can freeze them out. I think that altogether the consideration is so enormous that it should be condemned, and I feel almost certain that hon. gentlemen in the government will modify this extraordinary bargain and bring it into some shape yet that they will use their influence with the contractors and have this extraordinary contract shorn of its worst features. The desire which we all have to give relief to those who may go into that country and get the trade of the Yukon country is very great, but the government have brought before us such an extraordinary agreement that it will be impossible to get the people of this country to accept it. What do we find in Mr. Jennings's report? He estimates that 12,000 people going in there and paying five cents a mile and each taking in three-fourths of a ton freight will give in a period of four months earnings amounting to $540,000. He estimates the cost of operating at about $55,000 a year. There will be a clear profit of $209,000 a year on the working of that tramway, after allowing ten per cent for depreciation and interest on the first cost. Capitalize that at four per cent and you have the sum of $5,225,000. Then there are the various monopolies that this company has. There is to be no other company chartered from the head of Lynn Canal except this.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—And no taxes.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That also should be estimated, and the preference in royalty of 9 per cent. over ordinary miners. There is a preference which they have with regard to constructing a railway from the head of Telegraph Creek to a harbour in British Columbia, and they have that for ten years. If at any time within ten years the government of Canada is prepared to vote money or land or other consideration for building that railway, and this company is willing to do it, they have to give them the first chance. That is a valuable consideration. They have a monopoly of building railways from any point from the international boundary or at the head of Lynn Canal into this country. These monopolies must be extremely valuable. We know the monopoly the Canadian Pacific Railway had of building branches and they did not give that monopoly up until they received a valuable consideration for it, and now we are proposing to give enormous monopolies, exemptions, preferences, town sites and mineral lands in addition to the earnings of a railway that the government engineer says will be over and above the cost of working and interest on the cost of construction and depreciation, $209,000 a year which represents over $5,000,000 in money. There is the unreserved timber in that country. Although there is not much of what we call valuable timber, it is the best they have and will be very valuable there. They have enormous franchises given them and all that for building 150 miles of tramway. I am astonished that hon. gentlemen would come before the country with such a proposition as this and I hope in the interests of the country that even now they will pause and come to parliament with a proposition to which honest men can give their support. My hon. friend the leader of the House looks at me. I am very far from saying no honest man can be found who will vote for it. If I have said anything of the kind I do not exactly mean it. Honest men may be very misguided sometimes and in this case, if hon. gentlemen will persist in this measure and force it on parliament they and their supporters are very much misguided in my opinion. I think the consideration for the building of this railway is enormous, and it forms no part in the trunk line which we wish to see built from the North-west Territories or British Columbia to the Yukon. The consideration is so large that I am surprised and amazed hon. gentlemen should come before the House with such a proposition. I have many other notes before me, but having spoken so long, I must only thank the House for their attention and take my seat.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—This debate is very likely drawing to a close. Before it closes I ask the indulgence of the House while I may make a few remarks in connection with a subject which I expected would be mentioned in the speech from the throne and which is conspicuous by its absence. Fortunately the hon. gentleman from Marquette has to some extent supplemented the omission by some of his remarks—I mean the school question. My hon.

friend in his brief reference to the subject, accounted for the absence of any mention of it in the speech from the throne by the reason that, according to his views, that subject was practically out of the range of our deliberations now. Has the hon. gentleman correctly interpreted on that matter the sentiments of the government? Does the government really believe that this subject can be dropped in that way? If that were the case, I must say that no greater delusion could pervade the minds of the hon. members on the treasury benches. And I am bound at this stage of our deliberations to give them a warning. We stand to-day where we have always stood. From the first we have made up our minds that we would appeal to the constitution of our country to remedy the grievances we have, and from that moment we have been decided to leave no stone unturned in order to get justice. We are just as decided now as we were in 1890 to pursue that course. No delay will deter us from pursuing that course, and no obstacles will induce the minority to surrender their rights. These rights have been determined by the pronouncement of the Privy Council. They have been determined more especially by the remedial order passed by the late government. And while mentioning that remedial order it is but fair that I should point out to the statesman to whom we are indebted for the passing of that judgment, which has finally decided the whole case. There he is sitting in this House as an honoured leader of an important group in the Senate. He, a Protestant, he who is personally opposed to denominational schools, saw the justice of our contentions, he saw the necessity of upholding the constitution, and with the uprightness which characterizes him, he had the remedial order passed. To him also and to his friends around him we owe the only serious attempt that has been made to relieve the minority of the distress under which it is labouring.

That remedial order cannot be altered, or modified or withdrawn. The Governor General in Council cannot pass any Order in Council that would modify or destroy that first remedial order; and unless the Imperial parliament interferes that order will stand for ever.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Did not the legislation of the province of Manitoba close the question?

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—No, not at all; it left the question as open as ever, because no local legislation can do away with the remedial order unless it completely complies with such remedial order.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That legislation of the province of Manitoba was at the desire, or on the instructions of the Governor General in Council and was a settlement between the Governor General in Council and the province of Manitoba on the remedial order.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—It was at the desire of the government, I do not contradict that; but I say the desire of the government in that respect did not comply with the judgment which the Governor General in Council had before passed and consequently their action, as well as the action of the local legislature, is absolutely inadequate. As a matter of fact, this action far from being adequate to the requirements of the remedial order is the very reverse and would be substantially the destruction of the remedial order of 1895, which this government or any other government have no right and no power to do.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Where did the hon. gentleman obtain the information that there was an Order in Council agreeing to any such arrangement? If my recollection is correct the Secretary of State informed me at the time that there were no records at all, and that everything that was done was simply by conversation.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The hon. leader of the opposition knows that a commission was sent to the province of Manitoba to negotiate with the provincial government.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—By whom?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—By the government of which the hon. gentleman was a member.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I thought the hon. gentleman was rererring to the action of the present government.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I am referring now to the fact that the government, of which the hon. gentleman was a member, if not the leader, sent a commission for the purpose of settling this question with the province of Manitoba. That failed to effect that arrangement; then the new government came in and almost in the same terms effected an arrangement with the province as a full discharge of the obligations of the province of Manitoba under the terms of the Order in Council.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh no.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—The hon. gentleman is omitting this fact, that in the instructions given by the late government to the commission he refers to, there was this: that commission was instructed not to make an arrangement except with the consent of the minority. That consent we did not give, and as a matter of fact we were never called to give our consent, because the commissioners saw clearly themselves that the government of Manitoba was not willing to come to a satisfactory arrangement, and they returned without accomplishing anything. Let me state again that no arrangement which may fall short of the requirements of the remedial order, can have any effect upon the remedial order without our consent.

Having so stated our position, I must refer to certain facts and to a certain documents which are now of public notoriety. Last year some of the gentlemen supporting the government of the day and some of the cabinet ministers, amongst whom the right hon. premier himself, appealed as against us to a high authority on the other side of the ocean, an authority which always commands the highest respect from the adherents of the church to which I belong. It is of no small importance to remark here that the minority was not a party to that appeal. The minority has always been of opinion they were correctly interpreting the doctrine of their church in matters of education, and they were satisfied that our constitution afforded sufficient means to remedy their grievances. But the appeal having been taken to the authority to which I have alluded, and the answer having come, we must take notice of it. It is well to state that in the document to which I allude our claims are fully sustained and the views of the appellants are not sustained. This document cannot bind in any constitutional or legal way the citizens of Canada, and the Pope does not profess that it can, but although such is the case, that document has been received in Canada with such a marked favour that it would be on our part a dereliction of duty not to acknowledge it. Those amongst our countrymen who do not belong to our faith have no doubt felt that, independent of all religious views, the voice of such an exalted and experienced statesman, the voice of the head of a large portion of the Canadian people in spiritual matters, that voice which has the privilege of drawing the attention of the whole universe when it makes itself heard should be received with deference, and it has been so received by all classes in our community. This is a source of great gratification to us. It shows that there is in the heart of the Canadian people a sense of justice which one day will come to the top and make itself felt in the solution of the present difficulties.

Now, will the hon. gentlemen who have sought this utterance, do what is advised therein? The so-called settlement is condemned in no uncertain sound, their action consequently is censured. Will they comply with the terms of the answer that they have received?

As I have already said that document cannot be ignored but it leaves us as free as ever to fight for the maintenance of the constitution of our country, and we will ever be free to do so.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It must be on some different lines.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—What do you mean? The maintenance of the constitution is a clear line, a clear platform, and a sound and patriotic one too.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—You cannot make a further appeal to the Governor General in Council.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—It is not necessary to make a further appeal, because our appeal is still standing; or rather, it has been adjudicated upon. Let the judgment be executed now! Until it is, we will hold to it. No further appeal is necessary to revive our case; it is fully alive still. As I have said, we want simply the maintenance of the constitution. The constitution is the ground on which we have based our hopes for the protection of parental rights; and parental rights and the constitution will remain the ground on which we will continue to advocate the redress of our grievances. Let the parliamentary compact entered into at the time of the union be carried out, or else let every province in confederation take its own course as before. What is the use of confederating ourselves if each province can at any time disregard the conditions of its entry into that confederation and break the pledges that it has taken. The government of no country can be carried on unless on the principle that good faith must be kept with everybody, with every corporation, with every section of the country, and above all with the constitution itself.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Will the hon. gentleman tell me where the province of Manitoba made any pledges?

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Yes, I could speak for an hour relating all the pledges they have made. I did so in 1894 when speaking here. I then mentioned the pledges they made.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—You mean the Acts they passed subsequent to confederation?

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I mean the pledges taken when the province came into the union; I mean the pledges taken by the legislature of the province when the legislative council was abolished; I mean the pledges which the liberal party took in that now celebrated election of St. François Xavier; I mean the pledges Mr. Greenway took when he formed his government; I mean the school legislation passed by the local legislature subsequent to its entry into confederation, which is more than a pledge; I mean the pledges that were taken both by the local authorities and by the federal authorities when they invited the people of the eastern provinces to go and settle in Manitoba in order that the immense resources of that province could be worked up. That invitation was coupled with the assurance that the educational laws in particular afforded protection to the views of everybody, and that they could and would not be disturbed. If such representations had not been made, I for one would not have gone there and worked for the colonization of that province. To-day, all these pledges are violated. It is to the shame of Canada that for eight long years the constitution has been so violated.

Under the circumstances I say that we must maintain our claims. We will not recede one iota from the position we have taken from the first. At the same time I must say this, that while holding such a position, we do not want to put any obstacles in the way of an equitable settlement. We have justice on our side; we have the constitution on our side, we want also to put generosity on our side. In the document to which I have alluded, there is an invitation to every one of us to be moderate, there is an invitation to peace and harmony. We love peace, and we desire peace. We are cheerfully willing to follow the advice that is contained in that document. At present it might be contended that sufficient time has not yet elapsed since that utterance has been made known, to enable the competent authorities to come to a decision. I take it for granted that those who have appealed to Rome have done so with a view to abiding by the decision they should receive. Now, granting that they have not had time to effect anything up to the present, we are willing to be patient, but patience does not mean surrender. If the competent authorities are willing to do what is right, let them do so of their own motion within a reasonable time. If full justice is given, well and good; if not, if no justice at all is rendered to us, or if only partial justice is given us, it will be our duty to maintain our position and to continue the fight we began in 1890; it is our duty to make the government and the country acquainted with our determination to take the constitution into our hands, and without any break in our efforts, ask parliament to redeem the honour of this Canada of ours, which stands to-day, I regret to say, in an unenviable position. The other day the right honourable premier closed a speech in another place by a eulogy of liberty. Liberty is just what we want. But there is no liberty where the constitution is violated. There is no liberty where a crushing injustice is done to so large a portion of the people; and to use the words of Sir A. T. Galt, there is no greater injustice than to force a people to educate their children contrary to their conscientious convictions. As British subjects, as citizens of Canada, we are entitled to the protection of the constitution and of those who are called to carry on the government of Her Majesty. And this protection we will continue to claim and surely sooner or later we shall get it.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Will the hon. gentleman tell us what he expects this parliament to do in the matter?

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I will tell the hon.gentleman what I wish should take place. I wish that the local government of the province should remedy the grievances of the minority of their own motion. That is our due, first because the local government were the offenders, and second because they are the competent and proper authority to deal first with the question. As an adherent to constitutional principles, I say that since education rests with the local government, I am quite willing to leave it in their hands, but when the constitution is being violated and the local government refuses to redress the grievances that they themselves created, as in this case, and more particularly since the remedial order was passed, parliament is vested with jurisdiction in the matter, and it is the duty of the government to introduce remedial legislation and of this parliament to adopt it.

Before resuming my seat I want to refer to another subject which is not mentioned in the speech from the throne, but which is very important— an insolvency law. Trade generally, as represented by the different boards of trade, has been asking for such a law for some time past. It seems to me that these wishes should receive the favourable attention of parliament. I am not aware whether the government will or will not submit such a bill to our consideration. But it is my opinion that they should. While holding that opinion, I desire to express now some views that I hold about it. The last insolvency law would have been a tolerably good law were it not for two of its features—the facility afforded to some people to put themselves under the operation of the law, while really they were not entitled to enjoy that privilege, and especially the existence of official assignees. I do not wish that what I am about to say should be applied to all the official assignees of the time. I know that there were good men who did their duties in a creditable way to themselves and to those whose interests were laid into their hands. But the reverse, I regret to say, has been the rule. I have known personally official assignees who had agents and canvassers in the country, whose work was to induce people to take an undue advantage of the law. That work was carried out in the most dishonest way, and some of those official assignees should have been thrown in the gaol rather than occupy the responsible position they had. In a new law the office of official assignee should be abolished. The estate of an insolvent should be vested in the hands of a permanent officer, remunerated not by fees, but by a fixed salary, an officer whose position would be similar to a clerk of the court, and to tell all what I think about this I say that an insolvency law should provide for the appointment of a special tribunal—a tribunal of commerce whose functions should be to receive the estate of the insolvents, to administer the same, and to dispose of the different claims that might arise. The whole administration of that law should be organized in a judicial way. I would go as far as taking out of the hands of the creditors the whole matter. This I know would be a bold step perhaps, but I am sure that on the whole the creditors themselves would be the gainers. By this way you would prevent undue preferences. The clerk of that court having no interest in the matter would accomplish his duty as the clerk of any other court does. The members of that tribunal also would look only to justice and to the best interests of the creditors. The difficulty is not precisely to make a law acceptable to the trade, but it is to administer the law. No good administration can be obtained if the doors are open to greed and dishonesty. But if you have a law whose administration is based upon a judicial principle, and carried on by officers having no interest whatever, one way or other, simply holding the responsible position of judges or the like, then I believe you would have a good administration and as a result, satisfaction amongst the trade community. The members of that tribunal should not necessarily be lawyers. Some men of high repute chosen amongst the mercantile community might be introduced in the composition of that tribunal along side with gentlemen of the legal fraternity. These are a few points which I ask the government to consider. To my mind there is no better way of insuring the good working of an insolvency law.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—This debate has been protracted to such a length that I do not intend to speak at any length. The leader of the opposition the other day alluded to some measures which he thought ought to be introduced in the speech from the throne. I wish to supplement those mentioned by the leader of the opposition with two other measures which I think are of vital importance, and of such interest to the country that they might have merited a place in the speech delivered from the throne by His Excellency. The first to which I shall refer is the Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal. This project has been before the country for upwards of fifty years ; the work on this proposed canal was commenced on the route between the two lakes above the city of Ottawa. Owing to the difficulty experienced at that time in blasting the stone in that locality, it was found impossible to continue the excavation. At that time, as you all know, we had not the explosives that are now used, and the work was abandoned. Since that time, although it has agitated the public mind to a certain extent, it has been regarded as merely a local project emanating from the city of Ottawa, and, as you all know, the counties on the St. Lawrence, and in west Ontario were not in favour of it. We had not sufficient influence to carry out this work. The public works constructed about that time, and which have been in progress up to the present time, were of such magnitude that the various governments of Canada have not been in a position to prosecute this very great undertaking. Since that time I am glad to say there is a general feeling prevailing throughout the country that this is a work of vital importance, both commercially and nationally, and now I believe there is a feeling that this canal should be constructed. The benefit to the Dominion arising from its construction would be so great that I believe when the country becomes possessed of the facts they will unanimously agree that the government ought to undertake this work, particularly when such a favourable arrangement can be made as I believe can be made under existing circumstances. The boards of trade of this country have unanimously agreed that this work will benefit the country and will overshadow in this direction any previous undertaking. It is true that the public mind now is very much agitated about the waterways and the canals of this country. We are prosecuting a very serious undertaking in deepening the canals, and enlarging the locks so as to accommodate a larger class of vessels. That can be accomplished. There is no doubt with money and with the ingenuity that men possess at the present time almost any engineering feat can be accomplished, but there are two disadvantages with regard to the existing route, one is the proximity of the St. Lawrence canals to the frontier, and the other is the greater distance from the upper lakes to the sea-board by that route as compared with the Ottawa route. These disadvantages cannot be overcome, and therefore, it is of vital importance that the whole subject should be taken into consideration by the people, with a view to deciding whether it will be in the interests of the whole country to have this work begun at an early date. The great North-west, as you all know, is developing rapidly and before very long it will furnish such a volume of trade as will necessitate better means of transportation than we possess at the present time. I am glad to inform you that this subject is now attracting a great deal of attention in Great Britain Last year it was brought before the business men of England and the newspapers, the Times and other papers have commented upon it very favourably, and they entertain the opinion that it is a work that will benefit the empire to a very great extent. As a work for defence, it must be conceded that it will afford a route for naval purposes that cannot be obtained in any other way. Some seventy or eighty years ago the canals on the lower Ottawa between Montreal and Ottawa and the Rideau Canal between Ottawa and Kingston were constructed with a view to defence of the character that was required in those primitive days, but how much greater is that required at the present time.

We all know we may have advanced and that the people in England now are looking forward to having some defences in this country, and there is no way by which it can be better accomplished than by the construction of this canal. All the engineers and scientific men who have given this matter any thought or consideration have come to the conclusion that there is no route so short and so favourably situated as this one for the purpose of transporting the products of the North-west to the sea-shore. Under these circumstances, I think it is a matter which might well have been considered by the government and should have been alluded to in the speech. I am in a position to state to-day that there is a company organized under the Act passed some time ago, prepared to build that canal and spend some fifteen millions in its construction.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—And to have it complete and in running order in 3½ to 4 years for six years before they ask this country one dollar. At that time they expect a subsidy for twenty years, and I am informed on good authority that the imperial government will supplement the aid to the extent of one-half of the amount of the federal subsidy. I believe that every Governor General we have had including the present representative of Her Majesty, has been convinced of the desirability of having this canal constructed. All doubt has been removed as to the practicability and necessity of the undertaking, and the contractors who are willing to do this work are the celebrated firm known as Pearson & Co., men who have prosecuted the largest works in the world. They are prepared to undertake this work. They were concerned in the Back Hall tunnel under the Thames and the Halifax naval dock in Nova Scotia, and are now constructing a canal in Mexico, one of the largest in the world. Mr. Benjamin Baker, one of the most celebrated engineers in the world, is to be the engineer associated with Mr. T. C. Clarke, who, as hon. gentlemen know, was one of the parties who surveyed this canal some forty or fifty years ago. Therefore, it is quite apparent that this matter is a live one, and there is every prospect of the canal being constructed provided the government see their way to give the subsidy that I have mentioned, I hope they will do so and I intend to ask the House in a few days to name a committee in order that the whole of the facts may be brought before the notice of the people of this country, and by their decision we must abide. I believe they will find that it will be of advantage to all the people of the country. I am told that a bushel of wheat can be transported from Lake Huron to Quebec or Montreal by this route for less than one cent per bushel which ought to be sufficient inducement for any government to take this matter in hand. There can be no two opinions upon that subject. There is no doubt the people of England recognize this fact, and they are willing to subscribe and pay their money in order to have the advantage of cheap transportation. Every cent and every half cent that you can take off the cost of delivering a bushel of wheat in England reduces the cost to the consumers in that country.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—And adds to the value of the farms in the North-west.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Yes, that is self evident; but I want the people of this country to know thoroughly that they have a decided advantage in having the canal opened at as early a date as possible. We are now in a state of transition. We are spending a vast amount of money in deepening and enlarging our waterways and canals, with which policy I do not find fault. The St. Lawrence canals have served a purpose in the past, but are quite unequal to meet the necessities of the day. I am informed that of all the grain raised in this country only a small percentage found its way through the natural channels on Canadian territory and the great bulk went through the United States. We can get eminent scientists and engineering men to certify to these facts, and I do not believe they will be controverted. It is the universal opinion that there is no route in the known world which has the same advantages that this canal possesses for the purpose of performing this great work. Some gentlemen connected with railways—there are very few I am glad to say—object to a canal. They say railways are bound to do away with the necessity of canals. That argument is disposed of when I tell you that a barge containing 85,000 bushels of grain can be easily transported by this canal, and it would take more than 180 cars to perform the same work. More than that, I believe the country is developing so much, and the increase in the quantities of grain to be transported is so great that there will be work and employment for all the canals and railways we can build, and they will not interfere with the railways. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company are in accord with this route, and doing all they can to promote it, and are endeavouring to convince the people of England that it is to their interest, as much as the interest of the people of this country, to have this new route in our own territory. I am an advocate of building highways for commerce in our own territory. I want

Canada to be independent of any other country. I want a roadway through our country that we can control at all times and under all circumstances. I do not want to be prevented, as we were in the case of the Sault Canal, from passing through any canal necessary for access to any part of the Dominion. I want a Canadian canal for the benefit of Canada. Just imagine the amount of traffic which will come down the Ottawa canal. The revelation will be so great that it will surprise people that it was not undertaken at an earlier period. However, better late than never. I know we have suffered, owing to the other great works which have been undertaken in other parts of the Dominion. I do not blame any government for it; they could not do otherwise. But now that the country is more prosperous they can afford to attend to the Ottawa route and develop this section of the country. These are the preliminary remarks I intended to make on this important subject, and I hope when I move for a committee it will be unanimously granted. It will afford us an opportunity of inquiring into the matter fully, and then the more the project is investigated and understood the more it will be appreciated. The next question to which I wish to refer is the matter of the insolvency bill. You are all aware that an insolvency bill for a commercial country is an absolute necessity. The commercial credit of the country has been suffering very considerably in England owing to the want of some uniform insolvency law. The conflicting decisions that are given now are extraordinary. I will give the hon. gentleman one illustration. The other day in the province of Quebec, it was held that after an assignment and after a curator had been appointed to the estate, that notwithstanding the assignment and the appointment of the curator and the abandonment of the estate, the judge decided on allowing a previous execution to come in, doing away with the assignment for the benefit of the creditors. It shows there is no uniformity and no knowing how a man is situated in this country as far as the creditor and debtor are concerned. The merchants of England are seriously considering this question, and some of them refuse to have anything to do with us as long as we are without a uniform insolvency law.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—So much the better.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—But I want our credit to be good. I am perfectly satisfied that the more we manufacture and the less we buy, the better off we are. Still I do not want to see our credit impaired or injured in the English market. This matter was taken advantage of, and Mr. Fielding, Minister of Finance, was interviewed last year, when he was in England, and I am told that he gave them to understand that this matter would receive the attention and consideration at the present session. I hope the government will see its way to take action in the matter.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—It is not mentioned in the speech from the Throne.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—No, but I hope the government will see the necessity of it. It was intended to call a meeting of the Dominion Board of Trade to consider this matter, but I do not know whether it would be an advantage or not. Some years ago an insolvency bill was passed. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition put a bill through this House which provided for every contingency in insolvency matters. Whether this bill will be reintroduced by the present government I do not know, but I think it is well worthy of consideration and might well have been one of the subjects mentioned in the speech from the Throne. I now intend to refer to a few paragraphs in the speech. First there is the prosperity of Canada. We are accustomed to that. We have always had prosperity in Canada, and at the present time this comes from the gentlemen who formerly saw nothing but blue ruin and decay in this country. I am glad they have changed their tactics and that they find the country is prosperous. The mover of the address wanted to take some credit to the government for this; he admitted that it was not altogether owing to the government, but to the policy that they had pursued, which was in fact the policy of the late government. This is the best vindication for the course of the late government in carrying on their policy for the 18 or 20 years they were in power, the best proof is that when the liberals came into power they found that with no other system could they carry on the affairs of the country with satisfaction to themselves and the people. We must congratulate the late government upon the fact that the present government were obliged to adopt the policy which they had been in the habit of denouncing in opposition so furiously upon every occasion. I was very much surprised at my hon. friend the senior member for Halifax. He spoke very humbly and quietly, without any of that fire and fury which characterized his speeches when the other party was in power. It is due, I suppose, to the fact that he has come to the conclusion that the country is prosperous. Then in the speech reference is made to the low rate of interest on the loan obtained by the government. We are all delighted to know that the rate is so favourable. However, it requires a very great deal of calculation to find out exactly what the advantage amounts to. The rate is a low one, and we are glad to find that the country stands so high in England, that they take our debentures at two and a half per cent. I congratulate this government as I would congratulate any government on such a favourable transaction. As long as we feel we are prosperous and contented, we should be grateful and satisfied. Of course we may differ in some matters of detail, but on this occasion I cannot differ from the government because they would not abandon the national policy. We were prosperous under the national policy and have continued to be so and should be satisfied. There is one free trader, however, in this chamber who is not satisfied: but we have nothing to do with that. The liberal party, when in opposition, denounced in forcible terms anything approaching the national policy. They have changed their tactics, and view it in a different light now. They may settle that question among themselves. If they have gone back on their previous record, we are not concerned with it. I am perfectly satisfied the government have done what they should have done under the circumstances, and are convinced that there is a benefit arising from the national policy. My hon. friend from Shell River (Mr. Boulton) said that our exports were greater than our imports and that it was something to be deplored. I have always looked upon it that we were better off if we had more to sell and less to buy, but he thinks differently. Another matter referred to is the jubilee celebration in England. I was glad to find a man occupying the position that our premier did, and I appreciate the courtesy extended to him in England. In this country the jubilee was a great success. Every hamlet, town and city did their best to celebrate on that occasion. I was glad to see that all difficulties were removed, alluded to in my remarks of last year, in such a way as to make the celebration here equal to anything in Canada. I was glad to see the Governor General taking part in the celebration, and the military assisted very materially in the celebration. I was grateful to the authorities upon that occasion for showing their appreciation of our efforts, but I regret that some monument has not been erected to commemorate that occasion. I thought it was the intention of the government to make this the Washington of the North, and to build a structure during the jubilee year for the purpose of preserving our minerals. I thought they would have erected a museum, which would have been a lasting monument to Her Majesty's long and glorious reign, and at the same time afford a protection to that valuable collection of minerals and other materials obtained in this country which are now stored in cellar-ways and gateways, subject to destruction by fire. I thought the premier might have taken advantage of that occasion and erected such a building. It would have been a monument to him.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Why did you not do more for the Victorian Order of Nurses?

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I hope the government will take this matter up and erect a building for the purpose of protecting that valuable collection It is necessary not merely in the interest of Ottawa, but in the interest of the whole Dominion. If the building containing that collection were consumed, money could not replace it. There is nothing like taking advantage of every means of protection, and we should build a fireproof building to preserve these things. With reference to imperial trade, so much has been said about it that very little remains for me to say. I should like to see if possible a preference given to Canada in the British market. Whether it is possible is a matter of opinion. Some people think it is possible and others say it cannot be obtained, but I believe if more time had been allowed to the people of England there might have been a greater inducement to them to give some preference. But they have obtained what they say is an advantage. Whether it will be so viewed or not is a matter to be determined altogether in the future: but there is no doubt that the people of this country stand higher in England at the present time than they ever did before. I believe Mr. Laurier did his duty and acted in the interests of the country, although he did receive this Cobden medal which has been so much talked about. Under all the circumstances, we were well represented by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in England. and it is not the province of conservatives and not the province of men acting as I am in the conservative cause ever to withhold from any man what he deserves or to detract from the credit due to him. I am not one of those who say that no good can come from such a source. I am willing to give credit for anything that is of substantial benefit to the country, and we may feel at any rate that we made some little progress in getting the people of England to view us with more consideration than in the past. There is a feeling in favour of this country and I hope it will continue. I hope our unity with the empire will continue. The people are united and there is nothing to detract from our allegiance to Her Majesty. We are loyal and will continue loyal, no matter what happens. We hear nothing more now of annexation. All that is dead and gone, and we all hope that it may long continue so, and that every man will feel that Canada is a country well worth having and England feel that Canada is one of the brightest jewels in her crown.

The gold discoveries in the Yukon are, of course, a burning question of the present time. It is very gratifying to hear so much about the richness of the country. We hear of men picking up from $50,000 to $100,000, but we do not hear much about those unfortunate miners who pick up nothing. There is a great deal of difference whether a miner is successful or whether he is not. To some, success is a benefit; to others, it is not. From present appearance there is every indication that the Yukon is a very valuable country, and it is proposed that means of communication shall be opened up at the earliest possible moment. I believe it is unanimously agreed that the measure before us aims at this object. The only question is by what means it shall be done. There is such a thing as paying too dear for an advantage. There is an idea throughout the whole country that the arrangement with McKenzie and Mann is one that will not redound to the benefit of this country as much as it should. I am, and have always been opposed to giving away unnecessarily, without due and fair consideration, the valuable assets of this country. Unfortunately, in the past it has been the practice of all governments to dispose of the public assets and receive very little compensation for them. I will instance the timber resources of this Dominion. I say, and I know what I am talking about, that these timber resources should have been from the first day of the settlement of this country safeguarded, and if they had been, we would have had timber wealth in the country sufficient to pay the national debt ten times over. The fact is, we did not appreciate it—we give it away. All a man had to do in the early days was to go to the Crown timber office, select a couple of hundred square miles of timber land, pay nothing for it, keep it and reap the advantage from it. It has been a disgrace to this country that we should have allowed so valuable a heritage, and increasing in value to such an extent, to pass out of the public domain, and get comparatively nothing for it in return. I know myself where parties have abandoned limits after working them for years. I have known them to take off several rafts of square timber and large quantities of saw logs, and then sell the limit for fabulous sums of money. I think we should have retained our timber lands and administered them for the benefit of the people of this country. It has been the same way with our public lands. We have never realized a solitary dollar of profit out of our lands in the old province of Ontario and Quebec. That is most extraordinary, but William Hamilton Merritt made a calculation some years ago, and brought out the fact conclusively, that the public lands were rather an item of expense than of revenue to this country, owing to the cost of administration and the easy terms on which they were disposed of. But as the hon. gentlemen all know, the statement I made about timber applies to-day. Even at the present time there is an immense quantity of timber on public lands for which the country is getting very little. It is true that since the public lands have passed into the hands of the local governments of Ontario and Quebec, the provinces have reaped some advantage from them. Whether they have got what they should I do not know; probably some persons get the upper hand and reap an advantage that they should not have. We are proposing to do the same thing now with our public lands in the Yukon territory. Those lands are either valuable or they are not. If the minerals on those lands are valuable we should keep them. How can we ascertain that? By thorough exploration and examination. If our people in days gone by had taken the trouble to explore the vast forests of this country and ascertain that from actual knowledge whether a section of the country was fit for a settlement or not, and if they had excluded the whole of the lumbering district from settlement or sale at any price and kept it in the hands of the government, selling only such lands as were fit for settlement they would have taken the best course in the interest of the country. They did not do so, and I am very sorry for it. I believe the same thing will occur again if this arrangement in the Yukon country is carried out. This country is supposed to contain an immense amount of gold. There is no possibility, I suppose, of telling what it will be worth, whether $50,000,000, $200,000,000 or $500,000,000—no one can tell, but the parties who make this arrangement. I rather think they know something about it; I cannot believe that any business men would go into a transaction of this kind without having some knowledge of what they are going to receive from it. It is true that this railway ought to be built and there are difficulties we all admit, but at the same time, the contemplated traffic upon that road will be immense. In my judgment it will be sufficient to recoup the parties who build that road in a very short time. If we are going to have such an immense trade, the contractors can well afford to build that road and to trust to what they will realize from the transportation of freight and passengers to recoup them for their expenditure. The transportation charges, of course, will be, and must necessarily be, very large; but at the same time, when the road is constructed the company will be able to realize their expenditure in a very short time, and a very large profit as well; and they will deserve it and ought to have the advantage of their enterprise. My suggestion, as a business man, is this: let us known what country we have, let us find out exactly from examination, and then we will be able to come to a conclusion; and then say to the people of England and the people of this country, go and examine for yourself, make us a bid and tell us what you can do. I think that course should have been adopted, and in the place of having to give anything away, we would receive a large amount of money for the privilege of building that road into that country. Of course, these are all suppositions, but there are people, particularly at the present time when money is so plentiful in England and men are so anxious to get contracts, who will run great risks for the purpose of prospecting. I have nothing to say against Messrs. Mann and Mackenzie making the best arrangement they could, but are there only two men in this country, in this world financially able to undertake this work? I have better opinion of the people of this country, who generally undertake affairs of this kind, than to suppose that it is only in the hands of two men. Urgency is the plea that is raised in extenuation of this contract. Urgency may be all very well in some cases; but urgency is not always the best justification. The Ottawa Canal was never viewed as a matter of urgency, but still I believe it is of far more importance to Canada and its effects will be far greater to the province of Quebec and Ontario and the country in general than even the building of a road into this great gold country. It will yield greater and more substantial advantages; it will confer great benefit to this country, yet in this matter we are left to paddle our own canoe. Now, hon. gentlemen, I am afraid I am trespassing upon your patience. You have heard this talked over and reiterated a great many times, and therefore it is merely going over the same ground. Let us calmly consider this matter, and when it comes down before us we will be able to judge carefully of its effects and defects, and if it is found to be in the interests of the country that this contract should be accepted, then let us so decide and know that we have performed our duty. If I had my way I would have built that line through the Edmonton district. In this country we have men; our lumbering men I believe would think no more of making a road through that country than they would have of eating their breakfast.

They have had difficulties to surmount in the north far greater than what they will have in the Klondike. Take 50 or 100 of our bush men who are accustomed to that kind of work, and I believe they would make a road through our own country from Edmonton without interfering with any foreign land, and in the end it would be a benefit to the country and no one would have any cause for complaint. But, as it is now, there is a lurking feeling that this measure is one which had not been well considered. Of course, I am not going to blame any one man or set of men. It may have been on account of great difficulties with which I am not acquainted. There may have been international questions of which we know nothing, as the Minister of Justice intimated the other day. I may say I did not like the way the hon. gentleman mentioned it; it seemed to me that it was almost an attempt at intimidation as if there were matters that if we knew of them we might alter our opinion. I like to hear everything discussed rightly, and everything called by its right name; I like to call a spade a spade and to know exactly what is the course of the government, and I think they should take the country in their confidence if there is something behind it. I do not wish to detain the House any longer. I have taken up a good deal of time. I have stated merely on my own view of certain facts as a business man. I hope we will in all sincerity do the best we can and that when we arrive at a conclusion we will find we have discharged our duty honestly and faithfully to our premier and to the country.

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved:

That pursuant to Rule 79, the following Senators be appointed a Committee of Selection, to nominate the Senators to serve on the several Standing Committees, namely:—The Honourable Messieurs Scott, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, DeBoucherville, Lougheed, Miller, McDonald (B.C.), Clemow, Power, and the mover; and to report with all convenient speed the names of the Senators so nominated.

He said:—I have substituted Mr. Macdonald in the place of Mr. King, according to the wish of my hon. friend (Sir Mackenzie Bowell) opposite.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I call the attention of the hon. leader of the House to the fact that there is no member on that committee from the province of Prince Edward Island. I know it is a very small province and we have not many senators here—less than our usual number at present, but I wish to call attention to this fact that this is merely a committee to nominate senators to serve on the several committees of the House, and it is desirable that every province should be represented on that committee. Prince Edward Island has not been represented before, and the result was that on one committee we had three representatives from Prince Edward Island, while on other important committees there was no member from the Island at all; and I would suggest that the leader should add to that committee the name of the Hon. Mr. Ferguson.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—What the hon. gentleman has said also applies to New Brunswick. I do not see a senator from that province upon it. Mr. King was on it, but he is put off. I think we ought certainly to be entitled to one as well as Prince Edward Island, and it is hard to see why a new member, and a competent member, should be put off and another placed on the committee at the ipsi dixit of a member of this House.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—The same remark would apply to Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The committee is exactly as it was last year, except that I substituted Mr. King for Mr. McInnes, and as Mr. McInnes was from British Columbia and my friend Mr. King did not care to serve on the committee, I suggested the name of Mr. Macdonald of British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I dare say you have done your duty, but at the same time, injustice is done to New Brunswick.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I trust the case that appeared in the selection of the committees last year will not appear this year, that is, that certain provinces will be excluded from most important committees, such as the Railway Committee, and three members from Prince Edward Island placed on one committee, and that a joint committee of both Houses.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think my hon. friend opposite did precisely as I did when I was leader; I took the position as it had formerly stood without any change.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I will withdraw my name from the committee.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—As my hon. friend for Rideau has expressed his willingness to withdraw from the committee, I do not suppose the hon. leader of the House would have any objection to this, and if there is any other member of the committee who would give way cheerfully, a member from New Brunswick might be added.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I do not wish to be on the committee myself. I would not accept the position now if it were offered, but I have taken notice of the fact that men have been made prominent by making them chairmen of committees for the last twenty years, to the detriment of other men.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I wish it to be understood that I do not wish to be on the committee either. I suggested the name of Mr. Ferguson. There was very good reason for making some radical change in this committee, knowing as we do that the report of the committee last year was very unsatisfactory to a great many members of this House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Well, that is moved.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—The provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island have 24 members in this House, and three of them are members of this committee. Ontario has 24 senators, and it has four members on this committee; the province of Quebec, with 24 members in this House, has only one member on the committee. Therefore, if we are going to decide according to the number of representatives from each province, I should like to see more members from Quebec on the committee.

The motion as amended, substituting the name of Mr. Ferguson for that of Mr. Clemow, was agreed to.

The Senate then adjourned.

EXCLUSION OF JAPANESE FROM YUKON DISTRICT.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.) rose to Call the attention of the government to the necessity for prompt action being taken for the purpose of excluding all persons of the Japanese race from recording and working mineral claims in the Yukon District.

He said:—I hope the House and the government will recognize the great importance of this question. It will be a very serious matter if we allow hordes of Asiatics to come into our country, and take up our mineral claims. At present Chinamen are taxed for coming in, and Japanese come in free of taxation. I have no objection to their coming in as labourers, but the whole country objects seriously to their being allowed to come in and take up mineral lands. I noticed the other day in the newspapers a report that there were 5,000 of them coming from the Sandwich Islands under a company to work mineral claims in British Columbia, and after that I saw it reaffirmed that this had really been done, that the men had now been engaged, and would leave for British Columbia before long. I have nothing further to say on the subject, but I hope the government will see its way to prevent them taking up mineral claims by issuing instructions early to the officials in the Yukon district. It will be necessary also that this should be done speedily to prevent those people leaving their homes, and the Japanese consuls in Ottawa, Montreal, Vancouver and other places should be cognizant of the fact that they will not be allowed to take up mineral claims in Canada.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Japan is recognized as a civilized state lying within the domain of international laws, and subject to the same rights, privileges and duties as every civilized state within that same domain. The hon. gentleman used the word "Asiatics."

I do not think the people of Japan stand exactly in the same position as other Asiatic nations, and especially at the present time when, in all probability, the government of the United Kingdom will find it necessary to draw closer to Japan, Japan having become a powerful as well as a friendly nation. I, certainly, speaking my own individual opinion, feel that it would be highly impolitic to adopt towards the Japanese people, as a nation, any line of conduct that would put them upon a different footing from the inhabitants of other civilized states. I may say to my hon. friend that the subject has not been before the government for its consideration, and I do not suppose for a moment that the Japanese government would consent that the inhabitants of Japan should be denied rights and privileges that are conceded to the citizens or subjects of other civilized nations.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I am very much astonished at the resolution which has been moved by my hon. friend, the member for Victoria. I always understood that he had a more enlarged mind than he has exhibited on the present occasion. He was always, I thought, in favour of the Chinese being allowed into the Dominion. He has often spoken very strongly about the way in which the Chinese were treated in Victoria and other places on the Pacific coast, and I do not see why he should object to the Japanese. We have been deluging Japan with missionaries, male and female, who have gone out there without knowing anything of the Japan language or religion, when the people of those islands were more civilized than those sent to teach them religion. If we could prevent the missionaries, male and female, going from Canada out there, it would be a wise thing to do. I do not see the hon. member from Sarnia before me, or I would ask him as to the appropriateness of a quotation. I refer to one of the earliest prophecies I have heard, that Japhet would come to dwell in the tents of Shem. Now, Japhet is the oriental and Shem is the civilized man. Therefore, I think we are flying in the face of the holy scriptures, besides flying in the face of common sense, if we object to the Japanese, when everybody knows just now one of the great supports of our fleet out in the Asiatic field is the Japanese. We ask the Japanese sailor or soldier to risk his life in defending British interests, and we are expected to tell him after all that is done, "do not dare to put your foot on Canadian soil." I trust the government will take my advice. I have not much sympathy for the government, and they may not follow my advice, but if they do they will have nothing to do with the resolution moved by the hon. gentleman from Victoria.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—My hon. friend is quite mistaken. I have no objection to the Japanese coming into the country, or the Chinese either, but I do object to their taking up our mineral and farming lands. I ask the Minister of Justice whether he knows if aliens could take up land in Japan and work the minerals. I do not know the laws of that country, but I venture to say that aliens could not get mining claims. It is a large mining country, and there is a great deal of gold and silver being mined in Japan. I am of the opinion that no foreigners are allowed to take up land there. If that is the case, why should not we with equal justice, prevent them taking up land in our country? I hope the government will consider the matter. England is, no doubt, anxious to be on friendly terms with Japan, but we have not called upon them for assistance. Most likely they will call upon us first.

THE HALF-BREED POPULATION IN THE NORTH-WEST.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY rose to Ask the government if they have recently, or since coming into power, taken the census of the half-breed population of the North-west Territories, and if so, for what purpose have they taken such census?

He said:—I have heard that the government have taken a census of the half-breeds in the western part of the North-west Territories. I have not heard that they have taken the census of the half-breeds in the eastern districts.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No census has been taken of the half-breed population in the North-west Territories.

THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC IN THE YUKON COUNTRY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY rose to Ask the government if one Mr. Chamberland of Oak Lake, Manitoba, or any other person, have been granted a permit to take spirituous intoxicating liquors into the Yukon country?

He said :—I have heard that the government have issued permits for liquor to be taken into the Yukon territory and sold. I ask this question for the purpose of ascertaining the facts on that point. There is a very strong feeling all over the western part of Canada against either the local or the Dominion government sanctioning the sale of liquors in the Yukon territory. I regret to learn, however, that the government of the North-west Territories has sent an official into the Yukon country for the purpose of taking control of the sale of liquor in that part of the Territories. There seems to be a difference of opinion as to which government has jurisdiction over the sale of liquor in that part of Canada. I have heard that a certain gentleman has received a permit from the Dominion government. That is in conflict with the opinion which prevails in the local government on that matter, and it is for the purpose of getting correct information on the subject that I ask this question.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No permit to take spirituous liquors into the Yukon country has been issued to Chamberland. Permits, however, have been issued to William Chambers and other parties. This is the answer which has been sent me by the Minister of the Interior.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Who is this Mr. Chambers and where does he reside ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I cannot say.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Is Mr. Chambers a Manitoba man ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I cannot tell the hon. gentleman. I have read the whole of the answer put in my hands in reply to this question.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—It is a matter of no importance where he resides. I merely wanted to know the fact.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will make further inquiry for the information of the hon. gentleman.

A PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—Is it the intention of the government to have an adjournment of this House ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The government in that respect are in the hands of the House. If an adjournment is desired the government will give effect to the wishes of the House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It has been intimated to me by quite a number of senators that, as there is very little business to be transacted for a week or two, it might be as well to adjourn. Of course, we have to consult the interests of the government, so far as their measures are concerned, but if an adjournment is to take place it should be of such a character, if it will not interfere with the public business, as to enable those who live at a distance to reach their homes and spend a few days there before they return.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—There has been an agitation for some years in this House to get the government to introduce some of their important measures in the Senate and thus expedite public business. An adjournment at the present time would be of little benefit to members from the maritime provinces. It would be much more convenient for us to have an adjournment later in the session. There should be enough work to keep us occupied here for a month to come, and then if there are no measures to be discussed we might adjourn for a week or two.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I agree with the hon. gentleman that, as far as possible, the measures of the government should be introduced in the Senate so that the business of legislation may go on simultaneously in both Houses. There are many measures which, as the hon. gentleman knows, from their nature cannot be introduced here, but as far as we can we shall this session endeavour to meet the views which the hon. gentleman has expressed.

The Senate then adjourned.

THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC IN THE YUKON DISTRICT.

NOTICE OF MOTION AMENDED.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I wish to give notice that I will ask to amend the notice of motion that I have given for to-morrow. It is not as complete as I should like to have it. I desire to ask who gets the revenue derived from the sale of those permits, the government of the Territories or the Dominion government?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I would suggest to my hon. friend that, instead of putting a question, he should move for a return, and I will endeavour to have it brought down as soon as possible. It will give him all the information he seeks. It would require some little time, of course, but it would be more satisfactory if he would simply change the question into a motion for a return.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Very well, I will do so.

THE ADJOURNMENT.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved:

That when the Senate adjourns on Friday next it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, the 8th March, at eight o'clock in the evening.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—I would ask the minister if, in proposing this long adjournment, he has taken into account the very important bill that is now before the other branch of parliament? It is quite possible that that bill may come up before the 8th March.

Some hon. MEMBERS—Oh, no, no.

The motion was agreed to.

INSPECTION OF HULLS AND MACHINERY OF VESSELS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) moved:

Resolved, that it is expedient that special instructions be issued forthwith to the Dominion Inspector of Hulls and Machinery in British Columbia to exercise the most rigid inspection of hulls and machinery of steamers plying between southern and northern British Columbia ports and ports in Alaska.

Resolved, that instructions be issued forthwith to the proper official in British Columbia to carry out the law strictly as to the number of passengers and tonnage a vessel or steamer is allowed to carry, the number of boats and the deck load prescribed by law.

He said: The motion I am making to-day is an important one, because every little craft in British Columbia is now called into requisition to carry passengers and goods to the northern ports of the country, and there are vessels there which are quite unfit to go anywhere—small steamers with rotten hulls built of green timber, with very poor machinery. I hope the government will exercise the greatest strictness in passing those vessels and preventing them leaving port in an unseaworthy condition. In regard to the matter of the tonnage and number of passengers carried by these vessels, a steamer left Victoria in a most dangerous condition, filled with horses and cattle, and hay piled up higher than the deck. I consulted the agent of the Marine and Fisheries Department in Victoria, to see that that vessel had boats enough in case anything happened, and the consequence was they had to get two extra boats and two extra rafts, as a matter of safety for the passengers. I do not know what the government will do in the matter. It requires attention immediately, but I suppose that they have officers at that port who will look after it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The subject to which my hon. friend has referred is one that is now of very great importance, more particularly in view of the fact that a United States vessel went down in Lynn Canal a few days ago. So far as we have been able to learn, nobody was saved. The accident was due to the bursting of a boiler. The boiler had been condemned. The subject to which the hon. member's motion refers has already received the attention of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. The chairman of the Board of Steamboat Inspection has been despatched to British Columbia with instructions to give this matter careful attention, and to see that no vessels are allowed to leave unless they comply with the law. I suppose the hon. gentleman will withdraw his motion, since the department have already taken action in the direction indicated.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I should like to ask the Minister if, in the case of foreign vessels coming into our ports and leaving them crowded, the department can exercise any jurisdiction over them. I know that United States vessels come to our ports overloaded and crowded with passengers, and leave without complying with our laws and regulations.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think that we exercise any control over United States vessels, although our neighbours practically do over ours. I know that they exercise a restriction, which we have not exercised over United States vessels.

The motion was withdrawn.

THE STANDING COMMITTEES.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the adoption of the report of the Committee of Selection to nominate the senators to serve on the several standing committees as follows :

JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT.

The Honourable the Speaker, and the Honourable Messieurs Allan, Almon, Baker, Boucherville, de, C.M.G., Drummond, Gowan, C.M.G., Hingston, Sir William, Kt., Landry, Masson, MacInnes, Poirier, Power, Reesor, Ross, Scott and Wark.—17.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT.

The Honourable Messieurs Armand, Bernier, Carling, Sir John, K.C.M.G., Dever, Dobson, Ferguson, Fiset, King, Macdonald, (P.E.I.), Mackeen, McKindsey, Merner, O'Donohoe, Ogilvie, Perley, Power, Primrose, Reid, Sanford, Sullivan, and Wark.—21.

COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS.

The Honourable Messieurs Aikins, Bellerose, Carling, Sir John, K. C. M. G., Clemow, Macdonald (P.E.I.), Macdonald (Victoria), McDonald (Cape Breton), McKay, and Prowse.—9.

COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND COMMERCE.

The Honourable Messieurs Aikins, Allan, Powell, Sir Mackenzie, K.C.M.G., Casgrain, Clemow, Cochrane, Cox, De Blois, Drummond, Ferguson, Forget, Hingston, Sir William, Kt., Lewin, MacInnes, McMillan, Miller, O'Brien, Primrose, Sanford, Scott, Smith, Sir Frank, Kt., Temple, Villeneuve, Wark, and Wood.—25.

COMMITTEE ON RAILWAYS, TELEGRAPHS AND HARBOURS.

The Honourable Messieurs Allan, Almon, Baker, Boulton, Bowell, Sir Mackenzie, K.C.M.G., Clemow, Cochrane, Cox, Dickey, Forget, King, Drummond, Landry, Lougheed, Lovitt, Macdonald (Victoria), MacInnes, Masson, McCallum, McDonald (Cape Breton), McKay, McKindsey, McLaren, McMillan, Miller, Mills, Owens, Poirier, Power, Ross, Sanford, Scott, Smith, Sir Frank, Kt., Snowball, Vidal.—35.

COMMITTEE ON MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS.

The Honourable Messieurs Adams, Armand, Baird, Bellerose, Bolduc, Boucherville, de, C.M.G., Dandurand, Dever, Dobson, Fiset, Gowan, C.M.G., Landry, Lougheed, Macfarlane, Merner, Mills, Montplaisir, O'Brien, O'Donohoe, Ogilvie, Prowse, Reid, Snowball, and Sullivan.—25.

COMMITTEE ON INTERNAL ECONOMY AND CONTINGENT ACCOUNTS.

The Honourable Messieurs Bernier, Bowell, Sir Mackenzie, K.C.M.G., Casgrain, De Blois, Forget, King, Kirchhoffer, Lovitt, Macdonald (Victoria), McCallum, McDonald (Cape Breton), McKindsey, McLaren, Miller, Montplaisir, Owens, Perley, Power, Prowse, Scott, Thibaudeau (de la Vallière), Temple, Vidal, Villeneuve, and Wood.—25.

COMMITTEE ON DEBATES AND REPORTING.

The Honourable Messieurs Bellerose, Bernier, Boulton, Bowell, Sir Mackenzie, K.C.M.G., Ferguson, Macdonald (P.E.I.), McCallum, Mills, and Vidal.—9.

COMMITTEE ON DIVORCE.

The Honourable Messieurs Baird, Baker, Boulton, Gowan, C.M.G., Kirchhoffer, Lougheed, Mills, Primrose, and Wood.—9.

COMMITTEE ON THE RESTAURANT.

The Honourable the Speaker, and the Honourable Messieurs Almon, Bolduc, Lougheed, MacKeen, McKay, and McMillan.—7.

THE PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT.

A message was received from the House of Commons informing the Senate that they had appointed certain members of the House of Commons to act on the joint committee on the Printing of Parliament.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to call the attention of the hon. leader of the House to the message from the House of Commons as laid on the Table. They have selected the same number that they selected last year, twenty-two instead of twenty-one. If the Commons persist in keeping the number twenty-two, I would suggest the propriety of changing our rules, so as to have an equal number of senators on the committee.

The Senate adjourned.

OTTAWA AND GEORGIAN BAY CANAL.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved :

That a select committee be appointed to investigate and report upon the feasibility of, and the advantages which would accrue to the Dominion from the construction of a canal uniting the waters of Lake Huron with those of the St. Lawrence via the Ottawa River, the said committee to consist of the Honourable Messieurs Sir Mackenzie Bowell, Scott, Casgrain, McMillan, Dobson, Bellerose, De Boucherville, Ogilvie, Owens, Almon, Miller, McKay, Power, Bernier, Boulton, Perley, Macdonald (P.E.I.), Prowse, Reid, and the mover; with power to send for papers, persons and records, and to employ such persons as the committee may deem necessary for the purpose of the investigation, and to report from time to time.

He said:—I stated the other day that it was my intention to move for a committee to inquire into this subject. I desire the opportunity of proving by reliable parties the feasibility of this project, and the only way, apparently, would be to bring those parties here to give their evidence. It is the intention to summon the parties interested in the proposal for the purpose of obtaining this information. One of them is on his way from Mexico, and will be here in a few days. It is also the intention to summon scientific men, who know all about it, and whose evidence will be of great assistance in coming to a conclusion as to whether this route is feasible and should be constructed under the terms foreshadowed in the few remarks I made the other day. I do not intend to elaborate the question at the present time. Hon. gentlemen are aware of the circumstances, and I think the investigation will satisfy the House and the whole country that it is a step in the right direction, and that we may expect to realize the importance of this great channel of communication between the northern country and the seaboard. I do not know whether I would be in order if I were to ask the House, in the event of its being necessary, that this committee should sit during recess. It may not be necessary, but if these parties arrive here in a few days, it would be very desirable, if we could get the committee together, to have an opportunity of taking their evidence in order that there might be no delay.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Most of the members will be away.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Very well. I thought possibly it might be done.

The motion was agreed to.

THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC IN THE YUKON COUNTRY.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—On behalf of the prohibition people of Canada I desire to move:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, the number of permits that have been granted to persons for the purpose of taking spirituous and intoxicating liquors into the Yukon District, the date of such permits, together with the name of the person to whom a permit has been granted, and the number of gallons covered by such permit, and the fee charged by the government per gallon.

I should like to ask, also, which government gets the fee, the Dominion or the Territorial?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is no objection whatever to the motion being granted. The return which the hon. gentleman has moved for will be brought down. I notice that in giving my reply to the hon. gentleman's question, which he put yesterday or the day before, a number of newspapers have it that I said that I had issued several permits for the sale of liquor in the Territories. I did not say so, and I never did so. My department has nothing whatever to do with the matter.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The government did it though.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to add the information that I have asked for—who gets the fees for the sale of the permits?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman will see that this Yukon country is still in an unsettled condition. When we bring in our bill—which I hope will be immediately after we meet subsequent to the adjournment—that matter will be regulated by the bill about to be introduced. With regard to the permits that have already been issued, that I apprehend is under the authority of the North-west Territories Act and the revenue is disposed of by the terms and provisions of that Act. My present recollection, without looking into the matter, is that it is part of the revenues of the North-west Territories.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Could the Minister of Justice inform the House whether permits have been issued by the Dominion government and also whether that power has been exercised by the North-west Territories? Under the North-west Territories Act, as it now stands on the statute book, that power would be vested in the government of the North-west Territories, and not in the Dominion government.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Vested in the lieutenant governor of the North-west Territories.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. Minister of Justice stated yesterday that no permit had been given to a Mr. Chamberland, but he said that a permit had been granted to a Mr. Chambers, and I understood him to say that that permit was granted by the Dominion government. Was that the reply?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I gave the hon. gentleman the answer that was put into my hands, by my colleague, from the department of the Interior, whether that referred to the North-west Territories or to the Yukon country. I suppose it related to the Yukon country, from the question put by the hon. gentleman, and in that event the permit would be issued by some officer in that territory, but as to the whole matter I cannot say. I am not aware that any permits have been issued in the Yukon country by the government of Canada; I do not think any have been. I am speaking, however, without having inquired specially on the subject. If my hon. friend wants information on these subjects, which are outside of my department altogether, he will have to give notice, and I will get the information for him.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That information will be covered by this motion?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, I think so.

The motion was agreed to.

SUB-AQUEOUS MINING CLAIMS ON YUKON RIVER.

ENQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Before the House adjourns there is a matter of some importance to which I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Justice. I presume the regulations for mining in the Yukon have been approved by the Governor in Council, and that there can be no deviation from those rules without having recourse to the Governor General in Council in the same way. In these regulations I see that no one can take up a sub-aqueous mining claim of more than five miles in a river; but a company or person can take up thirty miles of the river, and no more. That is stated emphatically in the regulations. I observe two or three reports in the newspapers to the effect that Chevalier Drolet had got a lease of 150 miles, and a Mr. Russell had obtained a lease of 380 miles in the Yukon, and Mr. Mercier of Quebec had received a lease of 280 miles. How could these persons have received these leases—if they have done so—when the regulations say that they can only receive thirty miles? I hope the Minister of Justice will be able to tell us that these reports are quite unfounded.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This is a question which is not on the notice paper. I am wholly unable to answer it, but I do not think it at all probable that any such leases as he mentions have been made. However, I will make enquiry and will be able to give the hon. gentleman the information when we meet again.

Hon. Mr. POWER—With respect to the case of Chevalier Drolet, I think I noticed the paragraph to which my hon. friend refers, and my remembrance of it is that his right to dredge was in the Saskatchewan River.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is in the North-west also.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is a notorious fact that the government are making leases of nearly all the rivers in the North-west. In view of the rapid development of those mining claims, it seems to me the government is recklessly alienating very important interests which certainly deserve greater consideration than they are receiving. It is utterly impossible from the statements already made by the Minister of Justice and the Secretary of State that the government can possibly have any information with regard to the interests which they are disposing of in very large quantities, because many of those leases run up to thirty and fifty miles. I say it is impossible for the government to have had the information as to what they are disposing of to those parties. It is a matter which the House should be informed upon, and I hope my hon. friend from Victoria will take steps, at the earliest possible date, to ask for a return of all papers in regard to this particular question. Disposing of those immense interests in such a wholesale way must necessarily strike the House as being a matter of very grave importance, and I hope that at an early date we will be put in possession of full information upon the question.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I shall certainly bring down the information when we meet again. I shall consider the observations which have been addressed to the House as a notice, and ask my colleague, the Minister of the Interior, for the information.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If my recollection serves me right, I read in the Citizen this morning that the hon. Minister of the Interior informed the House of Commons, in answer to a question last night, that 150 miles had been granted to one of these gentlemen, Chevalier Drolet.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think it was in the Saskatchewan.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That lease was granted many months ago.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not suppose that makes any difference. They are all in the North-west Territories, and the rules and regulations apply not only to the Saskatchewan, but to the Yukon, Stikine and other rivers.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—As a matter of fact, there are several hundred applications now before the Minister of the Interior, and it is expected that action will be taken upon them immediately. The policy of the department seems to have been to grant leases upon application being made, entirely irrespective of whether the government was in possession of information upon them or not.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There are now published, as the hon. gentleman is aware, regulations affecting sub-aqueous mining. There may have been—I think there was—at least one or two leases issued before. I cannot now recall them, but I noticed the observations in the paper that some considerable mileage had been leased and I intended to have asked the Minister of the Interior about it to-day, but it escaped my attention.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The present regulations provide for leases being granted on application being made.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (A) "An Act for the relief of Robert Augustus Baldwin Hart."—(Hon. Mr. Clemow.)

Bill (B) "An Act incorporating the Central Canada Loan and Savings Co."—(Hon. Mr. MacInnes.)

DELAYED RETURNS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the House adjourns, I should like to call attention once more to that return which I moved for some eight or ten months ago. I should certainly like to know whether the government intends to comply with the order of the House, and whether we can have it at some period of time. I think it would be much better if the government would lay down the principle, when a motion is made asking for information or returns, of refusing to grant it, giving their reasons for that course, rather than appear to consent to grant it and never bring it down. We have waited quite long enough for that return. There are other returns much in the same position. It is my particular duty just now, perhaps, to repeat what the hon. Secretary of State used to say when I was leader of the House: I hope he will not fall into that error with which he charged us and which I am not prepared to say existed to the extent that they have been practising it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The return having been asked for by the House, the House is entitled to the return, and I know my hon. friend is anxious that it should be brought down. The wish of the House will be complied with in this regard. I entirely concur in the observations which the leader of the opposition has addressed to the House on this occasion, that if the government think it is not in the public interest that a return should be brought down, the fact ought to be stated at the time and the return should be refused, but if it is agreed that the return should be brought down, then that agreement should be strictly kept and I do not know yet that that is not the intention. Certainly I have no reason to suppose that the government did not intend to comply with the motion to which they assented. I may say to my hon. friend that I also agree with the observations that were addressed by the hon. Secretary of State to the hon. gentleman at the time to which he refers—that our predecessors in this regard were very frequent sinners, and it is a case in which we should avoid walking in the footsteps of those who preceded us.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I am in the same box with my leader in the fact that I moved for a return at the very commencement of the session last year, and although the hon. Secretary of State again and again promised to produce it shortly, we were left to the end of the session without having received it. He led us to understand at one time that a large portion of the return had been made up, and that he would turnish us with an instalment of it, and I think on one occasion I agreed to accept an instalment on account, because it was all I could get, apparently. But we did not get any part of it at all, not even the instalment. I hope the remarks which the leader of the House has made with reference to the returns asked for by the leader of the opposition will be extended so as to apply to my motion as well.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think the return moved for by the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat was to be included in the return asked for by the leader of the opposition.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—No, it was a separate motion.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I thought it was the same information.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—No, quite different.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—All I can say is that the requests were made on the departments at the time, and repeated frequently since, and personal letters written to the ministers calling their attention to the importance of complying with the order of the House, because it necessarily is very embarrassing to be placed in the position of not complying with an order passed by the House. A portion of the return asked for by the leader of the opposition was completed. That may possible also have been the case with the return asked for by the hon. gentleman from Brandon, but I understood from the leader of the opposition that it was not desirable to bring down fragmentary returns. I think they are all in except from two departments—the Department of Railways and the Post Office Department.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think that was the last announcement.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Those two departments are the defaulters.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—That was the understanding with the hon. leader of the opposition, but on the principle that half a loaf was better than no bread at all, I desired to have an instalment of the return that I had asked for if I could get it.

The Senate adjourned.

EXAMINATION OF YUKON ROUTE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON rose to call the attention of the Senate to the following telegram which appeared in the Montreal Star of the 8th of December last:—

VANCOUVER, B. C.—Messrs. Corthew and Wilkinson have returned from the Yukon. They went there for the Canadian government to locate an all-Canadian route. Their official report is not yet out, but it is a foregone conclusion that their route will be chosen. It starts at Ketimat from an inlet on the Alaskan route running straight through Canadian territory to Teslin Lake. Mr. Corthew has been exploring for eighteen years in that section. He says there is no short cut. Sixty miles inland on the route which will be accepted, they discovered vast deposits of quartz. Several tons were brought home and assayed $50 to $500 in mineral, mostly copper. The route to Teslin Lake is through a valley, sparsely timbered, almost as level as Broadway, New York. The valley is without doubt the old bed of the Skeena River. Game is abundant and whitefish block the stream in season. Already the Canadian Pacific have applied for a charter to run a road from Ketimat to Teslin Lake. The official report will be out in one week. It will mention this route as the one chosen, and millions of dollars will be spent in opening it up. An ocean liner could anchor within a stone's-throw of Ketimat.

And inquired whether the surveyors above named made an examination of the route to the Yukon for the Canadian government? If so, has a report of such examination been made, and will it be submitted to parliament, and when?

Hon Mr. MILLS—I may say, on behalf of my colleague, that there has been no examination made of the route to the Yukon for the Canadian government, and there is no report to submit.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—These men were not employed at all?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

CENTRAL CANADA LOAN AND SAVINGS COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES moved the second reading of Bill (B) "An Act incorporating the Central Canada Loan and Savings Company." He said: The purport of this bill is to empower the company to do business in the Dominion. At present it is confined to the province of Ontario, and the object of the bill is to give them power to extend their business throughout the Dominion generally. The bill contains all necessary provisions for the protection of the creditors of the company. It appears to me to be a perfectly legitimate bill, and there cannot be any reasonable objection to it.

The motion was agreed to.

MR. FARRER AT WASHINGTON.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved that the Senate do now adjourn.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the House adjourns I should like to call the attention of the leader of this House to a paragraph which has appeared in the newspapers purporting to come from Washington, in reference to some negotiations which have been going on before a Committee of the Senate, in which a Mr. Farrer appears to have taken a very prominent part, and from the tenor of the telegram one would suppose he was there as a representative of the government of Canada. I scarcely conceive it possible—though I know that this gentleman is on very intimate terms with some of the hon. gentleman's colleagues—that a man who was detected some years ago in a secret correspondence with leading members of the Senate of the United States, suggesting to them a mode by which Canada could be coerced into asking for annexation, and suggesting to them how they might obtain concessions from Canada of rights which Canada enjoys under the treaty of 1818, and other treaties between these two countries. I do not know that my hon. friend would object to my putting this question without notice, for I take it for granted that it being so plain and simple a question—the answer to which is Yes or No—he would have no objection. I am desirous that this country should know whether the government has employed Mr. Farrer as their agent to negotiate terms of reciprocity, or to make any suggestions as to what they, as a government, are prepared to concede in return for favours and privileges in the Yukon district. The telegram which appeared in the newspapers, dated Washington, Feb. 18th, reads as follows:

Edward Farrer, of Toronto, is here in consultation with Senator Hansborough and several other members of the Public Lands Committee, in regard to bonding privileges at Wrangel, which the Alaska bill refuses unless the Dominion government rescind the monopoly given to the Yukon Railway.

Mr. Farrer addressed the committee and made a very plausible case. With regard to the refusal of Canada to permit American fishermen to ship their catch free of charge in Canadian ports on the North Atlantic, in his opinion the Canadian government would agree to the appointment of an international commission to provide for the uniform administration of the bonding system on the North Atlantic as well as on the North Pacific. He added that it would be all the better in his judgment if the commission was given authority to deal with reciprocity of trade in one of the two leading natural products like coal, barley and pulp wood, and also in one or two lines of manufactured goods.

I do not know that I should have called the attention of the Senate to this, were it not for the remarks made by Mr. Hansborough, when the question was before the United States Congress, as to the adoption of that resolution declaring that no concessions shall be made to the Canadians at Wrangel, or at any other port in the North Pacific, or on the Alaskan coast, unless we consented to give certain privileges to the United States fishermen in the North Atlantic ; and also, the admission of goods to the extent of 1,000 pounds to each miner, free.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—2,500 pounds.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The resolution says, "Exceeding in quantity 1,000 pounds." Perhaps that has been increased ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was increased to 2,500 pounds.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—So much the worse. When this bill was under consideration, the following discussion took place :

Mr. Turner (Washington), moved to strike out that part of the section, which related to the entering of Canadian ports by American fishermen. He did not, he said, make the motion, because he was hostile to the New England fisheries, but because he deemed it unfair to burden this measure with a demand upon the Dominion government that it yield a contention it has made for 100 years.

Mr. Hale (Maine), inquired if Mr. Turner did not think it would be of advantage to the United States to obtain the fisheries concession from Canada.

Mr. Turner replied that it would be of advantage if we could obtain it, but he did not believe it could be obtained.

Mr. Hansbrough (North Dakota), said that the committee on public lands was in possession of information that Canada would accept the conditions imposed by the section. He was firmly of the opinion that the Dominion government would yield on the fisheries question in view of the concessions made to it by the bill.

Now the only inference that one can draw from the statements made by Mr. Hansborough is this, that Mr. Farrer assured the Public Lands Committee that the Canadian Government were prepared to make these concessions ; and if he made any such statement or gave any such assurance to that committee, one can scarcely conceive that he had the audacity—if I can use so strong a term—to make any such promises, unless with the consent of the Canadian Government. If he did, then he should be repudiated at once by the government of Canada, and the United States people should be told that this gentleman was not authorized either to appear before that committee or to make any promises of concessions on the part of Canada, and that the Canadian people should learn at as early a day as possible that an arch-traitor, like Farrer has proved himself to be, in the past—and we have no reason to know that he has reformed—is not acting on the part of the Canadian Government.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say to my hon. friend that the government of Canada have no agent at Washington other than the British Ambassador.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He is not our agent.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We are a part of the British Empire, and as a part of the British Empire we are represented at the capital of the United States by the British Ambassador, as much so as the people of the United Kingdom are, and I did not apprehend that the government of Canada were going to undertake to create for themselves other channels of communication on matters of political importance than those which under the law and the constitution are already provided. The government of Canada have, as such, no agent at Washington at all. We regard ourselves as adequately represented by the agency that is provided for us, the British Ambassador, Sir Julian Pauncefote. With regard to the report which my hon. friend has read of what transpired in the Senate of the United States, of course we are not responsible for what happens there. If any citizen of Canada happens to be in Washington and is called upon for information, he is at liberty, of course, to give such information as he possesses, and it is a matter of discretion with him as to what statements he will make, and he may, if he chooses, say what his opinions are. We, of course, cannot control the opinions of Mr. Farrer or any other party from Canada who may visit Washington. Then, as to the fisheries, my hon. friend knows well that the fisheries on the Atlantic coast are regulated by the treaty of 1818, that the fisheries upon the coast of British North America, are the property of the people of Canada and under the jurisdiction of Canada, subject to the concessions, the liberties or licenses granted under the treaty of 1818 to the people of the United States. Of course, we cannot take from them any rights which they possess, but it is wholly within our discretion whether we will make any further concessions or not, and the government of Canada and the parliament of Canada have so far seen proper to exclude the people of the United States from the privilege of transhipping fish in bond from Canadian ports to ports in the United States, except where they choose to take out a license for that purpose. Now, with regard to our rights on the Pacific coast, our neighbours over the way, with whom we are anxious to be on good terms and to have a good understanding, so far as our self-respect and our regard for our own interests will permit us, may adopt such policy as they deem proper for themselves, but not without regard to our rights of navigation in the Stikine and other rivers mentioned in the treaty of Washington. We have the right to use those rivers for commercial purposes, and, as an incident to that commercial use, we have a right to tranship our goods from sea-going ships to those that are suited to river navigation. We have the right to moor our ships to the shore or bank of the river where it is necessary to do so, and we have these incidental rights without being subject to any duty or any charge on the part of the government of the United States, other than that which they might make for their own citizens under like circumstances, and so we do not anticipate, whatever the Senate may declare in this matter, that Congress, as a whole, will ultimately adopt a course in contravention of the rights that we possess under the treaty of Washington or that they will attempt any breach of faith. It is our intention to pursue our own course, to maintain our own authority, to adopt those measures which we believe in the interests of this country and the proper development of our territories. We are doing nothing to interfere with our neighbours, or to exhibit towards them any hostile spirit. We have permitted all other foreigners who chose to come into our country, to engage in mining operations in the Yukon territory. We have subjected them to such burdens as we think are in the public interest, and it is the intention of the government to pursue that course and to adopt all those measures necessary to ensure law and order in that country and maintain our authority and to uphold the sovereignty of Queen Victoria in the Yukon country.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I was somewhat startled when I read the proceedings in the Senate of the United States to which the hon. member from Hastings has referred, and I had prepared myself to bring the subject before this House, pretty much in the same way that the hon. gentleman has brought it, until I found that it had been brought up in the other branch of parliament and fully discussed, and full information given to the public in regard to it. I must say I was somewhat alarmed when I read that in the discussion in the United States a statement had been made to the effect that it was well understood that the fishing rights of the maritime provinces of this Dominion could easily be obtained in exchange for customs concessions at Wrangel or elsewhere on the Pacific coast. I say I was surprised at the confidence with which that assertion was made in the Senate of the United States by men who seemed to be thoroughly and authoritatively informed. My fears, too, were not without some reasonable foundation. I called to mind the occasion on which the premier of this country, shortly after he was installed in the high office which he now fills, visited the United States and gave an interview to a leading journal in that country in which he spoke of the restrictions of the treaty of 1818 and generally of our invaluable fishing rights as liable to be given up to the United States on very small consideration. Elsewhere he had spoken of these restrictions as relics of a barbarous age. The fishery products of this country amounted last year to over $20,000,000—and I may say the province that I represent is more deeply interested in the fisheries than any other province of the Dominion, producing nearly one-third of the whole production of that industry in the Dominion—and I say I was alarmed at the confidence with which those statements were made in the Senate of the United States when I called to mind the utterances of the Prime Minister both before and after he had attained office. I was reassured, however, when I read the report of the discussion in another place yesterday, and very much pleased with the emphatic manner in which the Prime Minister repudiated any intention of mixing up the settlement of the fisheries question on the Atlantic coast of the Dominion with any difficulties that might have to be settled with the United States government upon the Pacific coast. I hope if ever the day comes when we shall be called upon to negotiate for a surrender of our fishing rights it will be recollected that those rights are a most valuable heritage of the maritime provinces, that they are looked upon with extreme jealousy, and it is only men who do not understand the conditions under which the Treaty of 1818, was signed and executed who talk about those rights as having been acquired in a barbarous age. They are rights which will bear the strictest criticism and defence at the present day, and they are the only means we possess to bring about a fair settlement of any international question affecting the maritime provinces with the United States; they are the only lever we have to use, and therefore, should be made the most of. With regard to the license system which now prevails, I wish to express an opinion: I think the time has arrived when we should cease to grant licenses to United States fishermen. After the rejection by the Senate of the United States of the treaty negotiated by Mr. Chamberlain and Sir Charles Tupper, acting on behalf of Canada, we agreed to prolong for a year or two the privilege of granting licenses to United States fishermen, with the expectation that the United States would come to some reasonable settlement and would grant some equivalent for the great privileges which they ask to participate in with the fishermen of the maritime provinces. We see no indication of any desire or intention on their part to do anything of that kind; on the contrary, we see indications of unfriendliness and worse than unfriendliness, because no person who has any acquaintance whatever with the rights of navigation which this country possesses by treaty on the rivers of Alaska, can regard in any other light the recent action of the Senate of the United States than a gross violation of our treaty rights. Any one who has studied the question and understands the unassailable rights that we possess for commercial purposes over those rivers, could hardly imagine that a civilized nation would adopt such legislation as the 13th clause of the bill which has recently passed the Senate of that country. If such legislation had emanated from some semi-civilized South American republic we might regard it with some indifference, and I have no sympathy with those gentlemen who stand up here and speak of the United States as a country which should be treated with friendliness by us, because on every occasion our neighbours show an aggressive spirit, discreditable to so great a nation as they undoubtedly are. I hope, however, that if it ever does come to be the duty of this government to make any negotiations relative to our fisheries, they will recollect that they will be held to strict account for the slightest surrender that may be made without a thorough equivalent for anything we give up. These fishing rights are prized by the people of the maritime provinces—prized in a way that you gentlemen who come from the interior of the country cannot understand, and it might be the worst blow struck at the integrity of the Dominion if any sacrifice of those rights were attempted by the government, because I am sure, if those rights were given away to a foreign country without a full equivalent it would create great disatisfaction among a large class of people.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I studiously avoided, in the questions that I put, discussing the merits or demerits of the resolution passed by the Congress of the United States, and I did so for the very reason that my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Miller) gave for not bringing the matter before the Senate; that is, that the subject had been thoroughly thrashed out in the Lower chamber. What I desired to ascertain was whether Mr. Farrer—that point was not discussed in the House of Commons—was the accredited agent, or acting on behalf of any member of the Canadian government in Washington when he appeared before the Committee on Public Lands and made the statement which has been published. My hon. friend the leader of the House did not answer fully my question. He said that the Canadian government has no agent in Washington. I did not require to be told that; I know that the Canadian government has no agent in Washington in the common acceptation of the term. I know also that Sir Julian Pauncefote represents England, and not Canada, except when his attention is called to matters affecting this country. I know also during the administration of all governments they it had been the habit to send gentlemen to Washington to bring under the notice of the British minister, and through him, to the notice of the government of the United States, certain matters which effect this country. I understand all that, so that the hon. gentleman's answer, that the government have no agent in Washington, is literally true. Every one in Canada knows that to be correct, but what I want to know is this—has Mr. Farrer been sent there even in an unofficial capacity by any member of the government.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I said no.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend will find, when the report of his speech is printed, that he did not answer that question. The only answer that he gave was that they had no agent, and then he went on to discuss the merits of this resolution passed by Congress and to assure the House that the rights of Canada, whatever they may be, will be upheld wherever the British flag floats on this continent. If I were to discuss the resolution to which my friend called the attention of the Senate, I should agree with him. I am only speaking from a layman's standpoint. I have not the advantage of a legal education that the hon. gentleman has, but in reading the treaty and particularly the terms of the treaty of 1871, under which the right of navigating the Yukon and other rivers was conceded to us, I can say that I came to the same conclusion that my hon. friend has enunciated here to-night. He will excuse me if I press him for a positive answer to my question whether Mr. Farrer, whose history we all know, is in Washington on behalf of the government, or at the instance of any member of the government, if so, who sends him and who pays his expenses there. That every gentleman going to Washington has a right to express his views we all know, but we know how intimate Mr. Farrer is with members of the present government, that confidential relations exist between them, and we also know from statements, he made there that he assured the authorities at Washington that he had reason to believe the Canadian government were prepared to make certain concessions, and on the strength of those assurances Mr. Hansborough made his speech to the Senate. If the Yukon bill ever gets to this House, and we come to discuss the question, I shall be prepared to express my opinion, as a layman, as to the rights of this country, and I think I shall not find myself in a very different position on that subject from that of the hon. gentleman opposite.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I supposed that I had been sufficiently explicit in the statement I made to the House. The hon. gentleman asked whether Mr. Farrer was the agent of the Canadian government at Washington, or whether he had been sent there to act in that capacity, and I said to my hon. friend that we had no agent at Washington except the regular and properly constituted agent, the British Ambassador at Washington. I thought that that was a sufficient negative to the question, which my hon. friend put. I so intended it. I supposed that my hon. friend would so understand it. And I say now that Mr. Farrer is not in Washington and has not been in Washington as the agent of the Canadian government.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Or on behalf of the Canadian government?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Or on behalf of the Canadian government.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Very well, that will do.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Nor was he authorized to speak for us, nor do I suppose that Mr. Farrer has said anything which would have led the hon. gentleman to suppose that he professed to speak in the name or on behalf of the Canadian government.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You have not read the telegram.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, I have not, but I have listened to the telegram read by my friend.

VACANCIES IN THE SENATE AND DEATH OF SENATORS.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is another matter to which I propose to refer. It was the complaint of the hon. gentlemen opposite for a great many years that vacancies in the Senate were not filled up as rapidly as they should be. I hope the hon. gentlemen is not going to fall into what he then termed were the errors and crimes of commission and omission on the part of their predecessors. In the province in which I live, there is one vacancy. I should like to ask the hon. gentlemen when that will be filled. There is also the vacancy in Prince Edward Island, caused by the lamentable death of one of our colleagues, to which I think no reference has been made. With the permission of the Senate, I think it is only due, following the practice of the past, to refer to the gentlemen who have passed away. We must all feel regret at the death of a gentleman who has been a member of the House for so many years, I refer to the Hon. Theodore Robitaille. He occupied a very prominent position in the politics of this country, not only since confederation but before it. He was a descendant of one of the oldest French families in Lower Canada. He served in the parliament of Canada in 1869, and one of his ancestors served in the old parliament of Canada from 1809 to 1829. Mr. Robitaille himself was first elected to parliament in 1861, and remained in the parliament of Lower Canada until confederation, after which he occupied a seat in this House and also in the local legislature. He devoted his whole time afterwards to the service of his country in the parliament of Canada. He was sworn in as Receiver General in 1873, and remained in that office until he was appointed governor of the province of Quebec, where his services were given to his country for four or five years. He afterwards became a member of the Senate which position he occupied until the time of his death. We all know that he was for years so sorely afflicted that he could not bring to the service of his country that vigorous intellect which he possessed, as he had done in years long past. It was my good fortune to be acquainted with Mr. Robitaille since confederation. He occupied a seat in the House of Commons in 1867 when I was first elected, and I think I can say for him, on behalf of all who knew him, that a more genial and kind hearted man, and a man of finer intellect—which of course was impaired by illness of late years—would be difficult to find, and we must all deeply regret his death, although it was long expected. Another colleague, with whom we, as senators, had been acquainted but a very short time, is no longer with us, I speak of the Hon. Mr. Arsenault. My short acquaintance with him led me to form a very high opinion of his character as a man of honest, straight forward integrity. He was, as I understand it, a typical Acadian. He served his country from 1867 to 1895 in his own province. He was in the Executive Council of that province, two or three times, and was representing his constituency when he was called to the Senate. Those who knew him best I have no doubt will be able to speak more at large upon his merits, but I think every man in this House who had the honour and privilege of an acquaintance with Mr. Arsenault will come to the same conclusion that I have reached, and that is that he was a man of high character, and one whom everybody, whether agreeing with him politically or not, would hold in high esteem. I deeply regret, for myself, that both these gentlemen have gone from us, but it has been my painful duty in the four years that I have occupied a seat in this House, to call attention to senators who had been taken from us in the past.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend has inquired with regard to vacancies in the Senate; he wants to know how soon these vacancies will be filled. I can assure my hon. friend that I have no doubt whatever that they will be filled at an early date. These vacancies have not existed very long. I could not help noticing how much more vigorous my hon. friend is in this direction when he is on that side of the House than when he was on this side, and that while he is very anxious to have vacancies filled when we have the power of recommendation he was not perhaps quite so energetic when the appointment depended on his advice. Perhaps I do my hon. friend an injustice, because I remember when he was emancipated from some of his colleagues that he made a good many appointments in a very short time, and so perhaps it would be doing my hon. friend less than justice if I were to say that he was tardy in this regard. Personally, I am inclined to think that the tardiness was attributed rather to some of his colleagues than to the hon. gentleman himself. My hon. friend has alluded to the loss, by this Senate, of two distinguished members who were with us last session who are here no longer. One of these hon. gentlemen, it was my good fortune to know well as a colleague in the House of Commons, Senator Robitaille. He was a man of ability, who took a prominent part in the discussion of public affairs while a member of the House of Commons. He was entrusted by the Crown with the discharge of high and important duties as a citizen of Canada, and a subject of Her Majesty, and he was subsequently appointed by Her Majesty a member of this chamber. My hon. friend has also alluded to a gentleman who was a member of this House, but whom I had not the good fortune to be intimately acquainted with, the hon. member from Prince Edward Island. I have no doubt that that hon. gentleman possessed all the qualities which my hon. friend has ascribed to him. We may differ, hon. gentlemen, in our view of public matters. We may be sometimes arrayed with some heat against each other on questions of great public moment. We differ: we may honestly differ on those questions, but when we come to discuss the character of men who are no longer with us, it would be indeed a most ungracious thing, if it were possible, to speak otherwise than kindly of those who can no longer appear in this chamber and speak on their own behalf. I am sure that those who are associated with me have none other than the most kindly recollection of both hon. gentlemen who have ceased to be members of this chamber since the last session. My hon. friend who is associated with me in the government, and who has been much longer a member of this House than I have been, of course knows the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island more intimately than I had the good fortune to know him.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is usual on occasions like this to allow the remarks of the leaders on both sides of the House to stand as expressions of opinion of hon. gentlemen generally, but I cannot allow this occasion, when reference has been made to a former colleague of my own in the provincial government of Prince Edward Island, and my colleague in this House, and a gentleman with whom I had been intimately associated privately and publicly for a very long time, to pass without adding my tribute of respect for his memory. The Hon. Mr. Arsenault was not a man of what we would call very brilliant abilities as a public man, but he had worth in a very great degree, very strong native worth. He was a man modest in his demeanour, tolerant in his views and loyal to his friends and his principles. My hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, spoke of him as though he had entered public life in Prince Edward Island in 1873 for the first time. In that respect my hon. friend was not correct. He entered public life in 1866, and he enjoyed the confidence of the same constituency for 29 years. In all the changes and vicissitudes of that length of time he retained the confidence of his constituents who comprised English and French, Protestant and Catholic. He sat in the provincial government as a colleague of my own for 12 years. He was a member of two administrations before that time, and he enjoyed, as I have said, the respect of his opponents as well as of his political friends through the course of his long political life. He was a business man of the strictest integrity, and no man ever lived in Prince Edward Island who bore a fairer or more honourable name than the Hon. Joseph O. Arseneault. I regret that just at this moment the Acadian people of our province have lost both their representatives. The gentleman who represented them in the House of Commons died a very short time ago, and the hon. gentleman who represented these people in the Upper House has also died. I trust that the government will not lose any time in appointing a gentleman to fill the position that has been made vacant by the death of the Hon. Mr. Arsenault. It is rather unfortunate for a little province like ours, to have lost two of its nine representatives since last session. I trust the leader will carry out the promise he has been good enough to make, that these appointments will be made at a very early date.

The motion was agreed to.

CROW'S NEST PASS RAILWAY STOCK.

INQUIRY WITHDRAWN.

The following notice of inquiries was called:

Has the Canadian Pacific Railway Company applied to the government for authority to increase its capital stock on the Crow's Nest Pass Railway under the authority of the Act of 1893, which requires the sanction of the government thereto? Has the government any knowledge of preference shares being issued under the authority of the same Act but which does not require the sanction of the government, or bonds being issued under the authority of the charter giving the company power to build branch lines?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON said: With the leave of the House, I beg to withdraw this notice, as the information is contained in the annual report of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which has been issued since I placed the notice on the paper.

The motion was dropped.

RAILWAY RATES ON PURE BRED STOCK.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON rose to—Call the attention of the government to the announcement recently made by the Grand Trunk Railway that the railway companies had decided to charge only one-half fares hereafter on pure bred stock, and inquire if a similar concession will be given on government railways.

He said: I daresay it is known to hon. gentlemen that a very strong complaint has been made, in the interests of the farmers of the Dominion of Canada, with regard to the rate charged by the different railways, government as well as company railroads, on farm stock, more especially on pure bred stock for breeding purposes. Speaking for the farmers of my own section of the Dominion, it is found that an economical manner of improving the blood of live stock in many lines is to buy from the advanced farmers and importers in the province of Ontario; but it is found that the rates charged by the railways for the carrying of single animals is almost prohibitive. It makes the expense very great indeed. Where a party imports by the car load, the rates are still very high; but when that is done, they are not so oppressive as they are when the ordinary farmer has to buy a single animal of any of the different lines of stock for the purpose of improving his herd. This has been a subject of complaint, and the Dominion Breeders' Association has taken up the matter, and the Breeders' Association of the Maritime Provinces also has the matter under consideration. It affects them not only in the matter of the improvement of herds, but also in exhibiting at the various exhibitions. The rates have been so high that competition at exhibitions is confined almost to the farmers in the immediate locality where the exhibition is held, whereas if more reasonable rates of freight were charged the competition would become more general and opportunities would thus be given farmers living at distances from the great centres to compete, to purchase stock there, it may be, and to improve their herds by bringing stock home, or to selling what they had to dispose of. I notice by an item in one of the Ottawa papers that this matter has been represented to the railway companies, that a deputation consisting of the Hon. John, Dryden, J. I. L. Hobson and J. W. Hodgson, representing the Agricultural Department of the Government of Ontario, and the Dominion Breeders' Association have interviewed the Grand Trunk Railway, and as a result of that interview the company has announced that a concession of one-half is to be made on the rates charged for the shipment of pure bred stock on the railways owned by the railway companies. I presume from that statement that it includes the Canadian Pacific Railway as well as the Grand Trunk Railway and the other railway companies of Canada, but there is no statement here as to whether the government railways, the Prince Edward Island Railway and the Intercolonial, have agreed to this concession, and my object in bringing that matter before this hon. House is to ask my hon. friend the leader of the House whether the government railways have made the same concession, or are prepared to make the same concession as has been made by the Grand Trunk Railway and which appears to be made by the other different railway companies.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The notice of the hon. senator appeared for the first time this morning and the leader of the House had not observed it. I noted it about an hour ago and spoke to the Minister of Railways on the subject. His attention however had not been called to it, but he said he would be very glad to give the matter some consideration. I may state that the rates on the Intercolonial Railway and also on the Prince Edward Island Railway are considerably below the rates on the Grand Trunk Railway.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think not on this class of freight.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—So I am advised. However, it is not a matter I am prepared to discuss now. Mr. Blair said he would take the matter into consideration and let me know later on what his conclusions are. I do not think the attention of the government had been called to it by any of the Breeders' Associations to which the hon. gentleman has referred, because the subject seemed to be new to the Minister of the Railways, and I had only an opportunity to bring it to his notice a few minutes before I came into the House. He said he would look into it and send an answer later on.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am quite satisfied since the hon. gentleman has promised to look into it and give a reply. When will he be able to give his answer—say Monday next?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will confer with Mr. Blair.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I hope the Minister of the Railways will look carefully into the statement made by the hon. gentleman that the government railways already have been charging a lower rate.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I did not state it as absolutely correct. That is my impression, but I may be wrong.

DRUMMOND COUNTY RAILWAY SUBSIDIES INVESTIGATION.

MOTION POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called :—

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed—

1. To inquire into the amount, source, and expenditure of all subsidies granted to the Drummond County Railway Company, and of all other moneys received and expended by the said company, and the times and manner of such expenditure,

2. The capital stock of the company, proceeds of all sales of same by the company, subscriptions of stock, names of subscribers, amounts subscribed, calls made thereon, and amounts paid on same, transfers of stock from time to time, and to whom.

3. The financial position of the company, its liabilities, matured or accruing, inclusive of bonds sold and their proceeds, of loans, or advances made to or by the company, and the application of the same, together with particulars of all guarantees or endorsements given to or by the company in relation thereto.

4. The particulars of all offers, or negotiations for the sale, lease or transfer of the company's property.

5. The classification and condition of said railway and equipment, at any time or times, together with all matters and things relating to the said Drummond County Railway Company, inclusive of all negotiations and dealings with the Government of Canada in reference to the said company.

Said Committee to be as follows :—The Honourable Messieurs Clemow, Cox, De Boucherville, Ferguson, Kirchhoffer, King, Loughheed, Landry, Miller, Mills, Macdonald (B.C.), Power, Prowse, Primrose, Thibaudeau (de la Vallière), Wood, and the mover; with power to send for papers, persons, and records, and to employ such persons as the Committee may deem necessary for the purposes of the said investigation, and to report from time to time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL said: I move that this notice be discharged, and that it be set down for Monday the 21st of this month. My reason for asking this postponement is the fact that an investigation is now going on in the other branch of parliament, and on looking into a somewhat analogous procedure in the House of Lords some years ago, I find that, while their lordships agreed upon the important fact that the House of Lords has the same rights and privileges as had the House of Commons in investigating matters, particularly the finance of India, their lordships agreed, after a discussion of some little time, upon the one point which was then discussed, and that was the power and right of the lords to proceed at the same time that the Commons were proceeding with their investigation. The Duke of Argyll, who took part in the discussion, intimated that he it thought would be better, in the interests of the subject which was then before their lordships, that they should wait for a short time until they could ascertain how far the Commons committee had gone in the investigation of the finances of India, and then he wound up with this language :

> Should any suggestion emanate from the Commons committee, of which the government and their lordships might doubt the propriety, it would be their lordships' duty to institute a full inquiry before passing any measure founded on it.

Or in other words, that if the Commons Committee did not make a thorough investigation, or if they made any suggestions which their lordships might think were not in accordance with the evidence and facts, then it would be the duty of their lordships to proceed further with the investigation, and if their contention should be sustained, then it would be the duty of the House of Lords to reject any measure which might be presented to them founded on the report of the Commons Committee. I have no desire —and I am quite sure that the hon. gentlemen who voted as they did when the question of the Drummond County Railway was before the House, had no desire—to duplicate expense and the trouble that would follow in this investigation, it would therefore be quite proper for the Senate to postpone for a time, at least, the investigation, until we ascertain how far the Commons Committee are prepared to go in the investigation of this question. If they should fail in obtaining or seeking that information which I have asked for in that motion, then it will be the duty of the Senate to proceed with the further investigation and ascertain whether the contention of the Senate when they rejected that bill at the last session is correct or not. For these reasons I ask that the order be discharged and set down for Monday the 21st.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have no objection to the postponement that the hon. leader of the opposition suggests. I stated last year that the proper place for an examination into the expenditure of public money, was the House of Commons, and I referred to the precedent in the House of Lords that my hon. friend has mentioned to-day, the appointment of a Committee to investigate into the financial expenditure of India. If I recollect, that was a proposition for a joint committee. Disraeli at the time objected to the House of Lords investigating the matter, on the ground that the expenditure of public money was a matter which solely belonged to the House of Commons, but in reply to him Mr. Gladstone said that that objection, if taken against an appropriation made by the House of Commons in England for expenditure within the United Kingdom, would be strictly correct, but that the expenditure of money of the people of Hindostan was a matter which was as open to the House of Lords to investigate as it was to the House of Commons, because it was an investigation into the expenditure of money which had not been appropriated by the House of Commons and therefore did not come solely within its jurisdiction. My hon. friend, I noticed in the resolution that is before us, has as the first resolution :

> To inquire into the amount, source and expenditure of all subsidies granted to the Drummond County Railway Company, and of all other moneys received and expended by the said company, and the times and manner of such expenditure.

Now that is an inquiry into the expenditure of public money. It has happened in the House of Lords that they have inquired into the expenditure of public moneys, but it has not been the express object of the inquiry. It has been the mere incident of the inquiry, and if my hon. friend were to suggest that there should be an inquiry into the management of the Drummond County Railway and into the finances of that railway as an incident to that, there would be a right to inquire into the expenditure of the moneys which had been appropriated from any source, no matter whether it was a public source or not. I am not going to discuss the character of the resolution to-day. We shall consider that when my hon. friend reaches his resolution at the time to which he proposes its consideration shall be postponed.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I am somewhat taken by surprise at the course which has been pursued by the hon. gentleman who has this motion in charge. There may be a good deal of force in what the hon. gentleman has said, that it might be wise for us not to duplicate the expense of investigating the affair of the Drummond County Railway here while a similar investigation is going on in the House of Commons, but that information was in the possession of my hon. friend at the time he made this motion, and it should more properly have precluded him from moving it at all until the necessity was called for by the refusal of the Commons Committee to make an investigation as fully as we thought it ought to be made under the circumstances. With regard to the question of the power of the Senate to deal with a question of this kind, I, for one, am for standing up for the rights and powers of the Senate as far as we can do so consistently with the provisions and terms of the British North America Act. I do not admit that we are on all fours on constitutional privileges and powers with the House of Lords. We all know that the House of Lords is an evolution of centuries of government in the old country, whereas this Senate, although intended to be modeled in the main on the House of Lords as to our general constitutional powers, is created by a written constitution and has clearly defined powers given to it by that constitution, which are not possessed by the House of Lords. I say I do not think that in this House we should be the first to question our own rights and powers. We should leave that to others. We should stand up on all occasions for the rights, powers and privileges of the Senate, even when there is a doubt, and if the case should be decided against us by competent authority, it would then be time enough for us to submit, but I do not believe in giving away anything we can properly claim in this House with regard to an investigation of this character or any thing else. There is a very sweeping clause in the British North America Act, which I quoted last session, in which it says that the rights, powers and privileges of the Senate and House of Commons shall be the same as those of the British House of Commons under certain restrictions and qualifications. If we can, under that power, claim larger powers than are possessed by the House of Lords, why should we do not do so? It is in the public interest that we should try to do so, because we have here a more impartial tribunal for the investigation of delicate questions of this kind than the House of Commons, where party feeling is more bitter than in this branch of Parliament. I do not intend to enter into an argument with my hon. friend the Minister of Justice who has no doubt given this subject a great deal of study, and no doubt is sincere and candid in the views he expresses, but it must be remembered that my hon. friend has never looked on this House with a great deal of favour, that in early days he was not one of its champions, but very much the reverse, and although I hope, now that we have him amongst us with a comfortable portfolio he will look upon this House in a more friendly spirit than formerly, still we should regard with suspicion any action of the hon. gentleman when he undertakes to curtail in any way the rights and privileges of the Senate. Party feeling is as likely to sway my hon. friend as any one else. There are members on the government benches of this House, who sometimes stand up for the rights of this House as strongly as anyone could wish. Sitting behind me is an hon. member (Mr. Power), who published articles in the Toronto Globe in defence of the Senate, yet he was willing enough last session to go back on his previous utterances and to coincide with my hon. friend in his view of the rights and privileges of this House, and he dropped the remark, when some reference was made to the Franchise Bill, that he understood that was merely a domestic matter belonging to the other House, whereas we all know there is no question in British history on which the House of Lords has more frequently, and at the risk of its existence come into collision with the House of Commons, than on that question. Where party feeling does not come in, I would trust my hon. friend to advocate the rights and powers of this House to any extent, but where party interests are to be subserved it is surprising how the clearest headed men are led astray. With regard to the constitutional powers of the Senate, I want to call the attention of the House to another very important fact, and I think it will have a good deal of influence on hon. gentlemen in this House. We had as leader of the Senate last year, the predecessor of the present Minister of Justice, Sir Oliver Mowat, who was admitted to be, when he was in parliament, the ablest constitutional lawyer and the most profound jurist in public life. I do not think any other member of the legal profession in parliament attempted to dispute his eminence or to rival him while he was in the Senate. When this question came before the Senate last session, that hon. member was especially anxious that it should go over for investigation until this session, and he pledged his word of honour, as a Minister of the Crown and the leader of this House, that the investigation should take place this session. But the point I wish to allude to is this, during all that debate, in which the then leader of the House spoke on several occasions, notwithstanding his eminent ability as a constitutional lawyer, he never once raised a doubt as to the power of the Senate to enter into an investigation such as is contemplated by the resolution of the hon. member from Hastings. It had great influence with me, because I know if the then Minister of Justice conceived there was the slightest ground for objecting to the constitutional powers of the Senate to make an investigation of this kind, he would certainly have done so, but he did not do so. I ask hon. gentleman to look through the debate which took place on that occasion and they will find that although Sir Oliver Mowat spoke four or five times, he never raised a doubt as to the constitutional power of the Senate to deal with such an investigation as is now contemplated by the motion before us, and he never controverted for a moment the clause in British North America Act which I cited and which I claim gave us power clearly and distinctly. I conclude by saying that I regret that my hon. friend has postponed this motion. It would have been better not to have made it when he did than to postpone it from day to day, because it would appear as if the Senate was not really in earnest in proceeding with this investigation, and I came into the House to-day with the intention of asking my hon. friend to drop my name from that committee if he did not intend to proceed with it at once. I shall not ask him, however, to do that to-day, as he has concluded to take his present course after consultation with his friends. I leave the responsibility with him, but I cannot say it is a course of which I approve

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think the leader of the opposition has pursued a proper course, and I am sure if my hon. friend had followed him as closely as I was able to do, sitting near him, he would have found that he gave an excellent reason for the course he had taken. He showed that when a similar situation arose in Great Britain no less an authority than the Duke of Argyll said, that as the House of Commons had undertaken to investigate it would appear to be better to delay until it should be found whether this committee which the House of Commons had moved would institute a complete inquiry, and he then intimated that if a complete inquiry was not instituted by the House of Commons, it would be competent for the House of Lords and perfectly right for them to go on and institute a complete and thorough inquiry of their own, before they would consider any suggestion which would emanate from this committee.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Will my hon. friend tell me whether the committee of the House of Lords was asked for before or after the committee of the House of Commons?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—On that point I am not sure. I am not sure how it originated, but anyway the House of Commons had got ahead of the House of Lords in appointing a committee, and that being so, in order to prevent the appearance of jealousy, the course of the House of Lords was, as announced by the Duke of Argyll, to wait until they would find whether the House of Commons committee would make a thorough and exhaustive investigation, and reserving to themselves the right to proceed with an independent inquiry before they would pass any legislation emanating as a suggestion from the House of Commons committee. Therefore I think my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, has excellent precedent to guide him in the course he is pursuing at the present moment. I was, like my hon. friend from Richmond, somewhat surprised to hear the hon. leader of the House again, as he did last year, question the right and power of this House to institute an inquiry of this kind. I know very well that it is the usual course for the members of the House of Lords, as it is indeed for members of the House of Commons, to assert to the fullest extent the rights and privileges of the House of Parliament in which they sit, and this course is certainly expected when a gentleman leads a branch of parliament, and I felt a little surprised, that my hon. friend the leader of the House should once more question the right of this House to institute an inquiry of this kind.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—After a unanimous vote last year in favour of a committee.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—After a unanimous vote last year in favour of a committee.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have no objection to a committee.

Hon Mr. FERGUSON—If so, I misunderstood entirely my hon. friend. He referred then to the question of a joint committee that was proposed in 1871, in England which has been referred to by the hon. leader of the House, and said that it was then settled, as far as the opinion of Mr. Disraeli and others was concerned, that the House of Lords should not properly form part of a committee to investigate that subject, and the reply which was made by Mr. Gladstone and others was, that as it was not an inquiry into the public accounts of the United Kingdom it was quite proper for the Lords to take part. My hon. friend, if I understood him right, seems to take the same ground to-day that he took last year, that it was conceded on all hands that the House of Lords had no right to enter into an investigation of the financial affairs of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Perhaps my hon. friend will allow me briefly to state my position. It is this—not that an inquiry should not be made into the affairs of the Drummond County Railway, but I say when the House is expressing a determination to inquire into the amount of subsidies granted, that the House is by that form of expression, and that declaration as to the object of the inquiry, encroaching on the jurisdiction of the Commons.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That does not materially affect the manner in which I understood my hon. friend. He took the ground that this House of parliament had not a constitutional right to inquire into the Drummond County matter in the manner in which it is proposed to make the inquiry by the motion of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition in this House. I think my hon. friend has escaped a very important feature in regard to this question, showing its entire dissimilarity from the case that occurred in 1871 in Great Britain with regard to the inquiry into the financial administration of India. The proposal that was then made was an inquiry into the general financial administration of India, and I agree with my hon. friend that all the speakers who took part in the discussion, both in the House of Lords and House of Commons, were agreed upon this, that the House of Lords had no right to introduce an inquiry or to take part in a joint committee in an inquiry into the general financial affairs of the United Kingdom. That point was settled; but it was not settled, it was not questioned, they did not enter into the discussion at all as to whether the House of Lords had or had not the right to inquire into particular expenditure in regard to the financial affairs of Great Britain and Ireland. That point was not reached, was not touched at all in the discussion. I have gone over the matter very carefully. I have extracts from the speeches then made in my hand, and I take the ground, and take it with all confidence, that the point was never reached, either in the House of Lords or in the Commons at that time as to whether the House of Lords had or had not the right to inquire into the expenditure of any special department, in the affairs of the United Kingdom; but apart from that—this is the only authority that is quoted—I can refer to an instance in our own parliamentary practice. I can refer my hon. friend, the leader of the House, to a case which occurred in 1870, when the Hon. Senator Wilmot, a member of this House, proposed a resolution. I have the remarks that were made upon that resolution, if I have not the resolution itself. It was a resolution that the Senate of Canada should appoint a committee to inquire into the general public accounts of the Dominion of Canada, and here is what Sir Alexander Campbell, the leader of the House, and a very eminent authority with regard to legal and constitutional questions generally, said upon that occasion:

> He said he did not differ from the mover as to the power of the House to appoint select committees, but he did differ from him as to the power of such committees to deal with the general public accounts and expenditure. The Senate could properly appoint a committee for a specific purpose, say, for instance, to examine into the expenditure on Rideau Hall, which had been alluded to by the mover, but they could not appoint a public accounts committee.

The ground taken by Sir Alex. Campbell, which was properly taken, and with which we will all agree, was that it would not be proper for the Senate to appoint a public accounts committee to perform the work the House of Commons committee is doing with regard to the financial administration of Canada, but while taking that ground, Sir Alex. Campbell was equally specific in his statement, and pointed out to Mr. Wilmot that expenditures in connection with Rideau Hall, to which he had referred in his speech, were expenditures, although voted by the House of Commons—and that is precisely a case which meets the objection of the hon. gentleman—was a subject within the power of the Senate of Canada to inquire into. Another gentleman spoke on that subject as well as Sir Alex. Campbell, the Hon. Mr. Hazen, who was known by many gentlemen in this House who sat with him. He said :

He was satisfied, as far as his researches had gone, that the Postmaster General (Sir A. Campbell) had correctly stated the practice of the House of Lords. That body appointed a select committee to inquire into the particular matters of expenditure and not on public accounts.

And Mr. St. Just, at that time an eminent member of this House, proceeded to speak on the subject :

The House could not perhaps appoint a committee for the direct purpose stated by the mover, but they could appoint committees to examine into the expenditure of the different departments, and although they could not go so far as the committees of the other House, they could give the opinion, that the particular department of expenditure had not been excessive. He would suggest that the motion be allowed to stand over so that it could be altered to establish the right of the House to inquire into the expenditure of any particular department.

Mr. St. Just went even further than Sir Alexander Campbell in his declarations, and all these gentlemen were unanimously of opinion that while the House could not, on the motion of Mr. Wilmot, appoint a committee to inquire into the general expenditure of the Dominion, they could appoint a committee to inquire into the expenditure of one department, and that is very much more than is proposed to be done by this resolution. It is not necessary to cite these authorities. We have in our minds precedents. Hon. gentlemen in this House will remember, and most people in the Dominion of Canada will remember, that during 1878 Sir David Macpherson, at that time a member of this House, made several important motions—I have them before me—challenging the public expenditure generally and on the strength of that, long and very important discussions took place in this House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—But not an inquiry by a committee.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There was an inquiry by a committee, and I thank my hon. friend for reminding me of that. My hon. friend surely sat in this House when Sir David Macpherson made his famous motion for a committee with regard to the expenditure on the Fort Frances lock.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—And answered that, too.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Surely then, if my hon. friend admitted so far that Sir David was right, and that the House had the power to examine by committee into the expenditure in connection with the Fort Frances lock, he will not stand up now and say that we have no right to inquire into this Drummond railway matter. Another member, Mr. Girard, in the same year, in the Senate, made an equally important and searching inquiry by a committee into the harbour improvements and other large expenditures incurred at Fort William and Port Arthur. These committees were granted and they sat, and very voluminous evidence was taken and appended to the journals of this House during that year. The Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, premier of Canada, appeared before one of these committees and gave evidence, and if this House has not the right to inquire into such a matter as this, it is very strange the discovery of the fact has been left to this day.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I am not only surprised but somewhat grieved to hear this motion proceed from the hon. knight who leads the opposition in this House. It will be in the minds of everybody that during last year, not only in the newspapers but on the floor of this House and the Commons, the Drummond County Railway matter was held up as almost as great a scandal as the Baie des Chaleurs deal, and we were told by the newspapers that the Senate should step in and interfere and prevent the purchase of that road, which was said to be a most scandalous transaction. After all this it is proposed to let the matter drop and leave it entirely in the hands of a committee in the House of Commons I am not speaking disrespectfully of the House of Commons, but I think we pretty well know what the report will be, where party feeling runs so high. Hon. gentlemen may say, "if the report of that committee does not suit us, we will have a committee of the Senate to investigate the matter." Would it not be better not to have a fight with the Commons? Let the Commons attend to their business and we will attend to ours, without having a collision with the Commons. Supposing the hon. gentleman says the report of the House of Commons is not what was borne out by the evidence taken, and we will appoint a committee of our own? Is not that a gauntlet thrown down to the Commons to stand up for a fight? I do not think the purchase of the Drummond County Railway was spoken of in stronger terms than this railroad deal we will have before us shortly, and should we lead the public to believe that we will get into a fury one session and denounce a contract as a scandal and as a disgrace, and demand a committee to investigate into it, and then let it drop? What will the papers say? How will we feel ourselves? We will feel that all this abuse we have heaped upon the Klondike deal is a mere bagatelle and we are going to treat it just in the same way as the Drummond County Railway. We will have that dropped. I must apologize for the course I have taken, in opposing the resolution of the leader of the opposition. I do not acknowledge any leader in the House myself, nor do I think the opposition should have a leader. I think we should act according to our own views. I am under no government except my own conscience, and having that I am induced to make these remarks. I think we are stultifying ourselves and we are lessening our influence in the country and all we have to say about the Klondike matter will amount to nothing. They will say that we will treat that just as we did the Drummond County Railway matter.

Hon Mr. POWER—The House will allow me to say a few words in respect to this matter, inasmuch as I have been in a rather unexpected manner brought into the discussion. I speak only for myself. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman from Richmond (Mr. Miller) in saying that we have the constitutional right, the strict legal right, to inquire into a question concerning the expenditure of money just as the House of Commons have the right to inquire into it, but every one knows that the English constitution and English parliamentary practice are a matter of precedent, and a matter of compromise, and a matter of etiquette and convenience.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—So is ours.

Hon. Mr. POWER—So is ours very largely. Now it may be that, under the strict wording of the British North America Act and the Act passed in amendment of it in 1876, our committees have a right to inquire into questions like the one which is now under consideration, and it is barely possible we might have the right to amend a money bill, but this House has never undertaken to exercise the right to interfere with a money bill in any way, and I remember that the hon. gentleman from Richmond when he occupied the chair of this House—a chair which he filled with great dignity has ruled resolutions out of order because they indirectly dealt with the expenditure of money.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Have you the citations?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I was quite unprepared for this discussion, but I can get the citations, as I was myself a victim of my hon. friend's ruling on two occasions. We have, perhaps the strict legal right to deal with this matter, but I think the position taken by the hon. leader of the opposition is on the whole a sound and judicious one. One of the reasons given in the discussion on confederation in the Canadian parliament of that day why it was thought that the upper house should not be elective was that an elective upper house would think it had the same right to deal with money questions which the lower house has, and that a nominated upper house would not be so likely to trench upon ground which was supposed to be peculiar to the lower house and there would be less danger of conflict between the two houses. Notwithstanding that view, if the public interest called upon us to inquire into any expenditure of money, we should make the inquiry, but I do not think at the present time that the public interests do call upon us. We could not vote the moneys which were expended in connection with the Drummond County Railway and we could not have controlled in any way the Act under which they were appropriated, and consequently it seems to me the more reasonable thing is that if an inquiry into the expenditure of those moneys is to take place, it should be in the chamber which alone has the right to vote the money and decide upon the manner in which it is to be expended. If that chamber fails in its duty to inquire into the alleged misappropriation of public moneys, then I think it would be our duty to exercise our legal right, and have the investigation. But that is not the position to-day. A committee has been appointed in the other chamber for the purpose of inquiring into this subject. The opposition, the party to which the hon. leader of the opposition in this House belongs, is ably represented on that committee. There are two of the best lawyers in parliament representing the opposition on the committee, and there is an ex-Minister of Railways; so I do not think there is any fear whatever that the investigation before that committee will not be fairly satisfactory. If it is not satisfactory, then it will be our duty to act, and as I have said, the leader of the opposition has taken a perfectly proper view of it. If the committee of the other House, which is more properly charged with an inquiry of this kind is actually making the inquiry, why should we interfere? Why should we duplicate their work? I do not think there is any reason for it at all. It is true we are not busy, but still there is no object in our undertaking to duplicate here the work which is going on at the same time in another place. There is another technical difficulty that might arise, that documents necessary to use as evidence before our committee might be impounded by the other committee and when we came to inquire into the matter we might have very great difficulty in getting them. I hope I shall always be, as I have been in the past, an upholder of the rights and privileges of this House. But then we must be reasonable, and when no harm is going to be done, and when convenience is to be served by not acting, there is no reason why we should act. When there is occasion for our acting, when it is necessary to uphold the authority of this House, as I said just now, I hope that I shall be always as ready as any other hon. gentleman to do so.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—This appears to me to be an extraordinary circumstance. The government carried out, during last year, a certain contract for which it had no sanction of parliament. We threw out the government measure, yet they went on with the contract. To say now that we have no right to inquire into the matter sounds rather strange. The government, I consider, are going contrary to the law and to the constitution. I remember very well what occurred last year. They went round the corner, and even played sick, in order to get their measure through, yet we are told that we have no right to inquire into the proceedings of the government. If we have not that right, the Senate is no longer of any use and we might as well go home. I say, go on with the committee. I care very little for what the Duke of Argyll may have said in the House of Lords. I look at the common sense of the matter and I say we should inquire why the government have ignored the vote of this House. By a sleight of hand trick the money of the people has been expended contrary to the vote of this House, and yet we are told that we should not make an investigation. I, for one, say that we should go on with our inquiry; otherwise the people of Canada will think very little of us.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The hon. gentleman from Halifax said that at the confederation debates, when this House was being constituted, it was made an appointed instead of an elective House, largely because an elective House would have power to interfere with the public expenditure, and that, therefore, that was prima facie the reason why senators should be appointed. Now, there is a vast distinction between the position we hold with regard to expenditures included in the budget and other expenditures. We have the power to throw out the Supply Bill, but we cannot amend the principle of taxation contained in it, which, under our constitution, is especially reserved for the representatives of the people; but when a measure authorizing public expenditure, a separate matter from the Supply Bill, comes before us, that is quite a different matter. We are called upon to pass the Supply Bill, but if we think there are any reasons why there should be an investigation into the expenditure of the money, we have the power, and it is in the public interest, to make that investigation, and the people will be very thankful and support whatever action this House may take in such a case. As I understand the position at present, the Senate inaugurated the inquiry last session.

This session, the hon. leader of the opposition put his notice on the paper. That was followed by a notice being put on the notice paper in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The notice in the House of Commons was first.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Last year a promise was given that an investigation should take place by the Senate committee. That has been to a certain extent forestalled by the action of the House of Commons but there is this difference between the motion in that House and the motion in the Senate—the motion that is before the House of Commons deals only with a portion of the subject embraced in the motion before this House. Whether it is wise for us to abrogate our rights and abandon a position that we are justified in taking, and which it is our duty to take, is just one of those questions which have been very ably discussed by my hon. friend from Richmond. Having asserted our right and obtained the promise of the government that this investigation should be held, some better reason should be advanced than any we have heard before we give up the investigation.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the motion is put, I wish to set myself right with regard to a remark made by the hon. senator from Richmond in that introductory remark. He said, as I understood him, that I knew a committee had been appointed by the other House when I put my motion on the notice paper.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is not correct according to the records. No committee had been appointed by the House of Commons when I gave notice of my motion.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—What I said was this, that my hon. friend knew that a committee had been moved in the House of Commons when he gave this notice. The committee had not been appointed, but notice of its appointment had been given by the premier.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman is quite right in his statement, but if he will read the notice put on the paper by the premier he will find that it was confined exclusively to an investigation into the expenditure of moneys granted by the Dominion. It was as follows:—

> Resolved, That a special committee of the House be appointed to inquire into the expenditure of subsidies granted by the parliament of Canada in aid of the construction of the Drummond County Railway and into all negotiations and transactions between the government of Canada and any member or officer thereof, or any person in its behalf, and the Drummond County Railway Company, or any director, officer or person in the company's behalf, relating to the acquiring of the said railway by the government; with power to send for papers, persons and records, and to report the evidence to this House, together with the opinion of the said committee thereupon.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—That fact tells against the hon. gentleman's position. That is the reason why he should go on with his motion.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I desire to take exception to the hon. gentleman's reference to myself, when he said that I was aware of certain things when I put my notice on the paper, and that, therefore, I should not now ask for a postponement of the appointment of the committee. I have not asked the House to drop the question, as has been intimated by some hon. gentlemen who have spoken; I have no more desire to drop this inquiry than any one else has, or to do anything which would reflect upon the independence and honour of the Senate. I gave my reasons for asking a postponement for a short time. I did not intimate any intention not to ask for a committee unless circumstances should arise to justify it. When the right hon. premier put his notice on the paper in the House of Commons, it was simply to make an inquiry into the expenditure of subsidies granted by the Federal government. On seeing that notice, I at once drafted this motion which I thought covered all the points that it was necessary to investigate, my object being to inquire not only into the expenditure of subsidies which had been granted by the Dominion government, but also into the expenditure of subsidies given by municipalities and by the Quebec government, whether in money or land—to ascertain whether they had really been spent in the construction of the road, in order to ascertain whether we should be justified in ratifying a bargain which we believed to be extravagant and improvident. That was the idea I had at the time, and I think that was the idea of those who approved of putting the notice on the paper. Since then, at the instance of the opposition in the House of Commons, the inquiry in that branch of parliament has been enlarged to a certain extent. Whether it will go far enough can only be ascertained after they have proceeded with their investigation. The hon. senator from Halifax put the matter very clearly and fairly—there are a number of documents now being laid before the House of Commons committee which it would be necessary for us to place upon our records in case we go on with the investigation, and if at the time mentioned in my motion, a week from next Monday, we come to the conclusion that the Commons committee is not making a thorough and exhaustive investigation into this whole question, my hon. friend will find that I shall be quite prepared to move for the appointment of the committee and go on with the investigation as vigorously as possible. I had no idea that the general question of the rights of the Senate was to be discussed on this motion, and I shall refrain from citing precedents until I move for the appointment of the committee. Then, if it should be necessary, we can have a thorough discussion on the subject. I have given this explanation in order that the Senate may distinctly understand that the postponement of the motion is not indicative of a desire on my part to drop this question or to place the Senate in a false position before the country. The Senate has a duty to perform in relation to this as to other matters. There is another important matter before the country now, and it is a grave question whether a committee of the Senate should not be appointed to ascertain whether the course pursued by the government in reference to that matter is a justifiable one.

The motion was agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL ARRANGEMENTS AT THE ALASKA BOUNDARY.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON rose to—Ask the government if it is the intention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to go to Washington to facilitate international arrangements that may be mutually beneficial to the citizens of both countries in crossing their respective national boundaries to the mining regions of Alaska and the Canadian Yukon?

He said: This motion has been standing upon the paper for some time, and if I had not been slightly indisposed before the Senate adjourned, I should have asked the question some time ago before the recess. However, I do not know that the time was more opportune then than it is now, in consequence of the recent action of the United States Senate with regard to the very subject that I desire to deal with in reference to this matter. The time is opportune to ask this question, and for the government to consider the advisability of ascertaining upon what grounds the common interests which exist in the north-western part of this country, on both sides of the international boundary, can be best promoted. I do not know that it is necessary for us to look upon our neighbours as natural enemies. They are rivals in trade and commerce, and they compete with us in various ways, but beyond that I do not know that we should regard them other than friends. But what I wish to point out is this: Our neighbours, in their legislation, take advantage of the leniency of our laws in order that, by their legislation, they may direct the trade and commerce of this country to their advantage in a manner quite different from that in which our legislation designed to place it. Take for instance first of all the question of our lumber trade. We have two classes of limit holders in this country, the limit holders of the United States who take the logs across free into the United States territory and manufacture them there and distribute the products in their own country. We have on the other hand the limit holders of Canada who manufacture the logs into lumber in Canada and distribute it in Canada and the markets of the world. The logs that are cut by the United States limit holders in the Canadian woods go to the United States free, while the United States government impose a duty of $2 per thousand on boards manufactured in this country. The consequence is that the United States limit holders are benefited by a discrimination of $2 per thousand, while the Canadian limit holder is placed at that disadvantage as far as the United States market is concerned. The tendency of that legislation is to give a monopoly of Canadian timber limits to American holders, and gradually drive the Canadian lumberman out of his own country. That is one instance in which the United States legislation has been turned to the detriment of Canadian interests in consequence of the concessions that we give to our neighbours. The only way that could be stopped is not to allow the logs to go out of the country. That is a question of policy that I do not propose to discuss at the present moment. I am merely pointing out the manner in which United States legislation is turned to our disadvantage in that respect. Then take our fisheries. Fish are admitted into the United States free if caught with United States nets by United States companies, but if caught with Canadian nets or by Canadian companies they are not admitted free into the United States, so that United States fishermen come into our country and catch our fish beside our fishermen and by that species of legislation are enabled to monopolise the fishing trade of the country. Right in my own part of the country, at Lake Winnipegosis, the Buffalo Fishing Company is operating, and every year sends a number of men there to catch fish and freeze them for shipment to the United States market. Those fish are admitted into the United States free, while fish caught by the Canadian fishermen beside them are taxed at the border. That is another instance in which our trade is interfered with quite contrary to the intention that we have in allowing United States fishermen to come over here and catch our fish. The only way to prevent that is to prepare our fish for other markets, and divert our trade where such unequal privileges do not exist. We have found that every time we have been driven out of the American market by hostile legislation, we have found better prices and readier sales elsewhere. Then, again, pulp wood is another instance. Pulp manufactured in this country is excluded from the United States market, while the United States legislation admits pulp wood free to be manufactured by their own people. Then we come to the question of our fisheries on the Atlantic coast. The United States Senate has lately passed legislation in regard to that matter. They tack on to a resolution with regard to the mining regulations in the Yukon territory of Canada a condition that we should give up the rights that our fishermen enjoy on the Atlantic coast under the treaty of 1818. That treaty accorded to our fishermen the exclusive right to land and get bait on our own coasts, and also to take the short cut across our own territory to the United States market. The treaty gives us that right, and the United States was accorded that right with the right of fishing also within the three-mile limit by the treaty of Washington. Since the expiration of the fisheries clauses of that treaty we have been generous enough to concede to United States fishermen the right to catch bait in our harbours, and also to tranship fish. The only condition we attach to it is the payment of a small fee, I think $1.50 per ton, and these fees, in the aggregate, amount only to about $4,000 a year, so that we have practically, in the most generous way, given to the United States of our own free will and accord, the right that they now attempt to take under conditions attached to a bill recently passed by the United States Senate. With regard to that particular question, it would be impossible for the people of Canada to give up the rights of our fishermen on the Atlantic coast in order to purchase some rights for Canadian miners on the Pacific coast. To consent to such a proposition as that would be entirely out of the question, and a most unstatesmanlike attitude in our internal government. Any negotiations in regard to our Atlantic fisheries must rest upon their own merits. Then, take the action of the United States Senate in regard to the coasting laws. Hon. gentlemen are well aware of the regulations that appertain to the navigation of certain rivers on the Pacific coast. As hon. gentlemen know, from Mount St. Elias down to the border of British Columbia, the United States claim a very narrow strip of land all along the coast; while we own the hinterland, the coast line is in the possession of our neighbours. They obtained that right by the purchase of that country from Russia. How far inland that peculiar strip along the Pacific coast extends is an open question yet, and it is also an open question as to how far the United States are infringing upon our rights. As I understand it, we agreed upon fixing the 141st meridian, and upon taking Mount St. Elias as a starting point; then our dividing line comes down the coast, the treaty says that the line passes on the coast range of mountains, but if the coast range should be further than ten marine leagues from the shore, that is 30 miles, then ten marine leagues from the coast belongs to the United States, but if the coast range should come nearer than 30 miles, then the territory beyond is Canadian territory. The unsettled state of that question is leading to difficulties between the two countries at two most important points, that is Dyea and Skagway, which are used for ingress into the Canadian Yukon. The whole difficulty of ingress into that country is in the passes of these high mountains. There are three passes within some seven or eight miles of the towns of Dyea and Skagway, which indicate that the coast range passes close to the coast at the head of the Lynn Canal, and is the dividing line between Canadian and American territory, even if the American contention that the coast line conforms to the indentations should hold good, and yet the United States claims have extended 30 miles from Dyea and Skagway for the purpose mainly of reaching the head waters of navigation of the Yukon at that point, in order that they may claim the independent right of navigation. It is necessary that a boundary commission should be appointed in order first of all to ascertain what coast range is meant by the treaty, and the mountains that mark the international boundary and how far fixed points mentioned in the treaty justified the American interpretation of the delimitation, and in case the boundary commission cannot hit upon the exact interpretation of the treaty, then that there should be an arbitration in order that there may be no disputes about these questions of territorial rights. It is a very important question for us to decide, but it is quite possible for us to overcome all those difficulties by approaching the question in a friendly spirit. If the two governments can only approach one another in a friendly spirit and recognize the rights that belong to each respectively, then I think all these questions could be settled to the manifest advantage of the great interests that are springing up in the north-west corner of this continent. The rights that are owned by Canada and the United States are about equal. The United States own that great peninsula of Alaska which is practically a closed territory to them for something like eight or nine months of the year. The only access that they could possiby have to it is by the Yukon River, which is some 1,600 miles long up to the 141st meridian, and any ports that are north of Skagway, I fancy, would be so blocked by ice that they would be practically impossible for navigation or to be utilized, and, therefore, the great part of Alaska is closed, commercially, for eight or nine months in the year. They want to reach the eastern boundary of Alaska, in order to prosecute the mining industries, which exist very largely in conjunction with us on the Canadian side of the boundary. They can only reach the southern portion of Alaska in the winter time through Canadian territory. Without our sanction, no railway could be built and no mode of ingress to that country, in which there are very rich mines, could be obtained by the United States without crossing our territory. Now, we are not in that dependent position that they are, so far as reaching the peninsula of Alaska is concerned. They reach their own boundary on the coast line as far south as British Columbia, because they have navigation to that district, but to get beyond and to carry on any kind of business in the winter time, they are dependent entirely upon concessions made by Canada in order to carry that out. We, on the other hand, would like to have free access to our own territories through the ports that exist on the Pacific Ocean. It is not a matter of vital importance that we should have it, but still it is a great deal better that our people on the Pacific coast should have all the advantages that they believe are necessary to them in the prosecution of mining and trade in the large districts springing up in the Yukon region. When we come to realize that we are both in the same position, that our interests are identical, that the interests of the miners on both sides are identical, and are about equal in advantage of one another and in disadvantage, that are intent both upon identically the same thing and that is to develop the industries that exist to a very great extent, it is a basis upon which a friendly and a mutual understanding could be arrived at. It is not wise for either government to hold the other at arms' length. It is far better that we should recognize one another as friends, intent only upon one object and that is the promotion of the best interests of both people, the care of the unfortunate miners who are subjected to enormous hardships because the proper facilities have not been afforded to them in the progress of their industry, an industry which is producing great wealth throughout the country, an industry which is going to distribute immense advantages to the country if the fullest advantage can be taken of what exists there. There is no reason in the world why the two governments should be passing resolutions and bills counter to one another in order to restrict the prosecution of that industry rather than to make the most of it and to do the very best that we possibly can. Now, hon. gentlemen, I will read you clause 13 of the bonding bill that has been lately passed by the United States Senate. The bill was introduced because of the complaints that were made by United States miners that we forced them to go and get their free miners' licenses at inconvenient points—forced them to go to Victoria, Vancouver or Dawson City, in order to force people to come and trade at these ports. To offset that the United States Senate take up the question and passed a bill which contains this clause :

That under rule and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, the privilege of entering goods in warehouses and merchandise in bond or of placing them in bonded warehouses at the port of Wrangel, district of Alaska, and of withdrawing the same for exportation to any place in British Columbia or the North-west Territory without payment of duty is hereby granted to the government of the Dominion of Canada and its citizens, or citizens of the United States, whenever and so long as it shall appear to the satisfaction of the President of the United States, who shall ascertain and declare the fact by proclamation, that no exclusive privilege of transporting through British Columbia or the North-west Territory goods or passengers arriving from or destined for other ports in Alaska is granted to any persons or corporations by the government of the Dominion of Canada, and that the privilege has been duly accorded to responsible persons or corporations operating transportation lines in British Columbia or the North-west Territory of making direct connection with transportation lines in Alaska, and that the government of the Dominion has consented to, and is allowing on behalf of the citizens of the United States, the entry free of duty of all miners' outfits and a supply of provisions and clothing, the whole not exceeding in quantity 2,500 pounds for each citizen of the United States proposing to engage in mining in British Columbia, or the North-west Territory ; and that the government of the Dominion of Canada has removed all unequal restrictions as to the issue of miners' licenses to all citizens of the United States operating or intending to operate in British Columbia or the North-west Territory. And further, that fishing vessels of the United States, having authority under the laws of the United States to touch and trade at any port or ports, place or places in the British dominions of North America, shall have the privilege of entering such port or ports, place or places for the purpose of purchasing bait and all other supplies and outfits in the same manner and under the same regulations as may exist therein applicable to trading vessels of the most-favoured nations and of transhipping their catch to be transported in bond through said Dominions without payment of duty in the same manner as other merchandise destined for the United States may be thus transported.

The debate on this section of the bill was quite spirited, and brought into the controversy the old fisheries question on the New England coast, which has been pending between the United States and Great Britain for 100 years. The statement was made on the floor of the Senate that there was every reason to believe that by the passage of the bill the fisheries question could be settled without great effort, as assurances to that effect had been received from a large and influential element in Canada.

Now, that is the bill which has been passed by the Senate of the United States, it reads on the face of it what its intention is —to force the Canadian government to place the free miners' licenses at the disposal of United States citizens at points convenient to them and not according to our own regulations. It further imposes upon the Canadian government the obligation of admitting a ton and a quarter of mining supplies free of any duties we may see fit to impose. It also claims equal fishing rights in Canadian territory. That legislation is on a par with the legislation which has conferred the advantage of $2 a thousand on lumber manufactured from Canadian logs in the United States over lumber manufactured in Canada, and legislation which gives United States fishermen an advantage in our waters over Canadian fishermen, and so on. As an offset to that resolution of the Senate I would call the attention of the honourable House to the mining regulations of the United States :

United States mining laws and regulations thereunder, relative to the reservation, exploration, location, possession, purchasing and patenting of the mineral lands in the public domain.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

MINERAL LANDS OPEN TO EXPLORATION, OCCUPATION AND PURCHASE.

Sec. 2318, R.S.—In all cases lands valuable for minerals shall be reserved from sale, except as otherwise expressly directed by law.

Sec. 2319.—All valuable mineral deposits in lands belonging to the United States, both surveyed and unsurveyed, are hereby declared to be free and open to exploration and purchase, and the lands in which they are found to occupation and purchase, by citizens of the United States, and those who have declared their intention to become such, under regulations prescribed by law, and according to the local customs or rules of miners in the several mining districts, so far as the same are applicable, and not inconsistent with the laws of the United States.

4th July, 1866. 10th May, 1872.

Now, hon. gentlemen will see the condition under which the mining licenses are granted in the territories of Alaska, only United States citizens or those who have taken the first steps to become United States citizens shall be allowed to mine in that country at all. You see, hon. gentlemen, what a disadvantage that places Canadian miners at. The United States citizens, under the present law, are allowed to come into our territories and secure claims under our regulations coincident with British subjects wherever they may come from, and can go over the line into Alaska and get a double advantage. The United States miner can divide his time between the two and do just what he chooses. That is a disadvantage we should not continue to labour under. Here are two contiguous territories, one belonging to the United States government and the other to the Canadian government. The United States miner has the right to mine in Canada, but his government excludes the Canadians from mining in the United States territory, although the natural conditions are exactly equal, and the United States miners cannot reach the mining country in Alaska excepting through Canadian territory.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Oh, yes, they can.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—What way?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The Yukon River and other ways.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—But they have to traverse five thousand miles in order to reach the territory I am speaking of. They can only utilize the Yukon River about three months in the year and the steamboat can make only two trips in the season, so you see the difficulties they have to contend with, they are absolutely excluded from that territory excepting during the three months and a half when navigation is open. They want to have continuous communication in prosecuting the industry if it is to grow to any size at all as a mining industry and that is the position in which they are placed. The position they place us in is claiming the right to mine in Canadian territory while excluding the Canadians from mining in their territory. I say the Canadian government should approach the government of the United States and say "If you will equalize things, if you will allow the same advantages in the matter of transportation to Canadian citizens across the Alaskan coast strip that you ask of us in the hinterland, and that we are giving to United States citizens in our own territory, it is a very easy thing for sharp shrewd men like the United States people to see that it is to the advantage of miners that their industry should be prosecuted upon the basis of equality and upon a basis that will give advantages to the miners of both countries and not place restrictions and create contentions and make difficulties which affect the miners themselves, and instead of the miners of the United States and the miners of Canada working harmoniously shoulder to shoulder doing their best and assisting one another, they are made contentious in consequence of the difficulties that their respective governments place in the way of their operations. Now I look upon it that that is a most unfair condition to leave our people in after having read the bill of the United States Senate and the mining regulations of the United States. I have therefore introduced a bill into this House to-day to amend the Canadian mining regulations for the Yukon. The bill reads as follows :—

AN ACT TO AMEND THE CANADIAN MINING REGULATIONS FOR THE PROVISIONAL DISTRICT OF YUKON.

HER Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows :—

1. The regulations governing placer mining in the provisional district of Yukon, North-west Territories, as established by Order in Council, dated 18th January, 1898, are hereby amended by striking out section 1 thereof and substituting the following:—

1. Every person over, but not under 18 years of age, if he is a British subject, or if he has taken and subscribed, as provided by section 8 of the Naturalization Act, chapter 113 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, the oaths of residence and allegiance, or the oaths of service and allegiance, and every joint stock company, if a majority of its directors are British subjects or have so taken and subscribed the said oaths, shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges of a free miner, under these regulations and under the regulations governing quartz mining, and shall be considered a free miner upon taking out a free miner's certificate. A free miner's certificate issued to a joint stock company shall be issued in its corporate name. A free miner's certificate shall not be transferable.

2. This Act shall not come into force until a day to be named by proclamation of the Governor General.

3. At any time after this Act has come into force, if it appears to the satisfaction of the Governor in Council,—

(a.) that, by the mining laws and regulations of the United States of America in force in the Territory of Alaska, British subjects may, in the Territory of Alaska, explore, occupy and purchase mineral deposits and the lands in which these are found and may obtain patents for public lands of the United States of America in the Territory of Alaska, without in either case being required to become citizens of the United States of America or to declare their intention to become such citizens; and

(b.) that facilities the same as or, in his opinion, equivalent to those afforded by Canada to citizens of the United States of America for the transport of persons and goods through the province of British Columbia and the Provisional District of Yukon, are afforded by the United States of America to British subjects for the transport of persons and goods through the territory of Alaska;

the Governor in Council may by proclamation declare that, on and after a day to be named in such proclamation, this Act shall not apply to citizens of the United States of America; and if such declaration is so made this Act shall not so apply.

4. At any time after this Act has come into force the Governor in Council may, from time to time, by proclamation, except from the application of this Act the subjects of any foreign power or powers other than the United States of America.

That is practically copying in their spirit the mining regulations of the United States. That bill will come before this honourable House in its proper time, when hon. gentlemen will have the opportunity of discussing its merits and the necessity that exists for our taking such a course. That is a preliminary to what I conceive to be a statesmanlike position for the government to assume in negotiating with the United States government for an equality of rights and privileges in that territory, where the conditions are so equal as they now exist. In order to show hon. gentlemen that we are not at all dependent upon the good-will of the United States in regard to navigation of the coast line and the ports on the coast line which they hold, I would just give you a comparison of the distances and the different routes that exist to reach that territory.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—Might I ask the hon. gentleman if he is not going a little too far with that bill. A measure of that character should be placed before this House by the government of the country, and they should take the responsibility of negotiating with the United States government. I think a bill of that kind introduced by a private member is out of place.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The hon. gentleman will understand that I am quite within my right in introducing this bill, and I am not exceeding the powers that are conferred upon me as an individual member of this Senate. It is a question of policy on my part, whether it is a wise one or not. I would be very glad indeed to fall in with the view expressed by the hon. gentleman, if the government adopt the view I advocate in regard to this matter.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Do not discuss the bill now; it is not before us.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—Did not you say that you would introduce the bill?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I have done so this afternoon, but I have no desire to take it out of the hands of the government. If the hon. leader of the government approves of the bill I should be only too glad to hand it over to the government and let them assume the responsibility. Since introducing this bill I am told that a smilar bill was introduced by a private member in the House of Commons. I have not seen what form it is in, but I have been told that it is a bill to the same effect.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is true.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—So that I seem to be only following a precedent which has been recognized as a proper one in the lower House.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The two bills cannot pass.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I quite understand that, at the same time I am told the bill that was introduced yesterday in the House of Commons, is an amendment to the Alien Act while this is an amendment to the Mining Act, in which case they will not clash. I am introducing this bill to give force to the argument I am using now in regard to the mining rights of Canadians in that North-west Territory, and looking at it from that standpoint, I feel quite justified in taking the position I do in regard to it. I want to bring to bear all the points I can in order to show that we are not dependent upon our neighbours for any concessions or advantages, that we can prosecute our industry quite independently of them, or anything that they have it in their power to withhold from us or restrict us in, and I was just going to show the various routes that exist in order to reach that territory. There is the Stikine route, 1,542 miles, 700 of which is ocean route. Then from Skagway it is 1,581 miles.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—From where?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—From Vancouver to Dawson, and the Dyea is 1,575 miles, of which 1,000 is ocean. The Dalton route is 1,507 miles, of which 985 is ocean, The ocean route by St. Michaels is 4,450 miles—that is to the eastern boundary of Alaska, United States territory. Then we come to the Edmonton all-rail route, which is 1,342, or some 200 miles shorter than any one of those routes. The Ashcroft route is also all-rail 1,540 miles. The Prince Albert route by water is 2,889 miles, and the Prince Albert route by Edmonton is 1,550 miles. There are the various routes any one of which is open to Canadian miners. I would like to show hon. gentlemen the advantages the Edmonton route possesses. All the other routes are 1,550 to 1,581 miles, and the Edmonton route is 1,342.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—From where?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—From Vancouver to Dawson.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—But by the Edmonton route.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He is calculating from Edmonton—not from Vancouver.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I am merely calculating from Edmonton as the objective point. Of course when you come to discuss the question, you must recollect that there are five million people east of the Edmonton route who desire to obtain the most favourable route that they can in that district.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—There is no objection to that certainly.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—And I suppose three-fourths of the trade on the Pacific coast will always be done by our United States neighbours and therefore we are practically subsidizing a route for the benefit of a trade which is one-fourth Canadian. The Edmonton route is 1,342 miles, but of course there is this feature about that route, that from Calgary to Edmonton is 200 miles and Calgary to Vancouver is 650 miles and therefore you have to take off 450 miles from the 1,342 miles by Edmonton which you save between Calgary and the coast. You understand that if you take any one of the coast routes you have to travel 450 miles on the Canadian Pacific Railway that you would not have to travel if you took the Edmonton route. There is a saving of 450 miles of railway in reaching the interior of that mining country. Therefore that reduces the Edmonton route in comparison with the other routes to about 900 miles.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—From where?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—From the Northwest Territories, travellers on any train from Ontario or Quebec or the Eastern States save the distance from Calgary to the coast, and you take a northerly route. The distance from Calgary to the ocean is 650 miles. Allow the 200 miles to go north to Edmonton and there is a saving of 450 miles. Then if you take 200 miles off between Fort Selkirk on the Yukon and Dawson City and you actually reduce the mileage necessary to travel to about 700 miles, as compared with the mileage by the coast route. I show the immense advantage of the interior route over any of the coast routes. I am not arguing in this way in order to detract from any of the coast routes. but to show the people of the United States that any effort that they make to exclude us by an inimical policy will operate against themselves very much indeed by excluding them from any advantage they might otherwise possess. I do not wish to enter into a discussion of this question upon its merits, because the Yukon Railway Bill, which is now before the House of Commons, will probably be before us soon, but I do not wish to let the opportunity pass to reply to the position that has been taken by the Senate of the United States in regard to the bill that they have seen fit to pass for the purpose of capturing, by their legislation, rights that we have been conceding to their miners and fishermen as a free gift. We have been allowing them to enter our country and take any claims they choose ; we have put them on a par in every way with British subjects. We have made no distinction or difference. The only condition we imposed was that they should call at Vancouver to get their free miner's license, and because we did make that distinction the Senate of the United States saw fit to pass their bill to exclude us from the coast and hamper us on those water routes that are confirmed to us by treaty rights. I immediately saw that it became necessary for us to let the United States know the concessions that we were giving to United States citizens, that we were allowing them equal rights and equal privileges with British subjects, and that they could not claim a continuance of them in the face of the hostile legislation that they saw fit to put on their statute book. Now, hon. gentlemen, I believe that it is the best interest of this country to grant a charter to a railway from a point on the Lynn Canal, Pyramid harbour, without a subsidy, and reserve our financial force until we are better informed. Three hundred miles of railway will place our joint trade on the main Yukon from that point, and the value of that route is sufficient to attract capital without any assistance. Of the 300 miles, 290 passes through Canadian territory, and it will prove the speediest way of developing it under present circumstances, but as the largest share of the coast trade would be American, it would be unnecessary for for us to subsidize it. I think I have made out a case for the information of the government. The object I have in view is to suggest to the government that they should try and make it as easy as possible for the miners of that country. I do not know who they are, but humanity demands that we should be as generous in our ideas towards the United States miner as the Canadian miner in the difficulties they have to contend with in that north-west country, and that we should, in addition, jointly with the United States, endeavour to make the road as easy as possible, not only in the interests of humanity, but also in the interests of the trade that can be developed on both sides of the boundary line; and, therefore, I think an arrangement could be made by which equal advantages could be accorded to the citizens of both countries in regard to miners' licenses and transportation. It need not interfere necessarily with the general mining act of the people of the United States. We have a mining act designed for the Yukon district, and if the United States were to pass an act specially designed for the Alaska district, they could easily legislate giving equal advantages to the miners of both countries, and both countries would work shoulder to shoulder and develop that country for their own individual benefit and for the benefit of Canada and the United States in the north-west part of this continent, within their respective bounds.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not know whether my hon. friend looks for a reply to his speech. In reply to his question I would say that it is not the intention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to go to Washington to facilitate international arrangements.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Hear, hear. They are there too often.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Whether those arrangements would be beneficial to both countries I am not prepared to say at the present time. My hon. friend has alluded to the bill pending before Congress and which has been adopted by the Senate of the United States. That bill legislates, as far as it goes, in many respects in a manner inconsistent with our undoubted rights. I do not think the Senate proposed that bill with the expectation that it would become law, but with the idea that it might interfere with the financial arrangements of the gentlemen who have the contract with the Canadian government subject to the approval of parliament, and it may be for the purpose of furthering the interests of those who want to construct railways by Dyea and Skagway, which my hon. friend seems to favour.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend says hear, hear. I am not in favour of constructing a railway into territories that are the property of Canada through United States, territory that may at any moment be controlled by the United States and closed to the people of Canada. My hon. friend knows right well that the people of this country, while the United States had a canal connecting the waters of Lake Superior and Lake Huron, nevertheless felt it was in the interests of Canada, not simply for commerce, but for paramount political considerations, to construct a canal at Sault Ste. Marie and not to put it in the power of the United States government, when any notion seized them, to embarrass this country in maintaining its rights to territories beyond the waters of Lake Huron. Now, there was infinitely less necessity for that work, on political grounds, than there has been for the establishment of a Canadian line of communication between the settled portions of this country and that territory in which gold has been discovered, and which we trust will at an early date become a settled portion of the territories of Canada. It would be manifestly inconvenient on my part to undertake to discuss a question that is inseparably associated with that enterprise of connecting the North-west Territories and the Yukon country, but when that measure comes before the Senate I have no doubt that my hon. friend beside me and myself will be enabled to give a satisfactory account to this House of the course which the government has taken and of the reasons for adopting that course. Upon a question put upon the notice paper this House will not expect me to go into a discussion of the policy of the government with respect to that matter.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I am very glad to hear the announcement of the hon. minister that it is not the intention to send any minister to Washington. I think we have had plenty of that kind of thing in the past and that we have nothing to expect from Washington. If they want anything from us they can notify us. We want nothing from them and have nothing to give them. With regard to the speech of the hon. member of Shell River, it is very inconsistent. First of all he preached conciliation and good-will and seeing what could be done to bring about a better feeling between the two countries. That is all very well, and I think that part of his speech ought to have been made in the Senate of the United States. They are the first to be aggressive and to try to coerce Canada and take away some of the rights to which we are entitled and give us nothing in return. They tried by threatening to force from us concessions which they have no right to. There is no use making that speech here. The hon. gentleman after preaching conciliation brought in a bill of retaliation.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Or coercion.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—And so the hon. gentlman's line of argument is not consistent?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Oh, yes, it is.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Although I fully agree with him that if we do not get similar concessions from the United States to those which we give, we ought to meet them with blow for blow.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—There are now two bills. He wants to give them a double dose of their own medicine.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—We have nothing to expect from them at all. The only thing they hold over our heads is the bonding privilege, and I think this country would get over that to-morrow if it was withdrawn. Commerce now coming to United States ports would come to our own ports. It might disarrange our railway system and traffic, but after a time we would get over it, and they would lose more than we would. I am not going to discuss the question of routes now. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman intends the Minister of Customs to traverse those routes on his way to Washington. I hope not. When the Yukon bill comes before us we can go into routes and distances, but in addition to whatever routes we may have this side of the Rocky Mountains, we must have routes on the west. There is enormous traffic there, and whatever route you have here we must have our route, whether built by the government or by private enterprise.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not know whether this is the proper time to discuss this question I wish to call attention to one or two remarks of the Minister of Justice. I understood him to say that the desire of the government was to construct a road which would not be subject to the interference of the United States, and that he was opposed to the building of a road through any portion of the country which might ultimately fall into the hands of the United States. If I understand the geography of that country at all, the port which the government propose to make the port of departure to the Yukon country is Fort Wrangel, which is in the United States. If the contention of the Canadians be correct, then Pyramid Harbour, Dyea and Skagway are within Canadian territory, so that if the proposition of the hon. gentleman from Shell River is carried out it is possible that these ports will be found to be exclusively within British territory while Fort Wrangel never will be. Even under the Washington treaty Fort Wrangel will always be subject to whatever regulations may be adopted by the United States custom authorities, and by such regulations they can virtually destroy British trade going into that section of the country. What I should like to know is how my hon. friend reconciles these facts with the other fact that Fort Wrangel is without dispute in United States territory, while the other ports, which are considered to be much better and afford access to a much better route as some contend, may be, after the line of demarcation between the two countries has been defined, found to be in Canada.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman is no doubt aware that, under international law, where two countries have an equal right to a river running through the territories of both, the incidents of lightering and transhipping have always been permitted. The contention of the Canadian government is that we have the right to tranship at the mouth of the Stikine River. In the treaty between Russia and Great Britain in 1825 the words which gave Canada the right to use rivers running into the Pacific Ocean were very much broader than the words of the treaty of Washington. The latter treaty, however, is very clear in its language. It says that the Stikine River shall be free, for the purposes of commerce, to both countries.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Subject to——

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Subject to such regulations as either country may make.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Subject to such customs regulations as the United States may make.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We can make regulations so far as our portion of the Stikine Rives is concerned, and they can make regulations so far as their portion is concerned. It is a singular fact that some 22 or 23 years ago we were discussing the question of the navigation of the Stikine River as we are to-day. At that time the United States approached Canada in the interest of United States vessels going up the Stikine. The centre of the gold mining at that time was in the Cassiar district, and the United States miners frequented those mines by going up the Stikine River. There was no Canadian port then nearer than Victoria, so that United States vessels bound for the Stikine River were obliged to report at Victoria. The United States government asked the Canadian government to grant them facilities to enable them to utilize the Stikine River in Canadian territory. They argued in this way—unless you make regulations to enable us to freely use the river, you are controverting the terms of the treaty, and so, in accordance with the request of the United States government, a Canadian custom-house was established some 15 miles from the mouth of the Stikine, and a conventional line was drawn at that point to enable the United States miners to enter Canadian territory.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—But bulk was not broken?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, it must have been, because vessels loaded at United States ports and sailing to the Stikine could not ascend the river without transhipping to lighter vessels any better then than they can now. There was no friction whatever between the two countries at that time. For some time an international boundary was defined where it crossed the Stikine—a conventional boundary, for the convenience of United States traders who were passing up the Stikine to enter Canadian territory. At that time—about 1875 or 1876—correspondence was entered into with the United States government with a view to establishing the boundary between Alaska and Canada. It was then looming up as a section of the country that was of some importance. The United States was asked to unite with Canada in locating the boundary line. The president of the day and the government at Washington acquiesced in the proposition and a bill was submitted to Congress appropriating a sufficient amount to define the boundary between this country and Alaska. Congress refused to vote the money and from that day to this the United States have thrown obstacles in the way of locating the boundary line. The late government brought the question up for the consideration of the United States authorities several years ago, but all that has been so far obtained is the issuing of a commission to locate the 141st meridian which runs from Mount St. Elias northward. That is the extent to which the boundary has been so far defined.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—That is from Mount St. Elias, northward?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, but there it is merely a matter of astronomical calculation.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—We lost territory by the point that was agreed upon at that time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, in order to meet the wishes of the United States government to make the apex of Mount St. Elias a starting point, our government consented to declare it the starting point no matter whether it was on the Canadian side or not. It is not a matter of very great importance, because the meridian does strike the mountain about 20 miles west of its apex. However, that is not the most essential point between the two countries now, it is the defining of the boundary from Mount St. Elias southward to the southerly point of Prince of Wales Island.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The Yankees would not have made that concession to us; we are always making concessions.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is a matter of very great regret that although 22 years have passed since that time we are as far from settling that boundary as we were then. The United States took possession, without reference to Canada's claims, of a portion of that territory which we claim is within our line. Up to within a few years the importance of that country was not regarded as of sufficient magnitude to warrant any remonstrance. There was perfect freedom between the citizens of the two countries up to a very recent date.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Is it true that the Canadian custom-house has been removed east from Ingish Lake?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not aware, a boundary—I will not say a boundary, but a point has been taken possession of by the customs authorities under the belief that they were well within Canadian territory, I could not exactly locate the point.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Has there been any remonstrance by the United States on that subject?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Not that I am aware of.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The statement made by the hon. Secretary of State is very interesting. I am sure all are very grateful to him for the information he has given us in relation to the boundary, but he has not met the question that I have put. I understood the hon. Minister of Justice to inform the House that the government intended to have a road exclusively within Canadian territory, and that he was opposed to the construction of any road starting from a point which might ultimately fall into the hands of the United States or become United States territory. What I pointed out was this, that Fort Wrangel, the point of departure, is in United States territory and will remain in United States territory even if the contention of the Canadian government be sustained by any commission which may hereafter be appointed, while Dyea, Skagway, Pyramid Harbour and the other points from which it is proposed to build the road, other than Fort Wrangel, will be in British territory if the contention of the Canadian government is affirmed by the commission. If Wrangel is to be the point, it will always be under the control of the United States. I know what the hon. gentleman's contention is in reference to the rights of Canada under treaty, and as a layman I am inclined to think he is correct, but still, there will always be annoyance at Wrangel. What the Secretary of State has said about the attitude of this government towards the United States is quite correct. Some years ago, when I was Minister of Customs, it was found necessary to establish a custom-house at a point on the Stikine River where it was supposed the boundary would be, in order to facilitate trade, and United States trade in particular, in going up the Stikine to the Cassiar district; but there is this difference between the United States government and our own government: during my long experience in the Customs Department no privilege which was not inconsistent with the proper collection of our revenues was ever asked for, that was denied to the United States, even to the carrying of goods through our country, while if we desired to go over a neck of land in their country from one part of Canada to another, a custom-house officer had to be employed and the importer was required to pay an excessive allowance to the United States official, sometimes as high as $9 a day. I remember one instance, in connection with the Rossland district, when it was brought down to $3 a day, but what the hon. Secretary of State says is quite correct, that these concessions have always been made by the Canadian government in a friendly manner, but we have never had a return for it, and the sooner we adopt a policy in this country on the line of the bill introduced by the hon. member for Shell River, the sooner our neighbours will learn that we are an independent people and capable of governing ourselves.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It is rather an unusual thing to have a bill introduced under a notice of inquiry, but for my own part I heartily agree with the spirit and substance of the bill and should be glad to see the plain word "retaliation" applied to the United States in every matter where this country could properly apply it. We should give them a Roland for an Oliver in every instance in which they attempt to interfere with us unjustly. The sooner we do that and show them that we can assert our own rights, the sooner we will cease to be troubled with such legislation as we have recently seen enacted by the United States Senate wherever the least controversy arises. Under the Washington treaty the free navigation of the St. Lawrence was given over for ever to the United States, subject of course to the customs laws of Canada, just as the free navigation of the Stikine and the Yukon on the Pacific coast was continued to Canada as those privileges had been exercised when that country was owned by Russia. What would be thought of Canada—and I think the parallel not a far-fetched one—if this parliament were to pass a bill declaring that the United States would not have the free navigation of the River St. Lawrence unless they gave us permission to kill seal on the Pribiloff Islands? It would be almost the same as to say we shall not have the free navigation of the Stikine and Yukon under the same conditions as they enjoy the navigation of the St. Lawrence unless we give them up our rights to our fisheries on the Atlantic coast. What would be thought if we introduced such legislation as that and it passed this Senate even though it never became law? As the hon. Minister of Justice says, I do not think the bill which passed the Senate of the United States will ever pass both branches of Congress, much less do I believe that it will ever receive the signature of the president, but if we passed a bill of that kind here what would be said of us? Still it would be a parallel case to the action of the United States Senate in connection with the Stikine and Yukon Rivers.

SUBAQUEOUS LEASES IN THE YUKON DISTRICT.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Inquired:

Have subaqueous leases in the Yukon district for more than thirty miles in length been granted to a certain Mr. Russell of New Brunswick, and a certain Mr. Mercier of Quebec—or to any other person or persons? If so, on what date were the leases executed? How many miles have been granted to each person or company? Has the amount of rental in full been paid in each case?

He said: Last session the rumour appeared that some parties were to get a lease of one hundred miles of the Stewart River, in the Yukon district, and a number of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House took objection to that, and said it was too much to give to any person or company. We have never heard anything more of that lease. This session, just before the House adjourned for two weeks, I called the attention of the hon. Minister of Justice to a report which appeared in the papers that a Mr. Russell had obtained a lease of some three hundred miles, and a Mr. Mercier a lease of some two hundred and eighty miles. At the time the hon. Minister of Justice could not give the information that I wanted, and that is why I put the inquiry on the notice paper. I hope the reports are not true, and that the government have not been guilty of giving away such large stretches of river to individuals or companies. The government themselves, by their own regulations, limit the extent of any lease to thirty miles.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am advised by the Minister of the Interior that 30 miles is the extreme limit granted to any party, and that neither Mr. Russell nor Mr. Mercier has been granted any such stretch of river as the hon. gentleman states. I am informed that no leases have yet been granted, though parties may have applied and paid in money. The better way would be for the hon. gentleman to move for the papers, and then we can get at the exact facts. It would appear, from what I have seen in the papers, that a number of persons have applied for leases.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—I merely wished to call the attention of the government to the fact and state that such leases should not be granted. If one man can get, at the outside, only 30 miles, another man should not be allowed to get 100 miles.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The limit fixed by the regulations of the department is 30 miles, and each application must be accompanied by the amount required for the lease. If the hon. gentleman will move for the papers we will be very glad to bring them down.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The government papers, particularly the Montreal Herald, have published a list of persons to whom leases were granted, and in that list there are some 15 Merciers, and eight or ten Guerins. If they come within the regulations adopted by the Department of Interior, permitting only 10 miles to be given to any one person, every member of the Mercier family including the father, mother, sons, daughters, nephews and nieces, must have obtained a lease. That is the conclusion to which every one must come when he reads the list. I presumed it was correct, seeing it in a telegram from Ottawa and appeared in a government organ.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The regulation, if I remember rightly, is that the distance of five miles is leased, and the party may have five of these grants, but he must put a separate dredge on each one and work it. I have not seen the list to which the hon. gentleman refers. I will make the inquiry and see what the facts are. My hon. friend knows that newspapers are sometimes mistaken and sometimes they confound applications with leases.

THE ALASKAN BOUNDARY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If it is not inconsistent with public policy, I should like the hon. gentleman to tell us what steps have been taken for the settlement of this question of the boundary between Canada and the southern portion of Alaska.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The matter has been referred to the Colonial Office, with a view to having it communicated to the Foreign Office.

DELAYED RETURNS.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I must again remind my hon. friend the Secretary of State, of a very old complaint that I have again to make. I am anxious to know when I shall have that return that I have so often asked for.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think I have them all now but one, and I am doing my best to get that one.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Send a search warrant for it.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

EXPORT OF WHEAT FROM MANITOBA.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. WARK moved :

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a statement showing :

The quantity of wheat imported into the Dominion since 30th June last.

The quantity exported during the same period ; and

The quantity exported from Manitoba during like period.

He said :—I will not occupy very much time in explaining this motion. I make these remarks on account of a statement which appeared in the Montreal Witness the first of this month, made by James Campbell, that a very small quantity of Manitoba wheat went to Montreal. He said ten bushels to one went to New York. I could hardly credit it. I think he must have gained his information from some unreliable source and that is why I make this motion to bring down the figures. It would be a most unfortunate thing if the wheat of Manitoba should go to New York. Under the reciprocity treaty Montreal occupied an inferior position as an exporting city. I think it was the eighteenth or nineteenth in the ports of Canada. When I saw this statement to which I have referred, I studied the tables of the Trade and Navigation returns for some years and I find that taking the whole of the three years 1895, 1896 and 1897, only three million bushels in the whole three years were exported by Manitoba to a foreign country, and I think that was made up by United States millers. During the same three years 35 million bushels were shipped to Montreal and perhaps all of it was Manitoba wheat.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Before that motion is put, I should like to explain to my hon. friend from Fredericton in regard to the figures he refers to relating to the province of Manitoba, that the Trade and Navigation returns, as to these exports, are misleading. Manitoba being an inland province, shows no exports or imports except those that go out by way of the United States to Duluth via the Northern Pacific. The exports that go out over the Canadian Pacific Railway are shown as exports of the province of Ontario. That is the reason why these figures show, as the hon. gentleman who has just spoken says, that in 1895, 1896 and 1897, the gross exports from the province of Manitoba appear to be only 3,000,000 bushels for the three years. Of course, everybody knows that that is incorrect, and it would be advisable if the Trade and Navigation returns were so prepared that the true exports and the true imports of the province of Manitoba and the Territories should be properly shown. It is an injustice to have it otherwise. Our exports and imports east and west go to swell the trade returns of Ontario and British Columbia, and which I am happy to see has attracted the attention of my hon. friend from New Brunswick. As a matter of fact, we exported this year 18,000,000 bushels of wheat, 11,000,000 bushels of which went by Buffalo and New York in bond, and were exported to England; 4,500,000 bushels came east for consumption in the eastern provinces, and 1,500,000 bushels went to the port of Montreal for export to Europe. That is the destination, as far as I can ascertain, of the 18,000,000 bushels of wheat which the province of Manitoba had to export this year. It must be referred to, as a matter of very great regret indeed, that 11,000,000 bushels of the wheat which is grown in the province of Manitoba should find its way to Europe, its destination, through foreign ports. Not only is it a loss to the transportation service of the country, but it is a great loss to the farmers who grow the wheat, because, in the state of New York, there is a system of mixing or manipulation of some kind that transfers a portion of the profit, that should go to the farmers, into other hands. One of my neighbours, where I live in the county of Russell, who had gone home to England this year to spend the winter there, wrote to me that he had been on the Corn Exchange and there had seen a sample of Manitoba wheat, which was a most wretched sample. That is the way he expressed himself. He is a man of experience, a farmer who grows the grain, and he goes to the Liverpool Corn Exchange and finds the wheat, which can top the world for the excellence of its quality and everything else, placed on the Stock Exchange, and as he describes it, a very poor sample indeed, in a year, too, that had not an inferior sample of wheat in the whole crop. The reason is that our wheat goes through foreign channels and it is so manipulated that somebody else gets a large portion of the profit of the excellent grain we grow. There are various causes which operate in regard to that, and the government should inquire into how far it can be remedied. The main cause is the competition, the very large competition, that exists in American transportation, which reduces the rate much more than the Canadian marine, which is a close corporation, will carry it for, and a trade for which the C. P. R. and G. T. R. will not compete. The Canadian marine is a close corporation, and it is limited in its power to transport. It prefers to take the four or five millions required for consumption in eastern Canada and make a good profit on that, and let the eleven millions go by the United States, rather than admit of competition. We have the satisfaction to know that, so far as taking a portion of the wheat from the west is concerned, this railroad which passes through Ottawa, the Parry Sound, has built a one million elevator at Parry Sound and a six hundred thousand bushel elevator at its eastern terminus in Prescott. The Huron and Ottawa Canal will be an ally of the Canada Atlantic, but its trade will go to Montreal, not New York.

The Canada Atlantic is preparing to carry a large portion of the wheat from Duluth for export to New York. Whether it will carry any portion of the wheat from Port Arthur is a question. I very much doubt if it will. The reason I give for that is that the Canada Atlantic can take advantage of the marine competition between the American port Duluth and the Canadian port at Parry Sound, but between the two Canadian ports of Port Arthur and Parry Sound the marine transportation is confined to a close corporation, that prefers a small trade with ease to a large trade that taxes their energies too severely. If that should be the case, we will have the peculiar anomaly of Duluth wheat going through Ontario for export to Europe, and Canadian wheat going through Buffalo and New York for export to the same destination for diametrically opposite reasons. These are facts which any of us who live in the west are well acquainted with, and I am very glad of the opportunity that the hon. member for Fredericton has given me to make this explanation on behalf of the export trade.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I cannot say how far the statistics which the hon. member from Fredericton has submitted to the House are accurate, but I have no doubt the House is interested and will be glad to get the information for which my hon. friend has moved. I have no doubt that all the members of this House feel, like the hon. gentleman who has made the motion, an interest in seeing a larger portion of the products of the North-west finding their way to the Atlantic seaboard through Canadian channels. That no doubt will, in the early future, largely depend on the energy and enterprise of those engaged in the transportation trade and especially those of the city of Montreal. I am sure that every effort the railway companies that have termini in Montreal put forward to furnish greater facilities for storing grain there and for transhipment, will be watched with interest and will be cordially seconded by this House. I have no doubt either that this House, or the other chamber, will be pleased to see that the government look with friendly regard on every step that is taken to secure the entire transportation trade, or at all events a very large proportion of it, for Canadian channels. I have no doubt whatever that the amount of trade to-day is far less than it ought to be, but further accommodation will have to be provided at Montreal and Toronto and other lake or river points for the purpose of securing to the North-west facilities for the transhipment of the products of that country.

The motion was agreed to.

THE ALASKAN BOUNDARY.

INQUIRY.

The following notice was called:

If negotiations are now proceeding between the United States government and the Dominion government with reference to the boundary between Alaska and the North-west Territories and British Columbia? If so, are there reasonable grounds to expect that a settlement, fair and honourable to both countries, will be come to at no distant day, without referring any question which may be in dispute to arbitration?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Before proceeding with the inquiry off which I have given notice, I wish to refer to a despatch in the Montreal Gazette which is germane to the question I am bringing up, and I intend to ask the government whether there is any truth in that report. The despatch to which I refer is as follows:

ALASKAN BOUNDARY

A Reported Settlement With the United States. News Comes via New York Though it is Alleged to have Originated in Ottawa it Bears Washington Earmarks.

New York, March 10.—The Press has the following from Ottawa:—

Sir Julian Pauncefote has informed the Canadian ministry officially that he has arranged a convention with the United States whereby the Alaskan boundary dispute has been settled. Under the terms of the convention the British government has conceded the claim of the United States that the three marine leagues should be measured from the shore of the mainland and should proceed along the shores of the inlets, which are thus recognized as arms of the ocean, and not as rivers.

The contention of the British and of the Canadian governments was that the three league limit should begin on the oceanward side of the island, and that the delimitating line should be run across the inlets and not follow their shores. These inlets are numerous, and extend into the mainland a great distance and the decision, therefore, is of much importance to the United States.

The United States has agreed to the British retaining the boundary on the limit of Chilkoot Pass and the White Pass, because in the Russo-British agreement of 1825 the line of demarcation was fixed as one running along the tops of mountains.

The decision, while not entirely unexpected by the cabinet, is regarded with disfavour. It was understood that the British government was irritated at the forwardness of the Canadian ministry, but it was not thought that the surrender would be so sweeping as it is.

Is there any truth in this report.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—None whatever.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I am very glad to hear that. It only remains for me to say that I hope the government will press for a settlement of this boundary question as soon as possible. The longer it is delayed the more difficult it will become, for this reason, the United States government have taken possession up to the limits of their own contention and are now occupying with settlers and in other ways territory which may properly belong to Canada. The longer a settlement is delayed, the more difficult it will be to end the dispute, because it will be most difficult to oust any party, either an individual or a company, that may be settled in the disputed territory. With regard to those inlets spoken of in the dispute which I have read, it is contended by many persons who have gone into the question that the Lynn Canal, on which are situated the town of Juneau and the villages of Dyea and Skagway, belongs to the Dominion of Canada by right. And if that is the case, it would make a very great difference to our rights, and to our navigation in that country, in reaching the Yukon. I do not intend to deal at all with the treaty of 1825, or to put any interpretation upon it. That will be left to the diplomatists, and the legal talent of the two countries concerned. The request upon the government is not to waste any time, but to endeavour to confer with the government at Washington and settle the question as early as possible.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say to my hon. friend, the government have brought the matter under the attention of the Colonial office, the Secretary of which will no doubt communicate with his colleague, the Secretary of Foreign Affairs, and, so far as this government is concerned, they invited the action of the Imperial government on the subject. It is for Her Majesty's government at Westminster to discuss the question with the government at Washington, and I have no doubt they will do so.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The Imperial government requires considerable stirring up. In the Behring Sea we had, year after year, to urge them to take some action in the matter, to appoint a commission of something of that kind, before anything was done.

LIQUOR PERMITS IN YUKON DISTRICT.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY moved :

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, all correspondence by letters or telegrams between the Federal government, at Ottawa, and His Honour the Lieutenant Governor of the North-west Territories, in reference to the granting of liquor permits or the introduction of liquor into the Yukon district, during the last six months; also, any correspondence with the government of the North-west Territories regarding the rights of the North-west Territories in regard to issuing liquor permits for the taking of intoxicating liquor into the Yukon district.

He said : Before making this motion, I do not wish it to be understood that I am in favour of issuing permits for the North-west Territories or the Yukon district, but it has been stated in this House by the hon. Secretary of State, I think, that the government of the North-west Territories had the right under the North-west Territories Act, to control the sale of liquor in that portion of the country, and the hon. gentleman, I think, also stated that the government had directed that the administrator in the North-west Territories should withhold the granting of licenses, or the sale of permits in that country. If that is the fact, and the North-west Territories have, by statute, the right to control the sale of liquors in that country, then the government have done the territories a very great injustice, in a financial sense, by withholding from them a right from which they should obtain a very large amount of revenue. I understand there has been considerable correspondence between the two governments on this particular question, which I should like to see brought down, so that we shall be able to form an opinion as to what the intention was, and better enable ourselves to judge of the stand taken by the government. No permits can be issued, I think, except under the hand of the Lieutenant Governor.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hon. gentlemen know well that the government of the North-west Territories is practically a colonial government of Canada. It is growing every year more and more into the principles and system of responsible government, and I have no doubt at an early day those principles will be effectually carried out in respect to the executive government of that country.

So far the parliament of Canada have not entrusted the executive government of that country with full executive authority. Technically, no doubt, the issue of licenses in the Yukon district was in the Lieutenant Governor of the North-west Territories. The boundaries of these territories are not confined to a limited area by anything contained in the North-west Territories Act. There were no settlers in the Yukon district at the time the government was instituted there, nor have there been until a very recent period. Practically the Yukon country is to day more effectually separated from the North-west Territories than the government of the province of Ontario is from the North-west Territories. It is well nigh inaccessible to the government of that country. In fact, they could exercise no effective jurisdiction in the territory without doing what we find people doing every day who are going thither from the provinces of Canada, they would be obliged to go through the province of British Columbia to reach that territory and to exercise any jurisdiction over it. That being the condition of things, the government did not think, nor did any one suppose that it could be regarded as any of the functions of the government of the North-west Territories, as my hon. friend has suggested, nor could we regard it as any enroachment upon the authority of the goverment of the North-west Territories to write the Lieutenant Governor that it was not desirable that licenses should be issued by him to parties going into the Yukon district, which is nearly 2,000 miles from the seat of government in the North-west Territories. It was thought better that that matter should be left in abeyance, and that the government of the North-west Territories should practically confine their business of government to the district over which they have for several years exercised authority, and that the condition of things in the Yukon should be left to this parliament to deal with during the present session. There will be submitted to parliament this session a bill which I trust will become law, for the purpose of providing a system of government in the Yukon district, and to the authorities of that district will be entrusted so much power as it is felt that they can usefully claim and effectively exercise. I may say to my hon. friend that there is no objection to bringing down any papers which the public interest will permit that are in the hands of the government. I understand that no licenses have been issued in the Yukon district since this subject has been under consideration, and I do not think any injustice has been done to the North-west Territories in asking the Lieutenant Governor of that country not to give his assent to the giving of licenses that were to operate within the Yukon district. My hon. friend will see that the riot and disorder which might be created by the sale of liquor in that country under existing circumstances when the government felt it was responsible for the exercise of control and could exercise no control, might be serious to those who had gone to the Yukon, and deterimental to the future of that country, and that any revenue the North-west government could gain from such a source would be far more than counterbalanced by the difficulties that might arise in consequence.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Can my hon. friend inform the House who is exercising at the present time the office of Lieutenant Governor of the North-west Territories. One cannot fail to observe the fact that there is a Lieutenant Governor whose resignation we understand is in the hands of the government, but which has not been accepted for reasons better known to my hon. friend than to this House. And we also find at the same time an administrator of that government exercising presumably the functions of Lieutenant Governor. Hence we have in the territories two officials exercising presumably all the functions pertaining to that particular office. For some time it has been a matter of considerable conjecture, throughout that western country the reasons why the resignation of the Lieutenant Governor has not been accepted, we are fully aware that the government has tendered that high and important office to several gentlemen, and it has been declined apparently with thanks. We also desire to know how long the declinations of hon. gentlemen belonging to the liberal party are to be continued in regard to this particular office, how long that office is to be hawked about the country and tendered to various gentlemen occupying high positions in that party and how long the dual position so to speak, is to be maintained of our having a Lieutenant Governor there and also of having an administrator. It also appears to me to be quite an anomaly that as certain functions are vested by reason of the North-west Territories Act in the Lieutenant Governor of the North-west Territories, who I presume has a perfect right to exercise those functions entirely irrespective of this government, that this government should interfere in the exercise of that discretion and thus prevent the executive of the North-west Territories from participating in all the advantages of those powers which have already been given them of deriving a certain revenue from licenses and permits which may be issued for the consumption of liquor in the territories. One also cannot fail to observe that the country at the present time does labour under the impression that the Minister of the Interior in addition to the Lieutenant Governor of the territories and the administrator of the territories is also exercising functions in that country in regard to the issue of permits. My attention was directed the other day and I presume the attention of the hon. gentleman also to grave apprehension in the moral circles in Montreal that the Minister of the Interior was about to supply that country with permits. If the public mind is impressed with the idea that the Minister of the Interior is going to issue a large number of permits for the consumption of liquor in the Yukon territory, the government should remove any doubt upon the question. I regret that the Minister of Justice in making his explanation did not inform the House on the point, as to whether the government is issuing licenses in the manner that is generally supposed. There is anther matter on which perhaps the Secretary of State will inform us and it comes peculiarly within the province of his office, that is as to whether the executive of the North-west government has been duly advised of the very radical change which is apparently to be made this session in abridging the limits of the territories and thus very substantially restricting the exercise of the powers of the territorial executive. If a very large and important section of that country is to be cut off from the territorial government and all the disadvantages incident to that particular step are to come into effect, I should like to know why the representatives of the territorial government are not here for the purpose of discussing this matter with the government or does the government intend to dragoon this matter through without saying a word to the territorial government and thus cut-off a very important section of the territories? These are all matters in which we are deeply interested and while not particularly coming within the scope of the question submitted to the House by my hon. friend from Wolseley (Hon. Mr. Perley) yet I think they deserve the very best attention of the Minister of Justice and this House. We should receive information at once on those important questions, particularly the one which is alluded to, namely the bill which is to be brought down this session for the purpose of cutting off the Yukon district from the territories. In connection with that fact I should like to point out to my hon. friend that he is entirely in error in saying that the Yukon district is not incident geographically to the present organized districts in the territories. I should like to inform my hon. friend that the Yukon district can be reached as readily and more securely through territorial routes than by way of British Columbia. I know this fact has become deeply impressed on my hon. friend's mind, and he has reasoned himself into the idea that it is impossible to reach the Yukon by North-west routes. I do not wish at this juncture to anticipate the discussion that is to take place on this point soon, but I should like to ask my hon. friend to keep his mind clear and not have his slumbers disturbed by reason of the belief that that particular country cannot be entered by the routes from territorial points. On the occasion of the debate, which will take place here at a very early day, the most satisfactory information will be given my hon. friend, which, I hope, may disabuse his mind of the impression which at present prevails, that the Yukon district cannot be reached through the territories.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think the explanation given by the hon. Minister of Justice will be accepted by the House, that it was never contemplated that the North-west Council should have control of the Yukon district. A year ago licenses were given in that district by the government of Canada. I am quite sure those licenses were issued without protest from the government of the North-west Territories—that they considered the territory too remote for them to exercise any sovereignty. It would have taken them at any time six or eight months to reach the upper waters of the Yukon. I noticed a day or two ago in a Montreal paper a statement made by a man who has been resident in that country, and who came down through by the Edmonton route, and who warns his friends not to undertake to travel that way, as the hardships are so serious. I mention that simply as an incident; I do not, myself, take any particular stock in it except this, that we all know that the distances are very much greater than by the sea and river routes, that the time usually occupied by the Hudson Bay people who pass over that route is at least six or seven months. That is a matter of history, and it would be idle to expect the North-west government to undertake the control of that territory at this time. The expenses are very much larger in the Yukon district than elsewhere. The hon. gentleman must know that they are far beyond anything in the organized districts. It was never contemplated that the North-west government were to exercise any jurisdiction, and as a matter of fact they never thought of exercising any jurisdiction in the Yukon district. It is only recently the question has arisen to any prominence by reason of their making inquiry as to permits. I believe at present permits are not being issued. Permits were issued last year and the year before to the two large commercial companies that were doing business there.

Hon. Sir. MACKENZIE BOWELL—By whom?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—By the federal government. They were issued, I think, to the Alaska Commercial Company and the Alaska Trading Company. They had permits for considerable quantities, but beyond that I am not aware that any permits have been issued, except one or two last year.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is in the Yukon district?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, confined of course to the Yukon district.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—By what department?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I really cannot inform my hon. friend. I presume they were issued under an Order in Council by the proper authority.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Did I understand my hon. friend to say the other day that Mr. Chambers of Oak Lake had received a large permit.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not think that I said that.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I understood the hon. gentleman to say so.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will the hon. gentleman explain why this government issue permits, and why they request the North-west authorities not to issue any?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Because it is believed that the authority should be here. The territory does not in any sense belong to the North-west Territories, and could not be administered from the North-west Territories.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED — Territorial officials have already gone up there to exercise their offices in that particular regard. May I ask if the government was made aware that a member of the executive and also the license inspector of the territorial government have gone into the Yukon district for the purpose of administering the duties of the executive in that country.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Speaking for myself, I am not aware of it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Neither am I.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understood the Minister of Justice and also the Secretary of State to say that, technically, the Yukon district is within the jurisdiction of the executive of the North-west Territories. It is not only technically within their jurisdiction, but is a portion of the North-west Territories territorially, and they must come within the purview of that executive, and consequently under their control and management. If that be the case, will the hon. gentleman tell us what the peculiar function of Mr. Walsh, who has been sent into that country, as the newspapers have announced, to administer law and justice—in fact, if the newspapers are to be credited, having absolute authority and power in that country? Perhaps it is just as well that the country should be informed on that point. The hon. member from Calgary (Mr. Lougheed) has told us that already there are two north-west officials there; now you have sent another official into that country for some purpose or other.

I repeat, if we are to credit the newspaper reports and the reasons given by the organs of the government, he is sent there, with almost plenary powers, to do what he pleases. If he is not, will the hon. gentleman kindly tell us what his functions are, and what his instructions are, and how far he is entrusted with the administration of law and order in that country?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think my hon. friend had better put a notice on the paper, and we will discuss the subject, and I will bring down any information which the hon. gentleman desires. Major Walsh is there associated with the North-west mounted police, and one of the judges of the North-west Territories is there for the purpose of administering justice under the law. I am not aware that there is any violation of any statutory law that has taken place in anything that has been done.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not say there was.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Those men are there on the ground ready, perhaps, to have further duties imposed on them as soon as parliament legislates.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then I understand the Minister of Justice to say that Major Walsh is there under instructions, and that if I move for the papers he will bring down those instructions?

Hon. Mr. ALMON—May I ask the Minister of Justice if the parties who have those licenses are permitted to sell beer and cider?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I dare say.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to have an answer to my question. I understood the Minister of Justice to say that if I moved for the papers he would bring them down. The inference from that is that there are papers and that instructions were given to Major Walsh in writing when he went to the Yukon territory, and if such be the case, he will bring them down if I move for them.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I shall be ready to bring down any paper that can be brought down consistently with the public interest.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—May I draw the inference that there are papers showing what his instructions are?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not know. Major Walsh was appointed before I became Minister of Justice. If the hon. gentleman will put a notice on the paper I will comply with his request as far as possible.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will the hon. gentleman say that such papers exist?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I cannot state at this moment the character of the instructions which Major Walsh has received. Major Walsh is there associated with the North-west mounted police.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Cannot his colleague tell us?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman seems to ignore entirely the condition of that country last summer, from the extraordinary manner in which he is conducting this debate. It is well known that thousands of men were rushing into that territory and that Canada's sovereignty of that country was being disputed. It became necessary for this government to act promptly and we did so in the interest of this country and to retain the sovereignty of that country by Canada. Major Walsh was selected because he was familiar with the condition of things in North-west in times gone by when there was danger of trouble there, and he was known to be a man of nerve, judgment and force of character and familiar with all the circumstances which prevail there, and so he was appointed to take charge of the mounted police in that territory. He was, moreover, directed to advise the government as his judgment might prompt him when he got there. He was to remain there until order was restored to that country, and I think the fact of his having been sent there has shown the people of Canada that no better policy could have been adopted than selecting Major Walsh and connecting him with a body of police when he went into that country. We could not wait until parliament met. Was the government to lie on its arms and do nothing until parliament met and passed an act defining what powers should be given for the administrator of the Yukon district? It was idle to talk of the North-west government having any control there. They could not reach the country. They were two thousand miles from it. They had no money to equip any force to preserve peace and order, and so it became absolutely necessary for the government of Canada to take action, as it did.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will the hon. gentleman cite an instance in which the sovereignty of the Yukon district was disputed beyond the boundary dispute on the coast.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There has been all along a boundary dispute. That dispute goes back for twenty years and for twenty odd years the government of Canada has been endeavouring to get our neighbours to agree upon a definition of the boundaries. They have not even yet passed an act confirming the 141st meredian. There is no doubt it will have to be approved, because the United States officials have acceded to the belief that the line, as run by Mr. King and those associated with him, in the true line, although they did not exactly agree. However, it has not yet been agreed to by Congress. Then, so far as the fringe of country that runs southward is concerned, that stands in the position it stood in so far back as the year 1825. No progress has been made. Looking at a United States map of that part of the country, you will find it claims 35 miles into the interior beyond where we claim the boundary should lie. Does the hon. gentleman think that the government should have leaned on their oars and waited until parliament met and passed a bill without taking any action to maintain our rights in that country.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That question is not involved in what we are discussing.

Hon Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman disputed our right to do it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend says that for twenty years the dispute has remained the same as it is to-day, yet in the next breath the hon. gentleman raises the cry of urgency by reason of United States pretensions of sovereignty.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman loses the whole point. Three years ago it did not involve any important question—nobody thought anything of the Yukon country then.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We must be obliged to the hon. Secretary of State for the extreme lucidity of his explanation. The leader of the opposition asked if instructions were given to Major Walsh and what those instructions are, and my hon. friend informs him that the sovereignty of this country has been called in question, and that Major Walsh was sent there. He clothed those two ideas with a great many words, but that is the statement. He tells us that the sovereignty of Canada has been called in question for twenty years and therefore Major Walsh was sent there. What answer has he given to the question as to whether Major Walsh received written instructions. That is what we want to know, and whether they will be brought down as the leader of the House said they would be. In reply to these very simple and easy questions, my hon. friend, the Secretary of State, treats the House to a long history as to the sovereignty of the country being called in question for some twenty years.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I should like to know what my hon. friend wants. I told him that Major Walsh went up into that country in connection with the mounted police for the purpose of maintaining law and order, not for the purpose of organizing an independent government there, but for the purpose of carrying on the executive government with which His Excellency the Governor General is entrusted, under the advice of his ministers here, and we fully admit our responsibility for the manner in which that duty will be discharged. If we had undertaken to clothe Major Walsh with legislative authority, the hon. gentleman might very properly have asked us for further information, but if the hon. gentleman is not prepared to show that Major Walsh has violated the law, what is the object of moving for Major Walsh's instructions? I said to my hon. friend that as far as the public interest would permit, if he would put a notice on the paper I would see that the instructions given to Major Walsh or other papers would be brought down, and I repeat that. But my hon. friend has in fact not made out a case, and when my hon. friend from Calgary says that the government of the North-west Territories are entrusted with the government of that country, a country two thousand miles away from the capital of the North-west Territories, he is not talking seriously.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I take the hon. gentleman's own statement. About the first statement he made was that the Yukon territory came within the limits of the North-west Territories Government. Now he denies the district being within the domain of the North-west Territories. My hon. friend says that this session the government intend to bring down legislation to remedy this same difficulty.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I said technically it came within the North-west Territories, but the government of the North-west Territories never undertook to exercise sovereignty there.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I told my hon. friend that two officers of the North-west Territories, one of them the license inspector of the territories, and the other a member of the executive, had gone up there for the purpose of enforcing the law regulating permits, and I daresay the government is aware of the fact.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I never heard of it.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—It is within the memory of hon. gentlemen here that about the middle of February I asked a question in regard to the number of permits granted and to whom granted and the quantity, and the revenue derived from it. The hon. gentleman told me then, as he told the hon. leader of the opposition to-day, to put the notice in the form of an address. To-day that question is unanswered, excepting verbally by the hon. gentleman, who says no permits have been granted, while the hon. Secretary of State said there had been permits granted. It should not be a very voluminous document to prepare. The papers should be laid on the table of the House, and we should not be asked to take the mere verbal answer which I received the other day.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We are not objecting to the motion. It has not yet been put by the chair.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I put the question pure and simple to the hon. Minister of Justice, and when he said he did not know, I asked if the Secretary of State, who was in the government at the time, could give the information. The hon. Secretary of State rose and gave us a long dissertation upon the question of the boundary and the dispute as to where it really exists. He did not approach the question I put, either directly or indirectly. He has an exceedingly happy faculty of evading a question of any kind by making a long speech, not at all relevant to the question asked. Can he answer the simple question, were any instructions given to Major Walsh when he left for the North-west, and, if so, were they oral or written, and, if written, will he bring them down? No; I cannot ask that question as to whether he will bring them down, because he has already answered. If such instructions exist, I will move for them. If the hon. gentleman says he went there without instructions, there is no necessity of wasting time. That is the only question I asked, and I did not ask for a lecture upon the boundary question, and when the hon. gentleman accuses me of trying to divert the debate into another line, I think he had better apply that to himself. My habit is to put questions directly, and all I want is yes or no. The next time I ask a question relating to the Yukon district, probably he will give us a dissertation on preferential tariffs or free trade, or how far the tariff affects the favoured nation treaties. The speech he made had just as much to do with the questions I asked as if he had given us a lecture upon Timbuctoo, or some other place. Can he answer the question whether Major Walsh received any instructions, and, if so, what they were? If he says it is not in the public interest that they should be made public, I will not insist.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman knows that no single member of the government is aware of every act that has been done by the administration. I know generally of the sending of Major Walsh there. At one time the Americans said that Dawson City belonged to the United States.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What has that to do with your instructions to Major Walsh?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It had to do with sending Major Walsh there as the best man to be selected, and he was sent there because he was familiar with the North-west and a man of energy and good judgment, in whom we could place confidence, and he was sent there with general powers to represent the government of Canada in its executive capacity, having under him the control of the North-west mounted police.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Did he go there with any instructions, or had he a roving commission to do as he pleased?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not here to answer the question.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—You are here to answer questions put to you, when they are asked in the interest of the people of this country. That is what I consider you are here for, and not to make speeches and endeavour to get away from the question. It seems to me the government must have instructed him or given him a roving commission to go and govern that country and do just as he pleased. I do not think they would so far forget themselves as to give Major Walsh a roving commission. We all approve of Major Walsh. I believe he stands well amongst the people of this country and they have every confidence in him, but I cannot think that they sent him away without giving him instructions as to what to do. From the remarks of the hon. gentleman one would think they sent him with a roving commission to do just as he pleased.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Nothing of the kind.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Certainly, they must have instructed him, and there may be something in the instructions that the minister might say it would not be prudent to tell. That is all right. But either they instructed him or they did not instruct him. If they instructed him the instructions should be laid on the table; if not, they have given him a roving commission to go and do as he pleased.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, of course not. My hon. friend knows that when Major Walsh goes there, he goes to act under the law and in accordance with the law; we could not protect him if we instructed him to violate the law, and that we have not done. My hon. friend knows, as my colleague has told him, that Major Walsh went there for the purpose of maintaining law and order. He went there at a critical period, when the city of Dawson was claimed to be within the United States Territory.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman does not mean to say that that is the reason, surely.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I mean to say that is one of the reasons for sending him there. I mean to say, further than that, they claimed the territory of Bennett Lake and established a municipality there, and we sent our police force to a point to the south of Bennet Lake to maintain our authority, and we wanted a prudent man, a man who would make no mistake, in whose judgment we had confidence, and upon whose judgment we were called upon to rely. Under the circumstances we did what was best in the case, and what has happened so far has shown that it was best. There has been no disorder, there has been no complaint. Our authority has been maintained and that authority has been respected. I think that is the best vindication of the wisdom of the choice we made, and I have no doubt that the judgment of this House and the country will approve of what we have done.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Assuming for a moment that my hon. friend is correct in the statement that the United States claim Dawson, and possibly were in possession of it, I presume my hon. friend will admit that the instructions to Major Walsh would be to take Dawson.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. minister has excelled altogether the Secretary of State in his attempt to answer a question. The hon. gentleman tells us that Major Walsh was sent out there because the United States government claimed Dawson.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise to a point of order. There is nothing before the House and the discussion seems interminable.

Hon. Sir JOHN CARLING—I move that the House do now adjourn.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the motion is put to the House I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to a statement he made just now that Dawson had been claimed by the United States government as part of their territory.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I did not say so.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What did the hon. gentleman say?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I said it was claimed as a portion of the United States, not that the United States claimed it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It has not been claimed by any other country, and, therefore, he must have referred to the United States. The hon. gentleman said that Major Walsh was sent there to maintain law and order.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I rise to a question of order. The motion before the House is that the House adjourn. I should like to know if that motion is carried, would it be considered a vote of want of confidence?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am quite willing to yield to the decision of the Speaker as to whether the point of order is well taken or not. If the hon. gentleman had studied parliamentary practice he would know that a motion to adjourn to enable a member to discuss any question he pleased. I would like to call attention to the absurdity of the position taken by the Minister of Justice. The mounted police were sent into that country to maintain law and order over three years ago, and duplicated, or perhaps quadrupled since that period as the population have flocked into that country. That they are entitled to all the credit that they claim in taking steps to maintain law and order in that country, I deny. Major Walsh is not there, so far as we know, and consequently he could have done very little in accomplishing the object for which he was sent. I do not desire to discuss that question at all. All I want to know is whether instructions were given to him and what they were. The Secretary of State laid down an extraordinary doctrine. He said, "you know," pointing to me—"that every member of the cabinet cannot know what is being done by each department." I admit that in all matters of detail there is a certain power an authority vested in each minister to administer the details of his department, but in no case is an important question, like the one now under discussion, done departmentally without the knowledge and consent and instructions of the cabinet itself, after having met the approval of the Governor General; and yet the hon. gentlemen tell us it is impossible for him to know. It seems to me he is assuming for himself the position assumed by his colleague, who was not in the government at the time. This is a question that every minister should know, and it should have been discussed by Council—and I have no doubt was discussed by Council—before any decision was arrived at as to whether Major Walsh should be sent or not. If my hon. friend the Minister of Justice had said "I am not acquainted with these details," I could understand it, because he was not then a member of the administration. But the Secretary of State rises and proves to the House that he knows nothing at all of the principles on which our government is carried on. If he does not know will he kindly inquire and inform the House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This debate shows how improper it is to depart from the rules laid down. When important papers are asked for, the true way is to put a notice on the paper and members of the government have an opportunity of informing themselves whether those papers exist or not and whether they should be produced.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I asked whether any such papers existed. All the hon. gentleman had to say is yes or no.

The motion was withdrawn.

INTRODUCTION OF GOVERNMENT MEASURES IN THE SENATE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved that the House adjourn.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I would like to call the attention of the hon. leader of the House to an assurance that he gave some two or three weeks ago across the floor of the House, in reply to a question of my hon. friend from Murray Harbour (Mr. Prowse), with regard to the introduction of some important government measures in this branch of parliament. From that time we have not heard anything further upon the matter. It is of very great importance indeed, in order to relieve the other branch of parliament of a part of their work, and in order to give this House the position which it ought to hold in the legislative work of the country, that the government should introduce measures on the programme in this end of the building. And while I am speaking of that, I would refer particularly to the Plebiscite Bill, a measure that has been, we know, very strongly promised by the government, referred to, if I remember right, in the speech at the beginning of this session, and one that this House would be perfectly competent to deal with in the first instance. I wish to know not only whether that bill will be introduced in this end of the building, but also when the government propose to introduce it. When will it be introduced, either here or elsewhere?

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I am very glad the hon. gentleman has brought this subject to the notice of the House. During the past years, on frequent occasions since confederation, this subject of introducing more legislation into this branch of parliament has frequently been discussed in this House and very fully discussed, and I do not think that any satisfactory reason has ever been given why more of the government bills are not introduced into the Senate than we are in the habit of receiving here. We are promised a great deal of legislation for this session—I am afraid more than we are likely to get through, and one bill which has just been alluded to might be introduced into this House. But instead of making an endeavour to initiate legislation here it seems to be more and more the course every year to allow all important legislation to originate in the other House. I think the government, if it tried, could introduce many important measures that parliament is called upon to pass, in this House. We have a great deal of time in the early part of the session which could be spent in considering important bills, whereas they come to the House late in the session when members are tired out with the monotony of a long session, perhaps in the hot weather, and we have to rush the bills through at railroad speed. We have not time to give them that consideration which it is the special duty of this House, as a court of revision to give to these bills, and as now we are starting with a new Minister of Justice and a new government, I desire to press upon the leader of the House, as I have frequently done in former years, to distribute that legislation, allot more of the public measures which it is the duty of the government to bring before parliament to this House. It would tend to the more speedy passage of legislation, and would give this House the position it ought to occupy in the eyes of the country as a useful branch of the legislature. The subject is well worthy the attention of the minister, and I hope the minister will give it the consideration it should receive.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say, in reply to the hon. gentleman from Richmond, that I told my hon. friend here before the adjournment that I hoped some measures of the government would be introduced in this House this session. I am still of that hope and trust at no distant day that some measures will be introduced here. But my hon. friend can well understand that there are nearly a dozen ministers in the other chamber and there are but two here.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—We should have more ministers in this House.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And the natural consequence of that is that nearly all the government measures are introduced in the House of Commons. Every minister, in the first instance, is desirous of initiating those measures which specially concern his own department which he is supposed to have special charge of. If hon. gentlemen will look at the measures introduced this session, the Yukon Railway Bill is a bill relating to the Department of Railways and Canals, a bill affecting the public domain and properly belongs to the other chamber. Then, again, take the Franchise Act, my hon. friends would not expect a measure on that subject to be initiated in this House. Take again the bill relating to the payment of judges' salaries and the increase of the numbers of the courts. Hon. members would not expect that measure to be introduced here.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—That is trifling.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It relates to the expenditure of public moneys. And so with many other measures of the government. Whether the plebiscite is a proper measure to introduce here, I am not prepared to say.

It may be. That will depend partly upon the form of that measure, and until everything relating to these measures is settled by the government, it is impossible that I can answer my hon. friend with regard to any of these measures as to whether they will be introduced into this chamber or not.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON--The hon. gentleman has not answered a part of my question. In addition to asking him whether the Plebiscite Bill would be introduced here I wanted him to tell the House whether it would be introduced at an early date either here or elsewhere.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think so. I think within a fortnight it will be introduced in one House or the other.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Monday, 14th March, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—Before the Orders of the Day are called I should like to make a few remarks. It is not very often that I take any notice of what appears in the newspapers, but a cutting has just been placed in my hands which I think requires some notice, because there are details in connection with it which will be required to be looked into. The cutting is as follows :—

A $300,000 BRIBE FOR THE SENATE.

(Special to the Journal.)

TORONTO, March 13.—The World's Montreal special correspondent says a fund of $300,000 has been raised to bribe the Senate to pass the Yukon Railway Bill.

I have always understood that there were good chances of making money out of politics. Personally, however, I have hitherto had the hardest kind of luck. Possibly that may be because in my profession it is not perhaps one of the vehicles or contingencies under which the great spending of money arises. Had I had the good luck to be a railway contractor, or perhaps a book publisher, I might have had a chance of some of the soft snaps, the fat things that are lying about loose with a good rake off possibly attached to it. But as far as I am concerned in my political career I have never seen one single opportunity in which there was a chance for the boy. Now, however, an opportunity seems to present itself, and from the way in which it has come up it would appear as though care had been taken that this matter should be placed upon a basis where "business is business." I do not know exactly whether we are going to be able to seize the opportunity to take advantage of it or not, but I have taken the trouble to look up the amounts which should be distributed amongst those of us who are entitled to share in this allotment. I do not consider that the Liberals are entitled to anything at all. They will be obliged, necessarily, you know, to vote for this bill without any fee at all, free of expense. Taking their numbers, as the House appears to be constituted since the reform of the Senate which we have heard so much about, I would place the number at 20. That would leave a remnant of 64 amongst whom the nest egg should be divided, and a small computation will show that that would allow about $4,720 apiece. I do not think it is enough. Considering the magnitude of the undertaking and the great interest involved, I think we should make a strike and not act for less than $5,000 each in round numbers. But seriously, hon. gentlemen, does not the House think it is scandalous and monstrous that such a thing should be allowed to be published in one of the newspapers of the country, and to be circulated abroad from one end of the country to the other, not only in this country, but also in the United States press, and possibly find its way into the English newspapers. Supposing the contingency should arise, that this bill were to pass through this House, a great many people will take this report in dead earnest. There is not one of us here which has ever declared himself opposed to it, and if we saw fit to change our views by reason of an amendment or alteration in the bill, we would be at once stigmatized as corrupt and accused of being bought. It is monstrous, and some means should be devised whereby punishment should be meted out to any newspaper which publishes such a gross and scandalous libel upon any respectable body of men.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is to be regretted that the Senate should take notice of this matter at all. The statement is so monstrous, that the public are not likely to give much credence to it, and very few journals would publish it. But my hon. friend, in introducing the subject here, may give to it a very much wider publicity than it would be otherwise likely to acquire. The self-respect of the Senate and its standing in the public estimation, so far as a matter of personal integrity is concerned, is such as to protect it against such a statement until there is something very much more favourable to it than its appearance in the World. The World is a very sensational journal, and, of course, anything that will give notoriety to it and induce parties to subscribe that might not otherwise do so, may there find admission. I am sure of this, that the public at large will believe that the Senate are not likely to be influenced in its judgment by considerations of that sort, and that neither contractor, nor publisher, nor anybody else is likely to approach the members of this Senate with a view of influencing its members by any corrupt consideration.

DISMISSALS IN BELLEVILLE POST OFFICE.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved :

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid on the Table of the Senate :

1. Copies of all complaints, whether by affidavit or otherwise, made against Mr. John Taylor, late postmaster of the city of Belleville.

2. Copies of all Orders in Council authorizing the reducing of the post office in Belleville from that of a city to a town office.

3. The names of the employees of said office who were dismissed, their ages, length of time each was in the service of the Government, the amount of gratuity paid to each who had not served ten years, and the amount of superannuation allowance allowed to each clerk who had served ten years and over.

4. The names of those who were re-appointed, and the salaries now paid them, in addition to their superannuation allowance.

5. The reasons why Miss I. M. Newberry and W. B. Walker were not re-employed, and two new and inexperienced clerks appointed in their stead.

6. And copies of all correspondence, between members of the Reform Association of Belleville or any other person or persons, in relation to the reduction of said office from a city to a town office, the removal or dismissal of the postmaster or any of the clerks of said office, and copies of all records, if any, of the deputations which visited Ottawa in connection with the business of the said office.

This question is purely a local one, I admit, but there is a very important principle involved in the action taken by the government in the reduction of the Belleville post office from a city to a town office, and the mode adopted for getting rid of the postmaster, the dismissal of the clerks, the reappointment of some of the old clerks, the appointment of some new clerks, and allowing others to remain dismissed without any cause, though they agreed and were willing to accept their old positions under the salaries which were paid to the new officers ; and also a principle involved in the use to which the Superannuation Act was put in the carrying out of the new policy of the Post Office Department. I do not know that I should have brought this matter before the Senate were it not that I find that in the remarks which I made in discussing the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I used the following language in speaking of the different measures to be introduced, or which were promised by the Governor General :

The manner in which the Superannuation Act has been abused within the last twelve months should induce its strongest advocate to suggest some changes, I shall take occasion to bring before the House one illustration, at least, in my own city of the manner in which the Superannuation Act has, to my mind, been most grossly abused.

The facts which I propose to lay before the House may induce some members, who might be favourable to the continuation of the Superannuation Act now upon the statute book, to vote for the repeal of that Act or the amendments to it which it is proposed, as I understand, to be made by the Postmaster General. Now the facts are simply thus : Belleville was erected into a city post office some years ago, a postmaster was appointed, a deputy postmaster and a number of clerks. It is contended that the erection, in a place of that size, of a town office into a city office imposed a very heavy expense upon the revenues of the country, heavier than the amount paid to officers who were remunerated by fees and were termed town officers. That proposition I believe to be correct, and the Post-Master General in his wisdom thought proper to adopt that principle as his policy he says, in connection with his office. Had he done so throughout the whole Dominion I do not know that, as a citizen of that city, I should have had personally any complaint to make, but the primary cause which led him to that conclusion, and I believe to that policy, was for one purpose solely, and that was to get rid of what was alleged to be an offensive partisan in the person of the post-master. My information is that affidavits were made against the postmaster and filed in the office, but upon inquiry it was found that there was not a scintilla of truth in the complaints which had been made; that in fact his only offensive act was to drive three miles from the city to vote in what is known as the east riding, and that he had not only voted himself but that he had carried a voter to the polls. He did vote himself and he carried a voter to the polls, but it happened that while he was driving to a little village called Canniffton to record his own vote, he picked up a neighbour, a personal friend, who was a Liberal. He asked him if he was going to Canniffton to vote, and he replied yes. He took him in his buggy and they both went to the polls, one voted for the Conservative candidate and the other for the Liberal candidate. That is the nature of his offence. These facts coming, as I am informed, to the knowledge of the Postmaster General, he declined to dismiss Mr. Taylor. A party through the Reform Association insisted upon the removal of that gentleman from the office of postmaster, and there was no other mode of meeting that request than by the abolition of the office as a city office. If I am correctly informed, the Postmaster General put his foot down pretty firmly, and said he would not dismiss him upon the grounds which had been laid before him, but that he could meet their views by reducing the office from a city to a town office, and thereby remove all the officers from the postmaster down, and then in the reappointment he would not appoint a new postmaster, but would place the business of the office in the hands of the deputy postmaster and give instructions to the acting postmaster, who was the deputy and who is now in charge of the offices, to employ under the percentage system such other officers as he thought proper, but he must take the recommendation and meet the views of the Reform Association of the city in whatever appointments he made. The reduction took place, every official in the office was removed (if you like to so call it) or dismissed, the office was placed under the management of the deputy postmaster at an increased salary; he re-employed, I suppose with the consent of the Reform Association, such of the old clerks as he thought proper at a reduced salary. There were five dismissed, of whom the post-master and four of the clerks were not re-employed, as he considered it was not necessary to employ them all. Two of the clerks were not re-appointed. One of these was a young lady, who was at the time and had been for years, the principal support of a widowed mother, she was not reappointed but was put upon the superannuation list, to which I shall refer later, and I think I will justify the remarks I made in the discussion on the address which I have already quoted, that it was a gross abuse of the Superannuation Act. She was left out and a very amiable but inexperienced young lady was placed in the position. She happened to be the daughter of a former president of the Reform Association, a man well to do and carrying on a large business in the city. The young lady who was dismissed was the grand-daughter of a former member of the old parliament of Canada, the late George Benjamin. Mr. Benjamin had been a conservative, and I suppose the fact that she was his grand-daughter was the cause of her dismissal, although she had been the mainstay of her parent. Since then she has had to go and live with her brother and the family has gone to Nebraska. Of the other two, one a young man, happened to be a conservative, he was not re-employed. He also had helped to maintain his father and mother. Now let us look at the manner in which the super-annuation funds has been used to carry out this policy. Those who are acquainted with the principles of the Superannuation Act know that an officer has to serve ten years before he is eligible to be retired under the Superannuation Act. If a clerk or official is dismissed or removed, if not for good cause, if it be in view of economy or for the efficiency of the office, there is generally a gratuity granted to the individual. In the present case we find the postmaster was dismissed, and that I may say further he did not receive notice of his dismissal until after he had entered on his duties for the month, though his dismissal took place from the first of the month. It was not many days I admit, and I may say in justice to the Postmaster General that when I called his attention to that fact, he said he was not aware of it, and that he would see that the postmaster was paid for the month in which he had entered on his duties. The deputy postmaster was receiving $1,350 a year; he is now doing the duties, as I was told, at $1,600, an increase of $250. I have been informed since that the salary is only $1,550, consequently I make both statements as I heard them. The Postmaster General says $1,550. Those in Belleville who ought to know say he is getting $1,600. However, that is a matter of little consequence. He has been placed on the superannuation list, being only thirty-seven years of age, he has served fifteen years and three-quarters of a year, and his superannuation allowance is $400 per annum, but he does not draw that $400 during the time that he remains managing the office at the $1,600 a year. Alfred Gillan was a second class clerk, thirty-nine years of age, who had served fifteen years and three-quarters. His salary was $1,200 a year, and at that age he is retired at $360 a year, during the whole of his life. This young gentleman was re-employed at $400 a year. All the new clerks were employed at $400 a year, but he draws in addition to that his superannuation allowance; and if you like to make the calculation, taking his age and robust health, it is an investment to him, if he were buying an annuity, of about $10,000 out of the public revenue. Mr. Walker, who was also dismissed was thirty-four years of age. He was employed thirteen years and three-quarters. He was receiving $800 per annum. His superannuation allowance, as long as he lives, is $208. This is one of the young gentlemen who was not re-employed. W. J. Embury was forty-one years of age. He was twelve years in the service. He drew $800 per annum, and now a superannuation allowance during the balance of his life of $204.52. Miss Newberry was forty-three years of age, thirteen years in the service, at a salary of $800 per annum, and she draws $207 during the remainder of her life from the superannuation fund. Mr. Lynch was thirty years of age, had been twelve years in the service and had $800 salary. He draws $186.66 and was re-employed at $400. Mr. Reeves was twenty-eight years of age, seven years and nine months in the service at $600, received a gratuity, not a superannuation, of $304.66, and was re-employed at $400 per annum. Mary Kennedy, 34 years of age, 4½ years in the service, received a gratuity of $187.77, and was re-appointed to the service at $400. Mr. Hargraves, who was 26 years of age, and had been 4½ years in the service, got $91.61. John Taylor, the postmaster, employed at $1,400 a year, was dismissed. Not having been in long enough, he received neither gratuity nor any other consideration—not even pay for the month on which he had entered when he received notice of his dismissal. This places an annual charge upon the superannuation fund of $1,566.79, in addition to the $585.04 of gratuities. I have already mentioned that Mr. Duncan, the acting postmaster, does not receive his superannuation allowance during the time that he is employed in the office, but he is a young man of only 37, and should he leave the office to-morrow, there will be that charge of $400 per annum against the superannuation fund during his lifetime. If you take the amount paid for superannuation and capitalize it at three per cent, you will find it represents a capital of $52,200, and if you deduct the $400, which is not paid during the continuance in office of Mr. Duncan, it would represent a capital of about $40,000. I ask any reasonable man whether, under these circumstances, the action of the Postmaster General is not an abuse of the Superannuation Act? The Postmaster General wrote a letter to the editor of the Belleville Sun, which had been, for some time, what is termed an independent paper—that is, independent in politics—until the last election took place, and then it avowed itself a supporter of the Hardy Government and of the Dominion Government, and is now a full blown Grit sheet. I will read one extract from the Postmaster General's letter, in which he attempts to give a reason for the course he pursued:

> Perhaps I may take a wrong view of my duty as Postmaster General, but I think I am bound to place the public money which parliament has placed at my disposal as head of this department in such a way as will produce the best results to the public at least possible cost. My position is a public trust, and I have no more right to allow the public funds placed at my disposal to be wasted than a private trustee has to allow the private funds in his hands to be wasted.

The principle laid down in this paragraph no one will object to. It is not only a policy, but it is the principle on which every minister should administer the affairs of his department. I fully concur in all he says, but I cannot help thinking that the statement in the lights of events partake a very great deal of the nature of that famous character in one of Dickens's works known as Pecksniff. He was a very honourable man, a very grave man, and a man of noble sentiments and speech; so is the Postmaster General as portrayed in the paragraph which I have read; and if he acted upon that principle—as I will prove before I get through he has not done—every man in Canada would approve of his policy. But the position he occupies in this matter of the reduction of one city post office to a town office, and the reason he has given in the paragraph, I think is somewhat analogous to the answer given by Dr. Jonson when he was asked why he mis-spelt a certain word in his dictionary, his reply was, "Ignorance, sheer ignorance." So it is precisely with the Postmaster General in this matter, either that, or he has selected a conservative city, represented by a conservative, for the purpose of punishing and degrading the Belleville post office from a city office to a town office; or he did not know, or never took the trouble to inquire into the relative position, so far as expenditure is concerned, between the city of Belleville and the other city post offices in the Dominion of Canada. I may say, before leaving this point, that the Postmaster General in this same letter has selected other places—Brantford, Brockville, Chatham, Galt, Guelph, Peterborough, St. Catharines, St. Thomas, Stratford, Woodstock—all town offices—and he has compared the percentage of expenditure with the receipts of the post office at Belleville, and that alone. If he had desired to make a fair comparison—I was going to say an honest comparison—he should have taken the different cities in the Dominion. The cities are placed under the Civil Service Act, and I admit they are much more expensive than when paid as the offices to which I have called attention; and more than that, if any one will take the trouble to look at these towns that he has selected, he will find that the correct figures are not given, the contingent expenses not being added to the general expenditure, and thereby making the percentage much less. Let us look at the different city post offices in the whole Dominion. I have in my hand a statement showing the offices, the revenue, the salaries, the contingencies, the total paid, the net revenue, and the percentages. I will not weary the House by reading all these figures, but will hand it to the reporter, and content myself with giving the cities and the percentages which will be sufficient to establish the point which I make.

It will be seen from these figures that the expenditure in Toronto was 42⅝ per cent of the whole revenue, which I may say was $361,388.16, and the salaries were $147,156.47 and so on. Belleville was 54 per cent of the total revenue collected. Kingston was 80 per cent; Hamilton was 67 per cent, London, 61 per cent; Ottawa, 101 per cent, that is one per cent more than they actually collect; Windsor, 70 per cent; Quebec, 96 per cent; Sherbrooke, 38 per cent; Fredericton, 56 per cent; St. John, N.B., 75 per cent; Halifax, 56 per cent; Charlottetown, 114 per cent, being just 14 per cent more than the actual collections. I think I can give a reason for that after I have referred to the others. Winnipeg, 44 per cent; Vancouver, 39 per cent; Victoria, 54 per cent. The House will see that I have taken the city offices in the Dominion, and that there are only three which cost less than Belleville. Windsor is 70 per cent against the 54 in Belleville. You must bear in mind that Windsor is represented by Mr. McGregor, and he is a very ardent and zealous supporter of the government, ergo his city should not be interfered with. Kingston 80, and Kingston is represented by Mr. Britton, another ardent and devoted supporter of the Grit party. St. John is 75 per cent as against 54 in Belleville. That city is represented by Mr. Ellis and Mr. Tucker, two supporters of the government. Quebec shows 96 per cent expenditure on the revenues received against 54 in Belleville, and that city is represented by the Right Honourable Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and Mr. Dobell, and Mr. Malouin, all of them may be considered as very ardent supporters of the government. Charlottetown is 114 per cent represented by Sir Louis Davies. You must bear in mind, and I desire to be fair in giving these explanations, the inspector of the island and the postmaster at Charlottetown are one and the same person, so that if Mr. Brecken who is the postmaster of Charlottetown, were merely the postmaster according to the Civil Service Act he could only get $1,400 a year, or at the option or will of the postmaster it could be increased $1,800. So that even if you take the $2,000 or $2,200, which he receives and deduct that, and appoint an inspector and appoint a postmaster at the Civil Service salaries, then the expenditure would be greater than the income. We have in this table 75 per cent, 80 per cent, 90 per cent, and 114 per cent of expenditure in some of these places as against 54 per cent expended in Belleville. In view of these facts you may very naturally ask why is Belleville selected if not for political reasons? If the policy (to which I do not think many of us would object) is to be carried out of reducing the expenditures in the different offices, why has it not been extended to the city offices to which I have called attention? No one can come to any other conclusion than that at which I have arrived, that the Reform party in the city of Belleville, and its vicinity, determined to get rid of the man who was postmaster and whom they did not like, although not a single word can be uttered against him, so far as the performance of his duties is concerned, during the time he was in office. He is a most estimable man who has never given offence to anybody. His political crime was what I have called attention to nothing more. That this policy applied to the city of Belleville met the disapproval of the respectable portion—I am speaking politically now, I do not desire to be understood in any other sense—of the city of Belleville is evidenced by the fact that letter after letter was sent, and deputation after deputation interviewed the Postmaster General protesting against the policy which he was pursuing and the treatment which had been meted out to these different officers. If there was no political bias, if there was no political reasons for carrying out this principle, "to the victors belong the spoils," then the two clerks to whom I have called attention would have been re-employed. This young lady, Miss Newberry, and Mr. Walker said to the deputy postmaster, "we are quite willing to go back to the office and accept the salaries which you offer of four hundred dollars per year," which, with the superannuation they were drawing, would not be as much as they had been receiving previous to being placed on the superannuation list. If it were for any other reason than meeting the political requirements of the party they would have been taken back. They were certainly the most efficient members of the whole staff. Mr. Thos. Ritchie, the largest importer in Belleville, who was president of the Board of Trade and a candidate in the Liberal interest in the last election against Mr. Henry Corby, was so disgusted with the whole conduct and policy of the government in this matter that he published the following letter in the newspapers:—

To the Editor of the Intelligencer.

SIR,—As I am informed that my name has been connected in public talk about town with the late changes in the post office, it becomes a duty for me to state my position, not in order to vindicate myself, which is a matter of very little consequence, but to exonerate the great body of honourable electors in this city from the odium that it is sought to attach to them on account of the action of a certain few, who are popularly supposed to represent them.

Having had experience of the honourable bearing of most of those who supported me at the last election for the Commons, I am confident in asserting that fully ninety-nine in a hundred of these electors of West Hastings would have proposed just as I had suggested respecting contemplated changes in the Belleville post office. I may say that I was scarcely consulted at all in the matter, but the opinion I gave to those who did ask it was this, namely,—that if it was found necessary in the public interest to reduce the expense of the office here (which I understand all parties thought excessive), it would be better, under the circumstances, not to alter the status of the office in the Civil Service, but to reduce the staff if it was apparent that more were being employed than were needed. On the other hand, if the Postmaster General, who is the responsible head, insisted on taking the office out of its present standing, that then in that case the postmaster ought to be directed to employ what help was needed from the existing staff of employees if willing to accept the salary provided and were found capable and efficient.

Yours respectfully,

THOS. RITCHIE.

I may say those were the views of Conservatives and Liberals alike. There was scarcely any one in the city who did not think there were more officers in the service than were absolutely necessary, and had the policy of the Postmaster General been carried out generally, no fault would have been found. The Postmaster General's defence of the action which has been taken is simply this, that he desires, as a trustee of the public funds, to administer the affairs of his office at the lowest possible expenditure. To that policy no one will object. Had he reduced all the offices to which I have called attention and placed them in the same category, with the exception perhaps of Ottawa, Montreal and Toronto, no one would have found fault with him. It is only justice that I should say here that the excuse for keeping Windsor in the position it occupies—although it is not a legitimate excuse—is the fact that it is a large distributing office immediately on the frontier, receiving largely mail matter from the United States. We can readily understand also how it is that the expenditure in the Ottawa post office exceeds the income. It is on account of its being the seat of government, and large quantities of mail matter pass through, as you are all aware, without paying postage. I have already given a reason which has been advanced why the expenditure in the Charlottetown post office exceeds the revenue, but there is no reason why, in all other cases, they should not be reduced in the same manner that the Belleville office has been reduced, if the Postmaster General intended his policy to be honestly carried out. The defence put in by the Postmaster General with reference to these reappointments is, that having reduced the Belleville post office to a town office, he left the reappointment of the different clerks to the acting postmaster; but when the papers come down you will find that when that instruction was given to the present acting postmaster (for a postmaster has not yet been appointed), a proviso is made in the letter, that in any appointment which he makes it must be made in accordance with the recommendation of the Reform Association of Belleville. The Reform Association of Belleville met in solemn conclave, this little knot to which Mr. Ritchie refers, and with whom he is not at all in accord, and insisted that these two parties to whom I have referred should not be reemployed, but that a son of a Grand Trunk employee, who is a Liberal, should receive one of the positions, and that a daughter of a former president of the Reform Association and a former defeated Liberal candidate in West Hastings, should have the other, depriving the young lady and young gentleman, who were the partial support of their parents, of the positions which they had held. I have also shown you that the policy has not been carried out in other cities. There are only three of the whole of the city offices in the Dominion whose expenses are not proportionately greater than those of Belleville, but fortunately for those cities they are represented by Liberal members; and you can easily understand that if the Postmaster General proposed to reduce Charlottetown to a town office, what a hue and cry there would be from Sir Louis Davies. You can readily understand, if it were proposed to reduce St. John to a town office, what a protest would come from the two gentlemen who represent that city in the House of Commons. So in the case of Quebec, what a protest there would be from Mr. Dobell and Mr. Malouin if Quebec was to be degraded from a city office to a town office for the reason assigned by the Postmaster General in the case of Belleville, that it would cost the country a great deal less to manage the business of these different offices under the new system than under the present system. Now, I am not defending the present system and I am not condemning the Postmaster General for having adopted a policy by which money may be saved to the revenue of the country; but I condemn him for selecting one city, because that city happens to be represented by a Conservative, and making an example of it, and leave all the others unchanged; and I condemn him for placing in the hands of any association the right to say to the postmaster whom he shall employ and whom he shall not employ, thereby delegating to others the power and the responsibility which devolves upon a minister of the Crown. You will find when these papers come down that what I have stated in reference to the instructions is literally correct. The office has been reduced and some four or five officers have been placed on the superannuation list, none of whom are fifty years of age, and that the sums paid them represent an amount, if capitalized, of some forty to fifty thousand dollars which is added to the public debt. If that is the manner in which the Post Office Department, or any other department of the government, is to be managed the sooner the government change their policy, or the sooner there is a change of administrators, the better it will be for the country. I wish it distinctly understood that I find no fault with a policy of economy, if the Postmaster General carries it out fairly and honestly, but I do object most decidedly that one city in the whole Dominion should be selected for the application of this policy when there are only three other cities whose offices cost less than the city of Belleville. I have made this explanation why I have moved for these papers in order that the whole of the facts may be before the public. I know what the government's defence is—economy. I say carry it out, and the Postmaster General will not find me or the people of Belleville though opposed to the government, condemn it; but as long as it is confined to one locality while others cost the revenue more, I say it is a gross injustice to the people and a flagrant violation of the principles of the Superannuation Act.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hon. gentlemen, I have listened with attention to the address to the House, on this motion, by my hon. friend who asked for information in respect to the Belleville post office and I trust that we shall be able to comply with the hon. gentleman's wishes. My hon. friend omitted to call attention to the fact that those regulations, so far as they extend to city offices, were made under a former administration, and that if there was any extravagance, any impropriety in the regulations that were made in respect to Belleville, they were not to be charged upon the present Postmaster General but upon those who preceded him in office. My hon. friend also failed to call the attention of the House to the fact that there are a good many cities in Canada to which this rule was not applied, and that although they were allowed to stand, in so far as their postal accommodation was concerned, in the condition of town offices, they nevertheless were cities, and that the Postmaster General was justified in the course which he has taken in respect to Belleville I think is abundantly evident from the relations which will be found to exist between the revenues and expenditure in a large number of offices which are similar in their circumstances to the city of Belleville. What my hon. friend has complained of really is, that the present Postmaster General has not extented to other cities the same rule which he has introduced in respect to Belleville, that is, that he has not undone the work of my hon. friend and those who were associated with him in the government that preceded him in office to a larger extent than this to the present moment. My hon. friend will be better able to criticise the Postmaster General in that direction when he sees really what the Postmaster General, when he becomes thoroughly conversant with all the business of the office, is able to accomplish in that direction. My hon. friend said the Postmaster General was actuated altogether by political considerations in respect to the Belleville office, and that the punishment as he regards it, which has been inflicted upon the postmaster and those who were employed in the old office, was due to the fact that that is a Conservative city. Well, there are a great many Conservative cities in Canada, and the Postmaster General has not dealt with them as my hon. friend complains he has dealt with Belleville, and I think that my hon. friend will discover that there are other considerations which are of not a little public importance, by which the Postmaster General might be actuated other than the fierce partizan motives attributed to him by the hon. gentleman. Now let me take the case of the city of Brantford. That city has a postal revenue of $25,638.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—In what year?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think that is 1896, there is relatively no very great change—Brantford, as I say, has a revenue of $25,638, and the cost of managing the office is $4,916, or 19 per cent of the amount of revenue collected. Now, Brantford is a city, it was not put upon the footing of cities, it was not dealt with by my hon. friend and those associated with him in the same way as Belleville, and my hon. friend, I suppose, had some reasons for dealing with Brantford in a way other than that in which he dealt with Belleville. Brantford has a larger population and does a very much larger business, and yet my hon. friend provided city regulation in respect to Belleville but he did not do so in respect to Brantford. Was my hon. friend and those associated with him actuated by political considerations and was it because a reformer represented the city of Brantford on that occasion? Will my hon. friend accept, or be willing to have attributed to him and those associated with him in office, the motives which he now attributes to the Postmaster General? Let me take another case. In Brockville the amount of revenue collected was $24,500. The cost was $4,470 or 18 per cent of the revenue. Now, look at Belleville. Belleville has a revenue of $16,-235 (or the next year $17,000) and the cost in 1896 was $8,827 nearly double the amount that it cost in Brantford where the population was nearly half greater and where the revenue was sixty per cent greater. Now, will my hon. friend say there is any justification for such an expenditure in connection with the post office in Belleville, that it should cost more than one-half the revenues that were collected, while the city of Brantford cost only nineteen per cent of the revenues collected? Why was it necessary to make those special provisions in the city of Belleville and not make corresponding provisions in the city of Brantford? Let me take another case, the city of Guelph. That city was allowed by my hon. friend's government to stand in the position of a town. He did not make those regulations which he says, cities are entitled to; he did not deal with Guelph as he did with Belleville. The revenues of Guelph are $5,000 a year more than those of Belleville, and the cost of the post office in Guelph was $5,000 a year, while the cost of the post office in Belleville is $9,079 in the past year. Will my hon. friend say there is any justification for that? My hon. friend, of course, is a citizen of Belleville; he is interested largely in Belleville, and, perhaps, if I were to ask for the true explanation of this state of things, I would say that my hon. friend yielded to pressure in meeting the wishes of friends from his good nature rather than act in accordance with those business principles which he himself admits are of importance, and which ought to receive due consideration when this subject is being dealt with. Now, I come to the city of St. Thomas. The city of St. Thomas has a population of about 10,000, and collects a revenue of nearly $4,000 a year more than Belleville, at a cost of $4,900, as against $9,079 in Belleville. Then, take the city of St. Catharines. The revenue there is somewhat less than it is in Belleville—not very much; there is less than $2,000 difference between them, and yet the cost of managing the post office in the city of St. Catharines is only $3,560, as against the $9,079 in Belleville. My hon. friend will see that there is no justification for the continuance of that state of things in Belleville. There were reasons why action should be taken at once in Belleville, and, therefore, my hon. friend the Postmaster General undertook to correct the state of things that existed there, and by that correction, he has saved to the public revenues of this country a very considerable sum of money.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not much.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Over three thousand dollars. Let me take the next point of my hon. friends argument, that is, the question of superannuation. My hon. friend says that the Superannuation Act is abused in this case. Let us see what the Superannuation Act provides for. It provides that when you retire parties after ten years service you shall superannuate them if they are no longer required, and if they have served less than ten years, then you shall grant a gratuity, and the amount of superannuation allowance and gratuity are both regulated by the Act. These are important matters, and the only question is whether the Postmaster General was justified in making the reform which he effected in the management of the post office of Belleville. I say he was, and he did what the law required, when a public servant is no longer required when in the public interest that servant may be dispensed with; to those who had served less than ten years he granted the gratuity that the law provides for. Now, if these parties, on account of their age, comparatively young in years, ought not to have been superannuated, who is to be blamed for that, who is to blame for their being in the public service? Why my hon. friend and those associated with him in the government. They filled the office, they raised it to the position of an office in a large city when the revenues and the circumstances of the place did not warrant it, and in order to effect a reform it was necessary to conform to the Superannuation Act and to give those persons a gratuity, or it is necessary to dismiss them from the public service altogether. Now my hon. friend would not have been satisfied if those persons had been so dealt with, and it was to enable the government to meet a case where a change in the management or administration of the department or of laws is necessary in order to secure economy and to bring about reform that those provisions of the law are inserted. And I say again that if there is anything wrong in this superannuation and in these grants and gratuities, that wrong lies at the door of my hon. friend and those associated with him in office who filled the office with those parties and brought them under a regulation that was unsuited to the circumstances in which that office is placed. Now let me call the attention of my hon. friend to the report of the Postmaster General upon the subject. I am not going to read the names of all the parties who have been retired by superannuation or by the granting of gratuities. I think my hon. friend went over the entire list, but let me read what the Postmaster General said in his report to Council when he asked His Excellency in Council to deal with this subject:

> The Postmaster General reports that on the first day of July, 1882, the Belleville post office was placed on a city or staff basis, the postmaster and his clerks being brought under the provisions of the Civil Service and Civil Service Superannuation Acts.
>
> That the results of this change as regards the expense of maintaining the Belleville post office has been as follows:—
>
> Prior to the date above mentioned the postmaster received an allowance by way of salary for himself and his employees and to provide for the miscellaneous expenses of the office of $3,770, of which $3,470 was ordinary salary based upon an estimate revenue of $15,581, and $300 was an allowance for "Forward Duty" performed at the Belleville post office for outlying offices. The returns for the year ended 30th June, 1897, show that the revenue of the Belleville post office from the sale of stamps is now $16,586, to which must be added $932 paid in by the postmaster on account of box rents, giving a total revenue of $17,519. Assuming, as may safely be done, that the "Forward Duty" was not increased, the expenses of maintaining the office under the old system would therefore at the present time be as follows:—
>
> | | |
> |---|---|
> | Salary based on revenue of $16,586... | $3,607 |
> | Forward allowance..... | 300 |
> | | $3,907 |
>
> Instead of this there is under the staff for civil service system and expense for salaries to the postmaster and nine other employees of $8,710, to which must be added the sum of $369, paid during the year ended 30th June, 1897, for contingent expenses, making in all an outlay of $9,079. From this amount must be deducted the income arising from the rent of post office boxes, which under the old system was appropriated by the postmaster. This for the year ended 30th June, 1897, amounted, as already mentioned to $932, leaving the net expenses of the post office, $8,147. Deducting from this the amount which would now be payable under the old system, viz., $3,907, it appears that the excess in expense of the new system is at present at the rate of $4,240 per annum.
> The Postmaster General is of opinion that the public interest demands that the system of remuneration of the staff of the Belleville post office should be that which formerly obtained instead of the present and extravagant and expensive one and as the change involves the placing upon the retired list of such of the staff as are entitled to superannuation and the payment of a gratuity to such as are entitled thereto, the Postmaster General makes the several recommendations respecting the Belleville post office herein set forth.

Now, I think hon. gentlemen will see that there is no point in the attack made by my hon. friend opposite. The only thing that requires the consideration of the government in respect to the matters which he discussed is whether that system which has been introduced in respect to the Belleville post office ought not to be extended to some of the other post offices where the staff system prevails, and when my hon. friend points out other towns or cities where this system prevails that require to be dealt with in the same way, I have no doubt whatever that it will receive the fullest and most careful consideration of the Postmaster General and his colleagues in office.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman has not referred to a portion of my motion which asks for reasons why two were not reappointed?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I know nothing about the changes which have taken place. My hon. friend has moved for the papers and when they come down I will have an opportunity of seeing them and will ascertain from the Postmaster General his reasons for this change. I cannot speak at this moment on that subject, because I am not conversant with it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman is made conversant with the Order in Council, and the recommendation and other facts connected with the reason why the course was adopted. I presume he could, with the same industry and desire, obtain the other.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I just looked at the figures which were here before me in the paper. I have never considered the subject.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Might I ask what newspaper that was?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will send it over to my hon. friend. It is the Daily Ontario.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is a recapitulation of the Postmaster General's letter. I have no desire to continue this discussion further than to point out this fact, that the cities to which the hon. Minister of Justice referred, and from which he drew his comparisons, were never placed under the Civil Service Act, and consequently they were not analogous in the positions that they held; he did not refer either to the cost of the city of Belleville post office compared with the cost of other cities to which I referred exclusively. I pointed out in my remarks all that the hon. gentleman has said, that the towns cost less than the cities. Whatever responsibility and wrong was done when placing Belleville or any other city under the Civil Service Act, is one for which the late government must be held responsible. I do not deny anything of that kind. But the hon. gentleman was exceedingly unfair in the manner in which he put the case. I stated positively and distinctly that I did not object or find fault with the policy which had been adopted by the Postmaster General, in reducing a city office to a town office, but I did complain that that policy has been confined to one city alone, while other cities represented by Liberals were not touched, and the hon. gentleman said that other cities were represented by Conservatives. What cities are they excedt Fredericton and Sherbrooke? St. Thomas was not a city office. Brantford and Galt were not city offices.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—But they are cities.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not say they are not cities. There are towns where the revenues are larger than in some of the cities. I admit that, but that is not the point. The hon. gentleman confined his criticism exclusively to those offices which were under the system of percentage instead of taking the cities which I compared, and which I complained were not reduced. If the hon. gentleman would reduce the other cities and degrade them like Belleville, and place them as towns, I would not find fault. I stated that distinctly and plainly, and I say that the hon. gentleman was extremely unfair when he said I was speaking in defence of the old system, when I studiously explained to the House that I was not, and that I would approve of any system that might be adopted that would reduce the expenditure. I can come to only the one conclusion, and that is that he selected Belleville because it was a Conservative city; and if he did not, why did he not take the others? These facts were before him. He knew just as well that the other small cities under the Civil Service Act were more expensive than Belleville, and why did he not apply the same rule to them? It is unfair for the hon. gentleman to attribute to me sentiments which I did not entertain, when, on the contrary, I distinctly approved of the Postmaster General's policy, and only blamed him for having failed to apply it generally.

The motion was agreed to.

DUTY ON TIMBER AND SHINGLES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) rose to inquire:

Has the attention of the government been directed to a memorial of the Board of Trade of Vancouver, British Columbia, with reference to the importation of sawn timber and shingles free of duty, and is it the intention to impose a duty this year on timber and shingles?

He said: The last part of the question may be one of the sequels attached to the annual budget, but seeing it is an article of commodity free of duty, and not anything in bond that can be sprung upon the country or held back, I do not see why the question should not be answered.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The attention of the government has been directed to the memorial of the Board of Trade, but the question of duty must, of course, stand till after the budget speech has been delivered.

EMPLOYMENT OF WM. HENRY SOWDEN.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER rose to Inquire of the Government whether William Henry Sowden of Souris, Manitoba, has been employed by any department of the present government, either as immigration agent or in any other capacity, and, if so, at what remuneration, what was the nature of the employment, how long it lasted, what was the sphere of his operations, and what were the results thereof?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—William Henry Sowden was employed in the Immigration Service for two months ending in March, 1897, in the Midland counties of Ontario. He was paid $75 a month and his expenses. His special duty was to work among the people in those counties who were reported as likely to move to the United States, and to turn their attention to the North-west. The result was that a considerable number of persons who, it was believed, would otherwise have gone to the United States, went to the Canadian North-west.

DISMISSAL OF ALFRED E. LENOIR.

INQUIRY.

The Order of the Day being called:

At whose instance, or on whose report or authority did the Commissioner of Fisheries recommend to the government the dismissal for incompetency of Alfred E. Lenoir, of Richmond county, in the province of Nova Scotia?

Hon. Mr. MILLER said: A few days ago I addressed a note to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, asking for the information which my question requires, and not receiving a reply, I put it on the paper. I have just received his answer and I shall drop my question. I may, however, put a motion on the paper asking for the correspondence to be brought down in connection with the subject.

The motion was dropped.

INSTRUCTIONS TO MAJOR WALSH.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL inquired:

Whether any instructions were given to Major Walsh when sent to the Yukon district, and, if so, of what character, whether oral or in writing, and if in writing, whether such instructions will be laid before the Senate?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There were no written instructions given to Major Walsh other than those found in the commission and Order Council, and as to oral instructions, of course if there was any conversation, it is impossible to bring it down because it does not exist.

Hon Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You did not put them on record?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No! The Order in Council I have just laid on the table.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not ask the hon. gentleman to bring down the oral instructions.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The motion asks for it.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I take the opportunity to ask if Major Walsh is returning to Ottawa. I see by the paper he is coming back.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We have no information on that subject.

RAILWAY RATES ON PURE BRED STOCK.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the Orders of the Day are called I should like to ask the Secretary of State whether he is prepared to give the information that I asked for on Wednesday last. The hon. gentlemen will remember that I then asked whether the government railways had agreed to give the concessions which the railway companies had given to the owners of pure bred stock when carried on the railways of Canada, whether that same reduction has been given, of one-half rate, by the railway companies is also given by the government railways.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I sent a note over to the Minister of Railways and have not heard from him. I suppose I will hear to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It should be yes or no.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I sent a note over to the minister with a copy of the hon. gentleman's remarks but have had no answer from him as yet.

PACIFIC AND YUKON RAILWAY NAVIGATION AND MINING COMPANY.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved that the House adjourn.

Hon Mr. LOUGHEED—Before that motion is put I should like to have the Orders of the Day called.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There are no Orders for to-day.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is certainly a clerical error. The bill that appears in my name stood for to-day.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Is it a mistake?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is certainly a mistake, and I ask the House to permit me to move that this bill be read a second time to-day.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We have not had an opportunity to consider it at all.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I should like to point out to my hon. friend, and I might as well do it now as any other time, that this is a bill to incorporate the Yukon Navigation and Mining Company. My hon. friend has been pointing out to the House for some time past the urgent need of railway communication with the Yukon country. The promoter of this bill is Hamilton Smith and his associates, who are men occupying the most influential position in the financial market in Great Britain, and who are prepared to establish their bona fides before the Railway Committee of this House so soon as this bill is referred to that committee. I see no reason why this bill should stand for the consideration referred to by my hon. friend the leader of the House. By the time it reaches the committee stage my hon. friend can give it the consideration he chooses and then can represent to the committee the wisdom or unwisdom of passing it or throwing it out. I point out to the House that this is clearly a clerical error which has arisen. It should have been set down for to-day, and I would ask to read it now.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is down for second reading on Monday, March 21st.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If hon. gentlemen will look at the minutes on page 92 they will see that when this bill was read the first time it was ordered to be read the "second time on Monday next," which is to-day.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would like to ascertain, and I intend to ascertain, who is responsible for this appearing in this way on the Order paper. It seems to me a most remarkable thing that this bill, which has received considerable attention and which has been discussed throughout the whole country and condemed in no unmeasured terms by the government, and which was duly moved by me, as appears from the minutes on Thursday last when it was moved that it should be read the second time to-day that it should appear on the minutes for a week hence.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Has it been printed?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, it was read the first time Thursday last and ordered to be a read the second time on Monday next.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Is it printed in French?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend surely can read his English copy of it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I venture to make a suggestion, that as our minutes do not give the correct notice, and as the minister has expressed his desire to look at the bill, the House, I presume, would be quite satisfied to have the second reading on Wednesday next.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Say to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The course taken by my hon. friend is altogether unprecedented, as far as my parliamentary experience is concerned, and I have been in parliament 31 years. I have, as leader of the House, asked my hon. friend not to press the bill, and my hon. friend, without any regard to my request on behalf of the government in this matter, nevertheless persists in pressing the second reading to-day. My hon. friend cannot expect to over-ride the rules of the House to secure his wishes in this regard, when we have asked him that he should not press the bill at the present time, and I ask the House whether it is proper to consider this bill at the present time when it is altogether inconsistent with a government measure that is before the other House, having received its second reading, and is now under consideration in Committee of the Whole. The least my hon. friend could do under these circumstances is to permit this bill to stand until the government measure comes before us, and if this House should then see proper to reject the measure of the government, my hon. friend could with propriety press his bill; but I say it would be a most unprecedented procedure for my hon. friend to persist in pushing forward this bill and committing the Senate in advance of an important measure coming before it, to a principle in direct conflict with the provisions of that measure. I think hon. gentlemen who may differ from us in this House will at all events extend to us that fairness which ought to be extended by this chamber, that is supposed to be a non-political body, which we are entitled to expect under the circumstances.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I was under the impression, when this was pointed out, that it was through a clerical error, or some mistake, that this bill was put down on the Orders of the Day for the 21st March. Now, it would appear, from the remarks of the hon. leader of the House, that the matter was done designedly, that the government were not prepared——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I ask the hon. member to withdraw that statement.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I do not say that the hon. gentleman says that it was done designedly. But his remarks would lead one to believe that it was done designedly. Although this bill is shown to have been marked for second reading to-day, the hon. leader of the House asks to have it postponed because the government is not ready to go on with it, on account of a bill in the other House.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What had that to do with the clerical error? Will the hon. gentleman say that, because I wish to have this bill postponed, on account of the government having a bill in the other chamber, that therefore we have altered the minutes?

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—No, but the hon. gent'eman wants to take advantage of the fact that there is a clerical error. Here is this bill set down for second reading to-day. Why should not the hon. gentleman allow it to be read the second time to-morrow and refer it to committee? It will not interfere with the bill in the other House. I cannot see why the government in this House should try to take advantage of what is apparently a mistake.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There can be no possible harm in allowing it to be set down for a second reading to-morrow, and if the hon. gentleman can show that it conflicts with the other bill, the House can consider that. For my own part, I do not altogether understand that it does conflict with the government measure.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would point out to the House that the same error has arisen in regard to the following Orders of the Day, the bills fixed for Thursday. They are put down for the 24th March, 1898, and upon reference to page 92 of the minutes hon. gentlemen will observe that those bills were to be read the second time Thursday next. Instead of that, the Orders of the Day indicate that they will not be read until a week from next Thursday. It seems to me a that glaring error of this kind should be rectified immediately by this House. There should not be the slightest hesitation in correcting an error of this kind, and no advantage should be sought to be taken of it. If there is merit in the objection raised by hon. friend the leader of the House why this bill should not be read the second time to-day, then deal with it upon its merits, but do not take advantage of a clerical error which has arisen, doubtless, through an oversight of one of the officers of the House, or seek to strangle a bill of an important character which is receiving considerable public attention, and which should be dealt with at an early date. I do not object to my hon. friend having all time he thinks he would be entitled to for a proper consideration of the bill. It is only an ordinary bill. But notwithstanding the fact, at the request of my hon. friend, I should be very pleased that the time should be enlarged so that he can give proper consideration to it, but I disagree with him most emphatically in regard to the postponement of this bill until the government measure comes up from the other House. Will hon. gentlemen consider how ridiculous it would be for me to postpone it till after the Teslin Lake Bill comes in before the House, a bill which is as monopolistic as it could be. Upon the face of that bill, no rights shall lie with parliament for the next five years to pass any such bill as the one now before us. My hon. friend must think my simplicity is extremely childlike if I should consent for one moment to postpone this bill until the passage of the measure which he has in view, by which it would be postponed for at least five years. Does my hon. friend wish me to wait until the Teslin Lake Bill is passed, and then bring this bill down? Surely he is trifling with the House.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does my hon. friend think this House should commit itself to this bill in opposition to the bill of the government?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I have no hesiation in answering my hon. friend in the affirmative, that I most decidedly think so, and I can further point out to my hon. friend, that he need not be disappointed, when the time arrives, if this House should pursue that course in regard to the bill the second reading of which I have moved. I do not think the House will approve of the government measure, so far as the monopolistic features of it are concerned, namely, preventing all application to parliament for the incorporation of companies to open up that country by railway enterprise. I regret that my knowledge of parliamentary practice is not so extensive as that of many hon. gentlemen before me, but this bill is down for second reading to-day.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, it is not.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I say positively that it is. The notice of last Thursday shows that this bill is on for second reading to-day. I refer hon. gentlemen to the bottom of page 92 of our minutes. I point out to the House the fact, which is quite obvious, that the mistake is a clerical one, but I see no objection to permitting this bill to stand until to-morrow if hon. gentlemen desire it. I move that this bill be read a second time unless my hon. friends desire to have it stand until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—As a matter of courtesy to the hon. leader of the House, it seems to me that it is not sound policy on the part of the hon. member from Calgary to press this motion at the present moment. I have no doubt he is anxious to see this bill passed, but it has to go to the Lower House for its passage, and if he takes the government by the throat in the Senate, the government may take his bill by the throat in the House of Commons. Now I am anxious to see this bill passed, I am anxious to see no monopoly in railways in that territory, in pressing this bill to-day in opposition to the declared will of the government, the hon. gentleman is taking the best means in his power to strangle the bill and place it rather as a political motion than as an evidence of his desire to secure the passing of the measure.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—As a matter of courtesy it would be well for my hon. friend to put down the bill for a second reading for another day. Members of the House, I presume, are not prepared to give a vote upon it to-day. I have not read the bill myself yet, and it is probable that many other members of the House are in the same position looking forward to the second reading not taking place before the 21st of this month.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend does not suggest that it should stand until after the Teslin Lake Bill is before us.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—No, I do not suggest any limit to the postponement, nor do I suggest what my hon. friend should do, I leave it to himself to name the day—some future day. With regard to the course pursued by my hon. friend being unprecedented, I have no doubt the language of the Minister of Justice would be strictly applicable to the proceedings of the House of Commons. It is an unprecedented thing in the House of Commons for any private member to urge a bill which would interfere with a government measure emanating in that House. The government must be in the majority always in the other House, and is able, of course, to enforce respect for its wishes if any member should have the boldness to differ from them, and therefore it would be manifestly absurd to take such a course in the House of Commons in opposition to the government as my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Lougheed) proposes to take in this House in reference to this bill; but I am not sure that it is unprecedented in this House where the government is not in a majortiy. I presume if my hon. friend can get the majority of this House to pass this bill through its several stages before the other bill comes to the Senate, he is at perfect liberty to do so. He is at perfect liberty to urge the passage of this bill and I do not think there is anything unprecedented about the position the hon. gentleman has taken. The long experience of the hon. Minister of Justice in the House of Commons has made him familiar with the proceedings of that House, but not equally so with the precedents and proceedings of the Senate. I cannot say that it would be at all improper for my hon. friend to push his bill through before the government bill gets to the Senate, but as my hon. friend from Manitoba says, he takes the risk—not the risk, but the certainty of having it defeated in the House of Commons. The ministers there can see that their policy is respected, and if it does not meet the approval of the government, it would be easy for them to shove it aside in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—As a matter of courtesy, I hope my hon. friend will waive his rights and accede to the suggestion of the hon. Minister of Justice, and also for the reason which my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Miller) has stated. A large number of members are ignorant of the contents of the bill. I, for one, have not had an opportunity of reading it and I should like to have more time to understand what the bill really is. With regard to the question which the hon. Minister of Justice put, if the bill has been printed in French, I would call attention to an oversight in the minutes. When a bill is printed in either language, it should be so stated; if printed in English and French it should be marked E. & F. That shows whether the bill has been printed in both languages.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I should have brought the bill under the notice of my colleagues to-day if I had seen that it was printed, but the order on the paper showed that it was not printed in either language, and I never saw the bill until the hon. gentleman rose up to speak.

Hon. Mr. de BOUCHERVILLE—Evidently there has been an error in our minutes, and it ought, in the first place, to be corrected by a motion. In the next place, the bill is not printed in French, and therefore cannot be read to-day. I do not agree with the government on the third point; the bill opposes the monopoly clause of the measure now before the other House, but it does not therefore oppose that measure as a whole. It does not follow that we cannot bring in a bill in this House because it may be opposed to a single clause of a government measure in the other House. The monopoly clause is merely one feature of the government bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I should like to move that the 21st March be struck out in the Order of the Day, and that it read the 14th March in conformity with the minutes.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—Does not my hon. friend see that it is quite impossible to go on with the Orders to-day unless the bill is printed in French?

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I see on the back of the bill that is to be read the second time on the 25th March. There has been a mistake all through.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think it would be advisable to make a formal motion such as that moved by the hon. gentleman from Calgary. The mistake is not in the minutes—it is simply in the list of routine proceedings.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I simply moved to amend the Orders of the Day so that they would read in conformity with the minutes.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I think the hon. member from Halifax is right. You can correct it without a formal motion.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In that case, I move that the Order of the Day be discharged and that the second reading of the bill be fixed for Wednesday next.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to ask the Minister of Justice for information: I find that a bill passed last session provides for starting at Pyramid Harbour and passing by the Chilcoot Pass, &c.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—This is proposal to legislate for railway starting within the territory of the United States, as matters now stand.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The House is already committed to that principle, if you look at the bill passed last year, called the British Yukon Bill, chapter 89. If the hon. gentleman's objection is good now, it was good then. What is the objection to changing the route to the Chilcoot Pass instead of the White Pass, because that is really the only difference between the two bills. The bill passed last year was to start at the head of Lynn Canal and proceed thence across the Chilcoot Pass. The present bill carries the road from Pyramid Harbour, near the head of the Lynn Canal, through the White Pass. If there is an objection to this bill, it is equally applicable to the Act on the statute-book, so that anybody under this bill could build the road so far as the powers are given by this bill, through the White Pass.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If the charter should be in the hands of the contractors for the other road.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I rise to a question of order. We are now discussing the bill, whereas the question before the House is to postpone the second reading of the bill, and not the merits of the bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—On the question of order I do not think the motion which His Honour the Speaker was about to put was exactly correct. I look at the minutes of the 10th March and I find this :—

> The Hon. Mr. Lougheed presented to the Senate, a Bill (F) intituled : "An Act to incorporate the Pacific and Yukon Railway, Navigation and Mining Company."
>
> The said bill was read a first time.
>
> Ordered, that the said bill be read a second time on Monday next.

That is the order which makes the bill come before us to-day, and I think that the regular motion would be for the hon. gentleman to move that the Order of the Day be discharged and that the bill be read the second time on Wednesday.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is what I have moved.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is not the way the motion was put.

The SPEAKER—The motion comes to the same thing, but I have no objection to putting it as the hon. gentleman says.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned.

COLD STORAGE BETWEEN CHARLOTTETOWN AND GREAT BRITAIN.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency may cause to be laid before this House, copies of all correspondence and telegrams between the Minister of Agriculture or any other member of the administration, or any officer of the government, with the owners or agents of steamers or the Board of Trade, Charlottetown, relating to the establishment of a cold storage service on steamers between Charlottetown and ports in Great Britain or the West Indies, and in reference to the erection of cold storage premises in Charlottetown.

He said : In proposing the motion which I have placed on the order paper, I wish to call the attention of my hon. friend the Secretary of State to some discussion that took place in this chamber last year, when the hon. gentleman was guiding through the House a bill that came from the Department of Agriculture with reference to securing cold storage service at different points in the Dominion of Canada. Hon. gentlemen will remember that this cold storage movement, like the dairy movement in the lower provinces and also in the North-west, is a policy that was bequeathed to the present administration by their predecessors in office. That movement was entirely brought into existence in my province by the guidance of the Federal Government and to some extent was assisted by advances from the Federal Government, all of which, however, were returned. There was no expenditure in cash beyond what was returned and a magnificent industry has sprung up in the province. In the North-west the same movement was inaugurated, and I am happy to say is being carried on under the present administration. It was also determined by the late Minister of Agriculture and the late administration, to inaugurate a cold storage movement in connection with the dairy industry, in fact as a corollary to it, in order that perishable products could be got to the European market in the best possible form, and the present government very properly took up that movement just where it was left by the late administration and carried it on. I give them credit for what they have done in that regard, although I am not prepared to admit the very sweeping and inaccurate statement made by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in England in one of his speeches there, when he claimed that the dairy movement and the cold storage movement in Canada was entirely due to the exertions of the present administration, and that it was an evidence of the great and sincere desire they felt for promoting commercial intercourse between the Dominion of Canada and Great Britain. When this measure was before parliament last year I took the liberty of pointing out to my hon. friend the Secretary of State that no provision appeared to be made in that bill by which the benefits of cold storage would extend to the province from which I come, and I contend that, in proportion to its size, there is no province of Canada whose industries stand more in need of the advantage which cold storage would give than does the province of Prince Edward Island. I noticed in the bill that was submitted at the very end of the last session provision was made to ratify some contracts which, after they were produced, were found to apply wholly and entirely to the port of Montreal. It came as a matter of course that the great commercial metropolis of Canada should be first in consideration in a matter of this kind. That was, of course, conceded on all sides, but it was promised, and promised most emphatically, in the other branch of parliament and also by members of the government in correspondence and in speeches made on the subject, that Prince Edward Island was to participate in the benefits arising from the cold storage system. A cold storage building was required at the port of Charlottetown. One provision in that bill was that a bonus should be given for cold storage premises in various points, and Charlottetown was named as one of those points where encouragement would be given, sufficient, I admit, for the size of the country that would be served by the cold storage system.

A guarantee dividend of five per cent was proposed to be given to these cold storage premises if they were brought into existence by private enterprise. Now, the people of the province took the matter up on the encouragement that was proposed to be given in the bill and nearly, if not altogether, a sufficient amount of capital was subscribed, and the balance was ready to be subscribed at any moment when the government would carry out their promise with regard to giving a cold storage service on steamers. But my hon. friend will remember, I think, that I pointed out to him last year that the capital which was subscribed for these cold storage premises was contingent upon a steam service being maintained, for it is well known that cold storage for these perishable products is no use whatever unless connected with a steam service to carry the product away, because goods that are preserved in cold storage for any considerable time, or at all, are even more perishable than otherwise they would be when exposed to the ordinary conditions when being carried to market, and on that account the people of Prince Edward Island relied upon the government providing cold storage on board steamers either to connect with Halifax or direct from the port of Charlottetown. I made objection when the matter was before the House last year because there was not provision made for Charlottetown, and my hon. friend frankly said:

> That might be done this year and next, or we might get a steamer direct. I spoke to the Minister about it, and I said that Prince Edward Island would be able to send to market in proportion to population a much larger quantity of products than any other part of Canada. He was most anxious about it because he takes a very great personal interest in it wholly apart from the political situation, and is most anxious to have it carried out.

Now, I am sorry to say that from that time forward nothing has been done. A deputation from the Charlottetown Board of Trade came to Ottawa and is now in Ottawa, to push this matter, among others. After putting my notice on the order paper, I learned from the papers that this deputation was coming here, and I let it stand until

I could see the president of the Board of Trade, who is one of the deputation, and ascertain more correctly from him what the local situation is, and Mr. Hazard assures me that the money was ready, that it was subscribed on the condition that these cold storage steamers would be got by the government, that a three years' contract should be made, because it would be useless for parties to put up cold storage premises at a great deal of expense if they have a service for only one year, and at the end of the one year it should be withdrawn and their money wasted. Mr. Hazard informs me that notwithstanding all the efforts the Board of Trade have made, from that time to the present they have not been able to secure favourable action from the government. He further informs me and showed me correspondence he had, as president of the Board of Trade, with steamship companies and he assures me there is no difficulty in the way, if there is a will in the matter there is a way. If the hon. Minister of Agriculture has a desire to carry out the promises he made in regard to the matter, then cold storage on steamers can be obtained by the government giving the necessary encouragement. My notice has been on the paper a long while, and I have to complain of my hon. friend that although my notices may stand for some time, when I bring them up he has not got a reply from his colleagues, and I am generally put off with the statement that he is going to mention it, or did mention it and had not got information. This motion has stood quite long enough, and my hon. friend should, when it is brought up, be prepared to discuss it. Very likely he is. I hope, therefore, that he will be able to give me some positive assurance. It is a subject upon which the leading men down there, the agriculturists and the people of the province generally are very much interested, so much so that this deputation has now come to Ottawa with this as one of their objects, and I hope my hon. friend will be able to tell us that the government, if they have not already made these arrangements that they will be prepared to have them ready so that the producers of our province will be put in the position that producers in the other parts of Canada occupy. I think at the present time the Government are providing cold storage on railways, the government having made arrangements with them, and the links are complete from the western-most parts of the country, and perishable products can be carried from the extremes to the seaports and landed into cold storage warehouses in England. They are kept in cold storage from the time they leave the producer until they reach the consumer in the old world. If it is not entirely the case, I hope it will be so soon, and I hope while this is being done in the interests of the producers, as I think it has been as far as the rest of Canada is concerned, that the advantages of it will not be denied to the little province of Prince Edward Island.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Is my hon. friend able to tell us what the proposition made by the Board of Trade is? How often do they want communication and with what points?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think they would be satisfied with a monthly service. I saw a letter with Mr. Hazard in which a three-weekly service was suggested by the Furness Company. A three-weekly service or a monthly service would be considered sufficient in connection with the cold storage premises.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Between Halifax and Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The idea would be to get it direct with the British market—to get a steamer coming from Montreal or Quebec to call, a steamer already furnished with cold storage with a certain amount of space reserved. Of course if that cannot be got, connection with Halifax would be the next best thing, but that would involve transhipment, and I daresay it would involve more expense, because one of those steamers engaged in the coasting trade and freight service between Prince Edward Island and Halifax would then be obliged to have cold storage for that alone, and it might be more expensive than it would be to avail ourselves of the cold storage apparatus that is already in the boats sailing from Montreal and Quebec. Space could be reserved and a call made at Charlottetown once in every three or four weeks.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no objection to this motion for papers. Many of them I have not seen, some of them, I understand, have been presented to the Department of Agriculture within the last few days. The hon.

gentleman will recollect that when the bill relating to cold storage came before this House last year a very full statement was made as to the desire of the government to facilitate in every way the development of the dairy industry in Prince Edward Island. They fully recognized that Prince Edward Island was likely to do its share, and probably more than its portion in comparison with other sections of Canada, and the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries both visited Charlottetown for the express purpose of endeavouring to make arrangements in the interest of the dairy industry in that island. The difficulty that was met was the absolute impossibility of taking up the subject inasmuch as it was alleged that steamers that would put in cold storage could not be provided with sufficient freight from Prince Edward Island to fill the vessel. That was the difficulty in the way. I hope, however, that that difficulty will not continue; I hope that things are improving and that we may, probably in the near future, be able to induce some of the vessel owners to take up the question seriously to give Prince Edward Island the benefits of cold storage. We will know more about that, of course, later on, when the estimates come down. In the meantime the hon. gentleman could not help having a fling at the government for claiming any credit for the cold storage movement. It does seem to me, if my memory is correct, that the development of this industry is largely due to the action of the present government.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Oh.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman says oh. I do not propose to discuss the subject, and I only allude to it now because the hon. gentleman mentioned it himself. I refer to the statutes, and I find that the year before the change of government, in 1895, the magnificent sum of $3,000 was given to aid the cold storage movement. There may be other votes, but certainly the amount, compared with the Liberal votes placed in the estimates last year, is small.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am sure my hon. friend does not wish to make a wrong impression, and I should like to ask him just this question: did not the present government, when they came in, find in the Department of Agriculture an entire scheme prepared?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend says no. I am in a position to say yes. It was entirely blocked out.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—A great many unmatured schemes, I have no doubt, were in the brains of some members of the late administration, but promises and actions are two different things, and it was not very good taste for the hon. gentleman to make the criticism he did, inasmuch as the gentleman who is now at the head of the Department of Agriculture has taken a very personal interest in this matter and has endeavoured to stimulate this industry in all parts of the Dominion and has visited Prince Edward Island with the express purpose of aiding it there, and he regretted very much indeed that he was unable to secure a vessel in which cold storage could be provided for the purpose of giving Prince Edward Island the benefit of that direct communication. It was determined then that a vessel should be found to carry it to Halifax, but as the hon. gentleman himself has observed, that very materially detracts from the benefit of cold storage, because if the temperature is changed for even half an hour, it militates against success. However, the government will endeavour in some way to meet the views of the island at no distant day.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I wish to draw the attention of the House before this discussion closes to the trade and navigation returns between Canada and the West Indies in order to show there is a decided falling off in our trade which is greatly to be deplored. In 1882 we were importing $4,000,000 value from the West Indies. And it fell more or less, but in 1892 we were still importing $4,000,000, in 1893 we were still importing upwards of $4,000,000, in 1895 we were importing nearly $5,000,000 from the British West Indies. Now, in 1897 it has fallen to $1,678,000. It is the same way with the exports. The exports and the imports added together is the lowest trade we have had with the West Indies since we entered into confederation. It is a very unfortunate position that we should be falling off in the natural trade which should exist between the colonies that are nearest to us, and one that produces exactly what we want while we produce exactly what will supply them. This cold storage I am very pleased to acknowledge is one of the methods by which we can improve that trade. The standpoint, however, that I always take in regard to our trade relations is that if we restrict the trade by imposing duties we are bound to have a depreciation of trade. The falling off of our trade in sugar is largely due to the fact that it was necessary to impose the tax on raw sugar in May, 1895, by half a cent a pound, to keep up the revenue tariff under protective taxation. But I take the liberty of drawing the attention of the hon. gentleman from Charlottetown to the state of our trade with the West Indies to show that since confederation was established, 30 years ago, that the present year is the lowest that it has ever been known to fall to, and that unless we can revive that trade, a direct line to the West Indies is not within reach of Prince Edward Island.

Hon. Mr O'DONOHOE—Has not the disturbance in Cuba had an effect upon that trade?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It should have a reverse effect. If the disturbance with Cuba stops our trade then our trade should have increased with the West Indies. I will read you imports by countries which show, that while our sugar trade dropped with the Spanish West Indies, it was not transferred to the British West Indies, but mainly to Germany. The imports for 1897 are as follows for sugar not above No. 16 Dutch standard, that is what I term raw sugar:

	Pounds.
Great Britain	551,034
British Giuana	3,283,382
British West Indies	20,317,636
Austria	13,303,140
Belgium	13,351,506
Brazil	2,158,154
China	6,932
Egypt	32,777
Dutch East Indies	29,687,166
Germany	98,084,985
Peru	4,534,225
Spanish West Indies	5,964,579
Spanish possessions, other	43,415,435
United States	42,033,125
Total	276,724,076
Refined sugar	7,237,910
Duty collected	$1,645,581

Four years ago the imports of sugar from Cuba were 130,000,000, showing the dire effects of the troubles the island is passing through, so far as Canada is concerned.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There was a fall in the price of bounty sugar in Germany.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That could not affect it. As a matter of fact there was an increase in the export bounty of Germany eighteen months ago which lowered the world's price, but that should have the effect of increasing our imports. In 1894 the quantity of our import of sugar was 309,000,000 lbs., and in 1895 it was 303,000,000; in 1897 it had fallen to 276,000,000 lbs., under the tax of one-half a cent per pound.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no change in the tariff on raw sugar.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—There was in May, 1895. I do not think the fall in the price of bounty sugar had anything to do with it. That bounty had been on for a number of years. It is the restrictive power we put upon our trade in consequence of the protective taxation of the necessaries of life that we continue to impose contrary to the pledges of the present government. That is the ground I put it upon, and the evidence of that is that it fell off immediately that tariff was put on.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That was not put on last year.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It was put on in the session of 1895—two years ago. The imports of 1894 when there was no tax upon sugar were $4,790,000 from the British West Indies.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There was no tax on sugar in 1895.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Not on the raw under 16 Dutch Standard, but on the refined. Then in 1896 when a tax of half a cent a pound was put upon our raw sugar our import trade fell at once to $1,896,000 in that year. That shows the direct effect it has upon reducing the necessaries and comforts of the population. To the extent that you tax those necessaries and reduce the industrial power of those industries in which sugar is used, you restrict trade and hamper industry. The British West Indies are fifth on the list in their export of sugar to the United States out of a list of twenty-one countries sending sugar there. Cuba exported in 1896 $24,000,000 worth of sugar to the United States; Germany, $12,500,000; Dutch East Indies, $11,388,000; Hawaii, $11,336,000; British West Indies, $4,700,000. Our imports of sugar from the British West Indies last year were only $475,753, upon which a duty of $111,614 is collected, showing a tax of nearly twenty-five per cent on a prime necessary. The United States are now trying to effect a reciprocity treaty with the British West Indies which will still more effectually check our trade. What we ought to do promptly, without regard to reciprocal favours, is to admit the sugar from the West Indies upon the same terms that Hawaiian sugar is admitted into the United States, namely, free. By doing that we will make a valuable trade, where it is now dwindling away, and we will give every industry dependent upon cheap sugar the benefit of that trade. It is a sound principle to keep in view in our home or foreign trade, to encourage that production only which is natural to the country in which it is produced, and that can flourish without an artificial stimulant such as the export bounty, the maintenance of which has now grown to be such a national burden on the continent of Europe, and which statesmen have so far failed to grapple with. A conference in Brussels a month ago was unsuccessful, and now the British government has invited the nations to a conference in London. The fact that Egypt is now becoming a rival in the production of sugar without an export bounty is a lever which will have the effect of forcing the stronghold of protection in continental sugar. Admit British West India sugar free and we take a step in the right direction.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not see that the speech of the hon. gentleman has much relevancy to the motion before the chair, but I might be allowed to say a word in reply to what he said. The hon. gentleman is under a misapprehension if he thinks a duty on raw sugar would interfere with the importations from the West Indies. We have not imported raw sugar from the West Indies. We have imported grocery sugar, and as the hon. leader of the House has stated, the importation of grocery sugar from the West Indies has been very much diminished; in fact, those grocery sugars have given place largely to the refined sugar coming from Germany, and other bounty sugars. So that the hon. gentleman is mistaken with respect to the raw sugar. For some considerable time the importers have been importing the raw sugar from the East Indies and places other than the West Indies. This is not the time to discuss the question of our trade with the West Indies, but I hope some means will be found to improve the condition of that trade, which is not what it ought to be at all. Our exports from the West Indies have fallen off and our imports have also fallen. The comparative failure of the fisheries in the maritime provinces, I think, has something to do with it. But there is no question about the depressed condition of the sugar business in the West Indies, and it has led to action being taken or proposed, at any rate, in the Imperial Parliament. The hon. gentleman made some reference to the desirability of supplying cold storage facilities in steamers going to the West Indies. I wish to tell the hon. gentleman that those facilities have already been supplied by one steamship line running from Halifax, largely through the efforts of the Minister of Agriculture.

WINTER COMMUNICATION WITH PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency may cause to be laid on the Table of the House copies of all the reports made to the Department of Marine and Fisheries by the officers in charge of the steamer "Petrel" having reference to the service performed by that steamer during the winter of 1896-97, and also detailed statements of the expenditure incurrred for that service, and receipts for freight and passengers.

He said: Hon. gentlemen have heard quite often about steam communication with Prince Edward Island, and I do not propose to discuss the subject at very great length, because it is perfectly familiar to most hon. gentlemen in this House. It will be remembered that this communication has been attempted to be carried out in two ways, by ice boats at the narrowest parts of the strait, between Cape Tormentine and Cape Traverse, pulled by men; and steam communication at the eastern end of the island, more especially between the ports of Georgetown, P.E.I., and Pictou, Nova Scotia. They are the two nearest points at that place. In the year 1886 the government took up the ice boat service. It was, previously to that, in the hands of contractors as a private enterprise, tendered for and carried on in that way, but owing to an unfortunate accident that occurred, and an admitted lack of efficiency in the service, in 1886 it was taken up and conducted as a government service. Previous to that steamers had been tried upon the eastern route, two boats, with very little success, but in the year 1888 the steamer "Stanley" was put upon the eastern route, and as most hon. gentlemen know very well, she has proved very successful indeed, when the great difficulties which she has had to encounter are taken into consideration. She is not absolutely successful because the communication is far from being continuous and at any moment the island may be thrown out of mail and passenger communication for some days, and sometimes weeks. That has occurred with the "Stanley." But the comparative success which the "Stanley" has achieved in contending with heavy ice has led a great many people to believe that a boat similarly constructed, if placed at the narrowest point, between Cape Tormentine and Traverse, where the ice is all the time moving, where it never freezes fast at all, might be found effective, and reduce the communication between the island and the mainland to the matter of a ferry. For some years it has been argued that it was the duty of the government to supplement the steamer "Stanley" by another boat which could be put upon that western route; for hon. gentlemen will understand this, that it would not be just to Prince Edward Island, it would not be safe to transfer the "Stanley" from the eastern route, where she is making fairly effective communication, and put her upon the western route where she might be liable to be locked up for the whole winter and the province might be deprived of communication during the whole of that time, and therefore with one boat the western route cannot be fairly tested. Last year the present government made an attempt to test the practicability of steam communication on this western route between Cape Tormentine and Cape Traverse. I am very sorry—and I think I speak the sentiments of the people of Prince Edward Island almost universally—that that experiment was made at all under the circumstances. Instead of building, or procuring a boat that was suitable for contending with ice, a mere tug boat, from Kingston, was selected, for reasons that nobody in the world can understand. She was brought down there, and at a cost of $14,000 or $15,000, what was called an experiment, was made. As everybody might know, this weak, small tug boat could not be expected to accomplish anything in the face of the difficulties that were there to be encountered. Anybody that knew anything about that place, knew that nothing but a powerful and strongly built boat would do anything there. In the face of that, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries chartered a tug boat called the "Petrel" from somewhere near Kingston, from the Collins' Bay Rafting Company, and brought her down at a cost of something like $14,000, and she lay there all winter. Reference is made to this experiment in the report of the department, in these words:

> In connection with the communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, representations had been made from time to time concerning the possibility of conveying mails and passengers by steamer during the greater part of the winter season between Capes Traverse and Tormentine. Many of the inhabitants of the island have held the opinion that communication could be kept up between these points, which are not nine miles apart, by a suitable steamer during the greater part of the winter. It had also been stated by them and others interested that the route, being a short one, would be more advantageous to the travelling public and a more direct route for the conveyance of mails than to Pictou by the steamer "Stanley." Petitions have been sent to parliament embodying these views, and very strong representations have been made by members of parliament in the same connection.
> During the session of 1896-97 a sum was voted by parliament with a view of making the experiment. The sum was not more than sufficient to charter and fit out a vessel and pay the wages of a crew for the purpose of testing the practicability of the scheme. An officer of the department was given instructions to examine all suitable vessels in the Dominion with view of selecting one sufficiently strong, well equipped and powerful to make her way through moving ice.
>
> No vessel exactly suitable could be found for the purpose, as vessels for navigation in ice must be specially constructed and of a suitable model. The best vessel, however, that could be procured for the experiment was the "Petrel," owned by the Colins Bay Rafting and Forwarding Company. The "Petrel" is a steel tug boat of very strong build, of 22 nominal horse power and draws 9½ feet of water. The steamer made several trips across the strait during the winter, and during these trips careful observations of the tides, leads in the ice, the force of the ice against a vessel endeavouring to work her way through it, and the best and most convenient places for landing were made.
>
> As the "Petrel" was allowed to remain until the opening of navigation in the spring, an officer on board made careful notes respecting the difficulties presented to steam communication, and in what month these obstacles were the greatest. The thickness of the ice and the quantity passing through the strait, backwards and forwards, are matters upon which the department desired information, to be able to arrive at some conclusion, respecting the possibility of keeping up steam communication at the capes.

The steamer entered upon the work of observation about the 12th of December, 1896, and remained until the 4th May, 1897, considerable data having been obtained for future consideration. The experiment, however, was not on the whole a success. In the early part of the season a heavy storm came on and icebound the "Petrel" for over a mile. Continuous and determined efforts were made by the captain and crew, to cut the steamer out beyond the coast or board ice, to enable her to make the crossing through the moving or floating ice. These efforts were, however, not successful. The ice was found to be about two feet in thickness, and although every possible expedient was resorted to, it was not found possible to release the steamer from her ice-bound condition until towards the spring.

That is the whole story as told by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in his report He says very innocently that the "Petrel' was allowed to remain in the ice until navigation opened. He tells us in another place that she was caught by the ice and she could not be got out. As a fact she lay there almost the whole winter with a crew of officers, engineers and men on board her, and she never made a crossing from the early part of January until the very latter end of April when the navigation opened anyway. Then she made some trips, for which credit is taken. As I have already remarked, it is evident to any one who has given the matter the slightest consideration that this boat would do just what she did do, and that was nothing. It was perfectly impossible that she could do anything, a small paltry boat such as she is. As reported by the minister himself, she was not specially built to encounter ice. It was well known to any one who gave the matter consideration that she could not accomplish anything and they were not disappointed. I have somewhat of a complaint to make against the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in connection with this matter, because I find that in former debates in the House of Commons, before he became a minister, he spoke very adversely of this route altogether. He denounced the late government for expenditures which they had made in connection with it. He declared that there was no natural harbour there, and that the government were blamable for having erected wharfs at that place and having aided in the construction of a railway from Sackville to Cape Traverse, which he declared was no use to anybody, as this was not a practicable route. In view of these facts, and the kind of boat that was employed to make the experiment last winter, there are not a few people down there who believe that it was the desire of the minister to condemn the route by placing upon it a boat which every one must have known could do no good. At all events that has been the result of the so-called experiment. Then the hon. minister speaks in his report, of the useful information that was being obtained, for instance, in ascertaining the thickness of the ice, the prevailing currents, and all that. I can tell the hon. gentleman that every fine day in the winter boats cross from side to side, and an officer of the department could cross with those boats and test the thickness of the ice just as well as he could by sitting there in the steamer comfortably enjoying himself all the winter at the expense of the country, and if he desired to obtain an idea as to the force of the current, I know that information could be just as well obtained by an officer of the department taking passage day after day across the straits with one of those ice boats as by this expensive means of getting a tug boat to lie at the wharf on one side of the straits and keeping it there at the expense of the tax-bearers of the country of about $14,000 for the winter. Last year I put a notice on the order paper and asked for some information as to what this steamer had done, and the charter party and the correspondence which led to her being engaged for the service, was brought down. I have these papers in my hand. The pay roll is also among them, showing the salaries that were paid to the officials and others employed to man that boat during the winter. I will just read some of the items from the pay roll. The captain employed was Jos. Macdonald. He is a good navigator, no doubt, but he had never had any experience with ice boats. If it was really desired to get any information, one would have thought that the government would have employed some of the experienced men who had been on the steamer "Stanley." However, Capt. Joseph Macdonald was employed at a salary of $70 per month; the mate received $50 a month and two engineers $60 a month each. There was the stewardess at $30 per month, and seven seamen at from twenty to twenty-five dollars a month. This statement which was brought down shows that up to the 30th April the sum of $10,980.82 was expended. The Auditor General's report and that of the Department of Marine and Fisheries shows that altogether about $12,800 was expended. I see, however, that there is something left out. These figures are not complete, because the figures which were brought down to the 30th of April show that the expenditure was $10,980, and that only $4,000 out of the $6,000 of the charter party was spent. It is, therefore, pretty plain that some of the items have been carried over, and I think rather considerable items, because after this return was brought down we know that $2,000 of the charter party remained to be paid, and the expense had to be incurred of the trips made afterwards and of carrying that steamer back to Kingston to her owners, as the government was bound to convey her at the expense of the country, and by the time all these are added I know that I am under rather than over the mark in putting the expenditure at $14,000. The return brought down showed that she made 18 trips during the time she was placed on the route. Of these, three were made in the month of December—the 13th, 14th and 18th of December, 1896, and seven in January—on the 2nd, 6th, 7th, 8th, 11th, 13th and 14th. From the 14th of January to the 17th of April, she lay inside the breakwater at Cape Tormentine and never made a trip, while the expense was going on during the whole of that period and the hands were kept on. These trips which she made in the first of the season and at the end of the season, were trips that could have been made by an ordinary schooner. It was before the ice formed in the fall, and after it had disappeared in the spring. The service which she performed was absolutely no service at all. I asked for the number of passengers she had carried, and the answer I got, in this return, was rather an amusing one: it was, "number of passengers at $2 each would amount to $86." The department very kindly assumed, I suppose, that the members of this House would not be able to tell how much 43 passengers at $2 each would amount to, so they make up the calculation, but they take very good care not to say that those passengers paid for their passage. The return does not say so; it does not say that any amount was received, and I doubt if anything was received.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then the rate would not be $2.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The return says "43 passengers at $2 would amount to $86," but it does not say that $86 was paid, and I am unable to see in the public accounts where a dollar was credited. I have looked carefully through the returns and I find that it does not say so there. It only says that 43 passengers at $2 would amount to $86. And then with regard to the inquiry made about freight, "have no details as to freight carried." The government, it would appear, were know-nothings on this subject; they did not know, and there was very good reason they did not know, because there was no freight carried. The return does not say so, but says they had no information.

Mails were carried by the "Petrel" on the 18th, 19th, 20th, 21st, 22nd, 23rd and 24th of April, 1897.

Seven mails were carried by this steamer during the time it was employed and paid for by the government, and, as already remarked, that was after the navigation had opened and after the ice had almost, if not entirely, disappeared in the straits, when any boat at all could have made the crossing; even an ordinary sail boat, except on very windy days, could have made that crossing and carried the mails for which a very extravagant amount had been paid by the government of Canada.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Is that the return for which you are now asking?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—No, this is the return which I moved for last year. I was only able to get a statement up to the 30th April. I want a full and clear statement of the freight, and I do not want to get an answer this time that the government do not know how much freight was carried. If there was no freight carried, we want to know it, and if there were any passengers, we do not want an ambiguous statement such as "forty-three passengers at two dollars would amount to eighty-six dollars," but we want to know whether they actually carried forty-three passengers or any passengers, and we also want to know the full expenditure in connection with this service. Now, this subject had been engaging the attention of the late government as well as the present administration. There was a strong pressure, as I have already intimated, for some years back in favour of giving this route a trial, and it was the intention of the late government to have done so. The "Stanley" is now about ten years onthe service, and the work she has to do is very trying on any boat. In the natural course of things, she is not so strong as she formerly was, notwithstanding a great deal of repairs is continually put upon her, and it is believed she will have to go home to the old country to be thoroughly overhauled by the builders in order to safely carry on the work she has been doing. The feeling in the province of Prince Edward Island now is, and has existed for some years back, that the "Stanley" should be supplemented by another boat. What she is capable of doing is now demonstrated. There is certainly no great amount of experiment about a boat of the power and shape and design of the "Stanley," and even for the eastern route between Georgetown and Pictou, it is believed that if another boat was on that route assisting the "Stanley," communication could be made almost continuous. It has happened several times that the "Stanley" was just caught in the harbour by ice propelled by a strong wind, and she has been caught there, when a boat that was out and free could run from another point and keep the communication going on. The "Stanley" has been for nearly three weeks in the straits unable to relieve herself when, if there was another boat, it would go to her assistance and take the passengers off if not keep up communication. If another boat was built she could be put on the Cape Traverse and Cape Tormentine route.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Does the hon. gentleman mean that if a second boat were built the "Stanley" would be put on the Traverse and Cape Tormentine route?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I would not say that positively, because others who are posted on the matter better than I am might come to the conclusion that the new steamer, on account of draught of water and other things, might be better suited than the "Stanley" is for the capes service. Then I say that any boat that is built to grapple with that service, whether it is at Cape Traverse or at the eastern end of the island, must be a powerful one and if our government was provided with these two boats they could experiment at the western end. As I already remarked, it would not be safe to make that experiment with one boat. If the boat was locked up at the west the province would be deprived of the whole communication, and it would be a serious matter. If there are two boats, a boat could be put on the Traverse route to test it, because if it were practicable it would not be necessary to continue the communication at any other point and it would then be reduced to a ferry. Most of the Prince Edward Islanders, and all who have travelled on that boat, from what they have seen the "Stantley" accomplish in making her way through enormous fields of ice, believe that if a boat made on her design and perhaps drawing less water, but with her design and with her power, might be able to make constant communication at Cape Traverse, and reduce communication between the island and the mainland to a mere ferry. If that were the case, the "Stanley" or the new boat need not be maintained in the future, and the government could find some other employment for her. I earnestly hope that the government will deal with this question soon, and that in getting a new boat great care will be taken in getting one strongly constructed, strong enough to contend with the heavy ice at any of those points wherever she attempts to make the communication. I hope the hon. gentlemen will give the matter the very best thought, and I hope my hon. friends representing the government in this House will be able now to tell us that they have made up their minds to supply a good and efficient steamer for this service.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—There is no gentleman in this House more capable of giving information in reference to this steamer "Stanley" and the navigation between Prince Edward Island and Cape Traverse than the hon. gentleman who has just taken this seat. It would be unreasonable to suppose that those western members, and others who know little about navigation in the straits, should be possessed of the information that the hon. gentleman has. The hon. gentleman sitting next to him (Mr. Wood) is perfectly conversant with the pier at Cape Tormentine and the object for which it was built. Now it is absurd to say that the steamer "Stanley," or any steamer that is capable of navigating the straits, could possibly get inside the shelter of the piers at Cape Tormentine. I cannot exactly say what depth of water there is there. I think I am quite within the bounds when I say it is not over 11 feet.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Sixteen.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—If it is 16 feet, why is the pier not made use of by timber vessels coming there?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Barques come there, drawing 16 and 18 feet.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—I am not in a position to know what water is left inside, but I know positively that vessels drawing than 11 feet refuse to go inside, and I know that the business has been carried on outside, and that no steam vessel of less than 16 feet draught can be made to navigate those straits in winter. I assume that a vessel drawing 16 feet is not able to do the work that the "Stanley" can do, and I know that no vessel in the Dominion that is not built for navigating in the ice could possibly do the service that is required to be done in that location, because there is no such vessel built for ordinary purposes that is capable of contending with the ice in the straits. The only other place that vessels could be got from is Newfoundland. Such vessels have the power to get across and to contend with the ice, but they have not the adequate accommodation at Cape Traverse for such vessels. I think no hon. gentleman will say that any other boat in the place of the "Stanley" could be put in a position to break her way through the ice. In order to break through ice such as is encountered there, a vessel must have some free water to start in and such free space cannot be had inside Cape Tormentine pier. I cannot say anything about the accommodation on the other side, but I believe the accommodation is much more unlikely to be sufficient. The fact that nothing has been done up to the present time, either by the late government or the present administration, to establish navigation across those straits at that narrow point is sufficient to prove that the thing is impracticable. The first thing which has to be done is to build additional piers further out; and I know there is trouble and difficulty if you build out into deeper water the currents are interfered with, and the inside gradually fills. To start with, the government would have to spend a quarter of a million more to build docks on the two sides, before they make the experiment. The country is not prepared for that at present. It is all very well for farmers from Prince Edward Island to talk about this matter. They are good farmers, but do not understand navigating the ice in the straits of Northumberland. We are to be asked to spend millions in making preparations, and then we will find it cannot be done. I think it is a little early for us to undertake any such task.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I must say a few words in reply to what has fallen from the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. Otherwise I am sure the remarks he made would leave a very wrong impression upon the House. The hon. gentleman has spoken of the pier which was built at Cape Tormentine in connection with this service. That pier, the hon. gentleman states, will not answer for the "Stanley" or for any boat in the service. I must say in reply to that that the pier was designed by the government engineer here especially for that service, and the hon. gentleman who has spoken is the first person that I have heard express an opinion as to the unfitness of that pier for the purpose for which it was intended. The depth of water inside the pier at lowest neap tide is 16 feet, some say 17 feet. The The depth of water just outside the pier is 20 feet. Twenty-two feet is the depth of water at high tide. There is about 6 or 8 feet rise or fall of tide. The hon. gentleman says vessels will not go there to load. Ever since the piers were built we have had a number of barques coming there to load. I think the number of barques that loaded there this year was fifteen or twenty.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—Outside the pier?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—No; every one of them loaded inside the pier. They never load outside of the pier. Last year, I know, there were thirty barques loaded there, and the year before, not so many. I do not remember the number, but ever since the piers were built, it has done very considerable local business in that way, and the hon. gentleman is the first one I have heard who has entered any complaint of that character against it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He was thinking of Miramichi.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Perhaps he was. With regard to the possibility of winter crossings being made between the capes, I would like to say this: the hon. gentleman who has last spoken, has referred to crossing there as impracticable in the winter time—that is, by steam service, I presume, he means. It has always been a place where ice boats have crossed for the last fifty years. I was myself of the same opinion as the hon. gentleman who has just spoken until within the last few years. I did not suppose that it was possible to contend with the difficulties which must be met in the Northumberland Straits in the winter time, and until the "Stanley" was built and placed upon the route between Pictou and Georgetown, and it was demonstrated what a steamer of that build and power could do, I did not suppose it was possible for any steamer to make her way across those straits with any regularity in the winter time. Since she has been placed upon that route, and it has been shown what a steamer of that character can do, I am satisfied that the majority of the people living in the vicinity of Northumberland Straits have been convinced that a similar steamer, perh ps drawing not quite so much water but a steamer similarly built, strong and powerful, will be able to make regular crossings between Cape Tormentine and Cape Traverse. The condition which is necessary in order to enable a steamer to navigate the strait of Northumberland is simply this, that the ice shall be either in motion or movable when the great power is applied to it. When ice jams form, and the ice is blocked in a solid mass for one, two or three miles, no steamer, no matter how powerful she may be, can get through it, but if those large ice cakes are in motion, or are capable of being moved when a sufficient power is applied, the steamer can make her way through them. Now the difficulties which the "Stanley" has met with in the past have been these large ice jams. When the wind prevails for a certain length of time in one direction, the ice forms in immense bodies, extending for a mile or two miles in one direction, and when she is once fast in a jam of that kind it is impossible for her to get out. The condition of things between Cape Tormentine and Cape Traverse is this: there are two tides coming into Northumberland straits, one round the eastern end of Prince Edward Island and the other round the western or northern end. Those two tides met right at the mouth of the Baie Verte, where those two capes are. The tides come together there and separate twice in every 24 hours, and unless there is a very strong wind in one direction the ice is broken up there twice in every 24 hours, I have had some opportunities of observing the condition of things there for I have often visited the capes in the winter time, and there is scarcely a day but you will see these long streaks of water through the ice, and no impedient whatever to a steamboat of the "Stanley's" power making her way across the strait at that point. This opinion I know is shared by the most experienced men and most competent judges living in that locality, and my own observation and the knowledge I have of what the "Stanley" has done, has led me to the conclusion that if a boat of the "Stanley's" power adapted for the service were placed on that route there would be no difficulty whatever in making crossings every day in winter when it was fit for people to be out of doors at all.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—What preparations are there on the other side when you get across?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I will speak as to that. There is no preparation at the present time. It would be impossible for the steamer "Stanley," or any other steamer, to run between Cape Traverse and Cape Tormentine until a wharf was built at Cape Traverse. The wharf at Cape Tormentine is sufficient in my opinion.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—How much injury did it receive last year?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—No injury, except that it is worm eaten. It certainly needs some repairs. I understand the government are contemplating putting creosoted timber round the outside of it, and I hope they will do so. Unless something of that kind is done, the worms will eat it up and the work will be eventually ruined.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—It will collapse.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Yes, unless it is protected from the worms. However, as a protection for the "Stanley," in its present shape it is everything that is desired. The "Stanley" can go inside the pier if she desires, but I would like to remind the hon. gentleman, when he says the "Stanley" or any other steamer could not find a safe berth there in winter time, that in winter there is not the slightest necessity for the "Stanley" or any other steamer going inside the pier. They have the bord ice for at least a mile outside of the pier, and the steamer "Stanley" could make her way through the bord ice up to the pier.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—This bord ice is in the habit of shifting.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—It never shifts.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—She cannot get in when it is formed.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—But once it is formed it is a perfect protection, and there would be no necessity to go inside the pier. She could lie outside, where there is 25 feet of water. The hon. gentleman remarked that the fact that nothing had been done in the past proved that this route was impracticable. I think that certainly more active measures should have been taken by the late government than were taken to test the feasibility of this route. I expressed my opinion on that subject, and I have often expressed my opinion in the other chamber, and urged upon the late government to take some active measures to test the feasibility of this route. I would do the same now with the present government. I should like to say, in corroboration of what was said by my hon. friend who moved this address, that I believe it is utterly useless to attempt to accomplish anything unless a suitable boat is obtained. The mover of this address referred to the steamer "Petrel" and the want of success that attended that experiment. It certainly was not a successful experiment, and the steamer "Petrel" was in no way suited for the service. I believe, however, that the result of the "Petrel's" staying there last winter has been to convince the officers who were in command of her that if they had had a suitable steamer they could have done good service there and made regular crossings. This is, of course, one of the most difficult services in the Dominion, and it is utterly useless to attempt to make it a success with a weak or insufficient steamer. If the government are in earnest in endeavouring to establish communication there it is absolutely necessary that a suitable steamer, with sufficient power to contend with the difficulties of navigation, should be placed upon the route. I do not hesitate to express it as my opinion that if a suitable steamer were placed upon the route it would prove an entire success.

The motion was agreed to.

MAJOR WALSH'S EXPEDITION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY rose to:

Ask the government if it is true that Major Walsh was allowed to go to the Yukon district short of provisions, so that he has had to pay one dollar per pound for poor beef as reported in the press.

He said: I do not desire at this time to make any remarks with reference to the motion I have on the paper further than to say that I noticed, and I dare say other members of the Senate have noticed a very startling report in the newspapers the other day to the effect that Major Walsh had bought nearly 13,000 pounds of poor beef at $1 per pound and not knowing whether that statement was accurate or not, I have taken this method of getting correct information.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Mr. Walsh took with him ample provisions and he keeps always on hand provisions for at least six months. Major Walsh may have made some purchases, I cannot say whether that is so or not—for persons who were short of provisions and in danger of starvation, but so far as his force is concerned, he has ample supplies on hand.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then the hon. gentleman does not know whether the statement made in the press, that he paid a dollar a pound for poor beef, is correct or not.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not know, but I do not believe it. We have not had any communication recently. I do not believe it had been open for anybody to receive such information.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Wednesday, 16th March, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at three o'Clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

CORRESPONDENCE re HAMILTON SMITH.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I beg to give notice that I will move that an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General praying that he will cause to be presented to this Senate copies of all telegrams and letters passing between any members of the government and the High Commissioner relating to Mr. Hamilton Smith and all papers, communications and documents, the contents of which led or induced the government to send such telegrams or letters. It is with reluctance that I rise to give this notice. It will be remembered that on the 18th of last month I moved for some papers which might, I think, have been brought down the very next day. I did so at the instance of the hon. leader of the House. It is treating an hon. member and the Senate with some contempt to allow a month to elapse without bringing down the documents. Those papers are not very important, and are not numerous, and could not be hard to obtain if the department is well managed, and they should have been brought down by this time at least.

DELAYED RETURNS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—Before the Orders of the day are called, I should like to ask the Secretary of State if there is any chance of my obtaining the returns which I moved for at the beginning of last session, and again at the beginning of this session. He was kind enough to say, when I asked him this year, that he would use his personal influence to try to secure them. I would like to know whether he has had time to do so or if I may look forward to getting them within a reasonable time?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman intimated to me last year that he would take an instalment of them, as they were pretty large, and an instalment was brought down, and I presented it to the House. I think I have another here.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I have never been informed of it. I should be glad to see the slightest indication of it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am quite sure I brought down a portion of them last year. Here is a supplementary return to an address of the Senate, giving the names and salaries of officers employed in the inside and outside service, and so on, specifying in each case the manner and ground of such removal, and so on. This return embraces two departments. If my recollection serves me right, all the other departments were brought down last year.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—None of them last year.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I have never heard of them.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Is that the last instalment?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This is marked "supplementary returns." I made inquiry why it was so marked, and it was said that returns had been presented last year. I will have it looked up, and find out how it is.

RAILWAY RATES ON PURE BRED CATTLE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—While on the matter of delayed information and returns, I have again to ask the hon. Secretary of State if he is prepared to give me an answer to the question which was left over, at his request, with regard to the allowance of half rates on pure bred cattle by the railway companies. My hon. friend will remember the point was, are the government railways making a similar reduction?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I mentioned at the time that I was under the impression that the rate on the Intercolonial Railway was considerably below the Grand Trunk rates. My hon. friend rather doubted the accuracy of the statement. Since then, I have got further information, which confirms the statement then made, and, as that is the fact, the Minister of Railways is not disposed at present to consider the propriety of making any reduction, as he considers now the relative rate is, at least, as low as the Grand Trunk Railway Company's.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Are we to understand that the government are not making the concession which has been given by the railway companies?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman is mis-stating the case, if he will excuse me for saying so. I said the ordinary rates were lower than the rates on the Grand Trunk, and therefore, if they were to reduce them, it would bring them very much lower; perhaps it would be only a quarter of the Grand Trunk rates. I do not know how that is. But the rates now are so much lower that it would be unnecessary to reduce them still further, and it would not be in the public interest to make any cut.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I have failed, I think, to make myself understood. This is not a general reduction upon the rates on stock at all; it is only what is applied to pure bred animals. The railway companies of Canada, last Saturday week, unanimously agreed to make this reduction, and I have been told that the government railways were represented at the meeting, which was held in Toronto, when this was done; if so, I cannot well understand why they do not carry out the arrangement. My hon. friend, I fear, from the fact that I did not make myself very well understood, has not brought the point clearly to the mind of the Minister of Railways.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I must have brought the point clearly to his mind, because I took the trouble to cut out the speech of the hon. gentleman, and wrote a note to the Minister of Railways calling his attention to it, and asked him to give it the best consideration, and the answer he gave me I have already mentioned to the House, that the rates were now so much lower on the Intercolonial that it was not considered proper to reduce them still further, as the ordinary rate was below the corresponding rate on the Grand Trunk Railway.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I would call the attention of the House to the fact that the Intercolonial Railway is run without any revenue to the government, that the Grand Trunk Railway collects a revenue of $7,000,000 which the traffic of that line has to pay; and the Canadian Pacific Railway has a surplus revenue or profit of $10,000,000, so that these two railways can very well afford to make the concession, while the Intercolonial, which collects no revenue or has no margin of profit, may not be able to make that concession. The concession is a very valuable one in order to encourage the breeding of good stock, but the fact that those heavy revenues are collected from those two main lines is quite sufficient to justify the course that the Canadian Pacific railway and Grand Trunk railway at any rate have taken.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—With regard to the rates of freight charged on the Intercolonial railway, I may say the other railways are not upon a par, in my estimation, with the Intercolonial, which runs through the lower provinces. The Intercolonial railway was built as a quid pro quo for the share of the expense on the canal system of Western Canada and other public works, borne by the inhabitants of the lower provinces. I do not know that it should be a sine qua non that the Intercolonial should earn a revenue over its expenses for that consideration. My information is that the recent tariff rates (I speak now more particularly in regard to the lumber tariff) are not less, but are in excess and very much in excess, of what were previously charged. I personally, in connection with other gentlemen interested in that industry belonging to the lower provinces, am bringing the matter before the Minister of Railways. The subject differs somewhat from that which is immediately before the House, but I may say that the system adopted or proposed to be adopted, by the Intercolonial railway in charging for freight on lumber is a most inequitable and unreasonable one, in my estimation, and I believe the position I take in regard to the matter will commend itself to the members of this House. In regard to the rates on lumber, the proposition of those who regulate that part of the business is that the freight should be charged by weight, and a lumberman whose stock has been exposed to heavy rains for a considerable period of the year, who happens to have a ship at hand during the heavy rain, and is going to ship his lumber, pays as much for water literally as for the lumber itself.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Watered stock.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Yes, watered stock, spruce stock at that. In this upper country the lumber is of very much more value and can afford to stand a higher rate of freight than the spruce lumber in the lower provinces. Now, I think that is a most inequitable arrangement and should be done away with, and an equitable system, a system of charging so much upon a certain quantity of lumber should be adopted by the government. That is what it has been in the past and that is the rule which should obtain in the future. There can be no doubt at all that the charges now made (I have just received advices from my son at home in the business) are in excess of what they have been in the past. The railway officials insist that men engaged in this business, which is a very large one in our country, shall be subjected to such treatment as this—that wet lumber should be charged freight by weight. I do not see how it can be justified. Then, in another matter, we are also between the devil and the deep sea. They propose now if a shipper holds cars for a longer period than forty-eight hours to charge $1 a car for every day in excess of that forty-eight hours. A steamer coming to Halifax is bound to load as quickly as possible; she has four or five different hatches and loads with steam winches. If you do not have your cargo ready, one of two things will occur, either you have to pay demurrage to your steamer or the steamer will go without your cargo, or if you retain cars for more than forty-eight hours you have to pay $1 a car.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—This is certainly out of order; it is sometimes permitted, immediately before the calling of the orders of the day, for hon. members to interject questions for information in regard to the general business of the House. It is done purely with the indulgence of the House, but we have not reached the orders of the day yet. I think the last call from the chair was on the hon. Mr. Lougheed for his motion on the paper. This discussion, if permitted by the House, is only allowed before the calling of the orders of the day, and then it is only an indulgence granted by the House to members who feel justified under peculiar circumstances, to interject business foreign to the paper on the notice of the House. We commenced with an inquiry from the hon. member from Brandon as to the delayed returns, and ended with a discussion on the rates of the Intercolonial railway. The two subjects were totally different. I do not know where the discussion would end if it were allowed to go on much further; we might have the Yukon railway in it, or some other subject, but we are not at that stage in the proceedings when the House, by custom, permits such discussions as this.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I may have misunderstood the hon. member from Marshfield (Mr. Ferguson), but I understood he was making a contrast between the Intercolonial railway and the company railways.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—The subject introduced by the hon. member from Marshfield (Mr. Ferguson) is of such importance as will justify us in giving it a little consideration at the present time.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I rise to a question of order: there is no motion before the chair.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—The hon. member from Richmond is a great advocate for conforming to the rules of the House. (Several members—Order, order.) I am speaking to the point of order. Questions of this kind have been discussed in the Senate ever since I have been here, and in very many cases there has been an hour or so occupied in discussing them, and some hon. gentlemen who took very little part in discussions of public questions generally are ready then to call an hon. member to order. Now I am willing to take my seat if it is the will of the House that it should be done, but I think it is in the interests of the country that this question should be discussed by the members of the Senate. If it is decided that this matter should be dropped here, I am willing to take my seat.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I rise to questions of order as little as any member of the House. We all know that the rules of the House are continually being disregarded, and perhaps I have as much acquaintance with the rules of the Senate as most members of it, and I am one of the last members of the House to raise a question of order against any hon. member. I hope, in calling my hon. friend to order a second time, that he will not think that I am influenced by any personal feelings, because I assure him I am not.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I may state, in reference to the remarks which I made, that I brought the matter up by a motion about ten days ago. My hon. friend, the Secretary of State, was not ready at the time to give me an answer, and he asked for a delay. A day was named when he would give the information, and when the day was reached I brought it up again and did not get my answer. To-day I took the opportunity to get an answer from him; had he been able to reply at the time I made my motion we should have had all this discussion then when I was in order.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—Perhaps I shall be allowed to make an explanation. I saw Mr. Lougheed's name on the orders of the day the first order, and thinking that we had reached the orders of the day, I asked the question, but finding that I am out of order I beg humbly to apologize to the House.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I move that the House adjourn. I think now I am in order to discuss this matter. It appears to me that the question that has been brought up by the hon. member from Marshfield is deserving of some consideration from the hon. members of this House. It has been shown that the rates on pure bred animals on the railways of this Dominion have been cut down one half. There must be some special object for that course pursued by the railway companies, and I take it that it is a pure matter of business on their part. They are anxious, not so much for the advantage and prosperity of the agriculturists of this country, as they are to increase the business of their own railways, and to do that, as an encouragement to the farming population they have reduced the carriage of pure bred animals so that farmers may be induced to procure and breed a proper class of animals which will give them additional freight for their railways. The object of the railway companies is to make money, but the object of the government and of the government railways, should be, not so much to make money, as to promote the interests of the country, and I do not think they could take any steps which would benefit the farming community more than to give proper encouragement to them to purchase and breed good stocks suitable for the markets of the world. The bsuject is worthy of consideration. I know that the government wlll not lose anything by encouraging the introduction and breeding of superior animals in this country. That is all I have to say on the subject, and I ask permission to withdraw the motion.

The motion to adjourn was withdrawn.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (30) "An Act respecting the Lake Erie and Detroit River Railway Company." —(Hon. Mr. Casgrain.)

DELAYED RETURNS.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the orders of the day are called, I should like to ask the hon. Secretary of State if that return, for which I moved twelve months ago, is ready yet?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman declined to take his return in instalments. I think I have got all the returns except from one of the departments, and I have been pressing for it all I could. It is either the Post Office Department or the Department of Railways that is the delinquent. I will call the attention of the department to the subject again.

PACIFIC AND YUKON RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The order of the day being read,

Second reading (Bill F) An Act to incorporate the Pacific and Yukon Railway, Navigation and Mining Company.—(Hon. Mr. Lougheed.)

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED said: In view of the desire, and also the anxiety expressed by my hon. friend the leader of the House the other day that this bill should stand pending the introduction of the Teslin Lake Railway Bill, if my hon. friend could give us any assurance that that bill will be introduced here at an early day—because I notice by the press that it has passed the committee stage in the House of Commons —I shall be quite willing to permit this bill to stand until some time next week.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I believe that the Yukon bill will pass its third reading today, and will come immediately from the House of Commons to the Senate, and so will be before this House at an early day—I think by Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then I move that the order of the day be discharged, and that this bill be placed on the orders of the day for Wednesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned.

CANADA LOAN AND SAVINGS COMPANY'S BILL.

AMENDMENTS CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN, from the Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported Bill (13) "An Act to incorporate the Central Canada Loan and Savings Company," with amendments. He said: Most of these amendments are merely verbal. There are just three of any importance. One amendment provides that the register of the shareholders shall be accessible for inspection at all reasonable times to every debenture holder, mortgagee, bondholder, or stockholder in the company, which is a very proper clause to put in. Another amendment is an addition which has been made to the clause which provides for bringing the Act into effect, and is as follows:

And a certified copy of the resolution to bring the Act into effect shall within fifteen days from the passing of the resolution be transmitted to the Secretary of State, and shall be by him published in the Canada Gazette.

Then there is an addition to the last clause as follows:

And may do whatever is required for compliance with any laws relating to the licensing, registration, &c., of the company.

Those additions are merely to make the language clearer.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES moved that the amendments be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

EXPENSES OF W. H. SOWDEN, IMMIGRATION AGENT.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a detailed account by the Department of the Interior of the items of the expenses allowed to W. H. Sowden during the period of his employment as immigration agent, and also, the names of all or any persons, who, in consequence of Mr. Sowden's work in the Midland Counties, went to the Canadian North-west, and who, as stated by the leader of the government in the Senate, it is believed by the government would otherwise have gone to the United States, and the residences of such persons prior to their departure to the North-west, and the places where they settled in the North-west.

The motion was agreed to.

DOCUMENTS AND CORRESPONDENCE RE STIKINE-TESLIN RAILWAY.

Hon. Mr. WOOD moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a Return showing all offers received by the government for building the Stikine-Teslin Railway or for building any railway or tramway to connect the head waters of the Yukon with the Pacific Ocean, and all plans, specifications and other documents in connection therewith, and all correspondence upon this subject.

He said: I presume there is no objection to this motion. I should like the hon. leader of the government to state if this return will be brought down promptly, as it will be important to have it for the discussion that will take place on the Yukon-Teslin Railway Bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There is no objection to the motion being carried. Whatever papers there may be will be brought down as quickly as possible.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMISSIONER WALSH'S TRIP TO YUKON.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, copies of all letters and reports received by the government or any department thereof, from Commissioner Walsh, while on his way to the Yukon district, or since his arrival there.

He said: I do not need to make any remark further than to express the hope that this information will be brought down in time for discussion on the Yukon Railway Bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say to my hon. friend that any official letters that it would not be against the public interest to bring down, will be brought down as early as possible.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (G) "An Act to better secure the safety of certain Fishermen."—(Hon. Mr. Power).

Bill (37) "An Act further to amend the Act respecting certificates to masters and mates of ships."—(Hon. Mr. Mills).

SAN JOSE SCALE BILL.

FIRST, SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (82.) "An Act to protect Canada against the introduction of the insect pest known as the San José scale."

The bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It appears that an insect known as the San José scale exists in several countries from which we occasionally import nursery stock. I am told when it attacks a plant it means destruction. The insect multiplies very rapidly, indeed by the million, and it is highly important that we should exclude any stock that is liable to be affected with this scale from Canada. It is well known that we import stock very largely, more particularly from the country south of us, and this pest has been found to exist there very extensively, and has already, I am sorry to say, been introduced into certain sections of Ontario. In the opinion of the Minister of Agriculture, it is highly important that prompt, active measures should be taken to prohibit absolutely the importation of stock that is likely to be affected by this scale in countries where it exists; and that is the object of the present bill. The countries are not named, but I believe the scale exists in Japan, the United States and one or two other countries. This is the season of the year when nurserymen are importing stock, and therefore, to be of any use this year, it is important that the bill should be passed promptly. I may say the House of Commons passed the bill through all its stages yesterday, and with the concurrence of the hon. leader of the opposition I would ask that this House adopt a similar principle and allow the bill to go through all its stages, as it is one of great urgency, and it has already got abroad that the government propose legislation of this kind, and there will be an attempt made to rush in nursery stock in advance of the bill obtaining the royal assent. I shall therefore ask the concurrence of the House to the passage of the bill to-day. I move, seconded by Mr. Mills, that rule forty-one of this House be suspended with regard to this bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not think that any one in the Senate will object to the motion that has been made by the hon. Secretary of State. This bill is of very great importance to the fruit-growing industries of this whole Dominion. Unfortunately, this step was not taken a year or two ago, but at that time I do not suppose any one conceived of the injury which was likely to follow the introduction of this insect into the country. I know that in the western and central parts of Ontario it has already commenced its destructive work. Whether we shall be able to stamp it out after this law has been placed on the statute-book and that which has been made law in the province of Ontario, I do not know, but we can only hope that it will have that effect. At the last session of the Ontario legislature they took the power to destroy the fruit trees in orchards where it had made its appearance, of course providing for a certain remuneration to the owners of the property, and for one, I congratulate the government on the step that they have taken in proposing to place such a bill as this on the statute-book to prevent the importation of the pest.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I cordially support this measure. It is a left-handed way of introducing protection. If he could discover a similar pest in all the articles we import from the United States and introduce legislation of this protective character, I should be very happy to give it my support. I say this on my own account, not being represented by any one on this side of the House.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I am heartily glad that the government have introduced this bill, for the evil is one which threatens very important consequences to the fruit industry of this country. Nearly a year ago I ventured to draw the attention of the government of Ontario to what was then going on in the introduction of this insect and the extent in which it was spreading in the Niagara peninsula, and the answer I received then was that although they had power to compel owners to destroy trees affected with black knot and one or two other diseases, they did not consider they had the power to compel the owners of the orchards affected by this San José scale to destroy the trees or to remunerate the owners in any way if the trees were destroyed; but at the close of the last session of the Ontario legislature I understand they did pass a bill. Of course we are liable to still further trouble from the pest by the introduction of stock from the infected districts of the United States. Owing to the frightful rapidity with which this San José scale multiplies it would very soon seriously affect most of the fruit growing portions of the country if steps are not taken to prevent its introduction. I am told that it not only affects fruit trees, but that it also affects ornamental trees.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am altogether in accord with the measure and I think parliament should expedite its passage by every means in its power. There is just one clause of the bill which I do not understand —the 6th. That provides :

6. The Governor in Council may from time to time, notwithstanding anything contained in this Act, permit the importation from any country or place to which this Act applies, of such nursery stock as is required for scientific purposes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I suppose that is with a view to finding the best remedy for the pest.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not know but there may be an element of danger in that. Unfortunately, it is not necessary to go to foreign countries for specimens of trees affected by the San José scale. If you open the door for the importation of trees for scientific purposes, it may be the means of introducing more of the pest into the country. I can see no necessity for admitting trees or shrubs in that way. However, there may be some good reason for the clause, that I do not appreciate, or have not yet heard of. The Department of Agriculture have very eminent and capable men as their advisers, and it may be all right. I do not know that this pest has extended beyond the province of Ontario. I have not heard of it yet in Prince Edward Island, and I do not think it has yet reached the maritime provinces. I suppose for local measures of protection dependence will have to be placed on the local legislatures. I hope they will not wait until the pest is amongst them before taking protective steps. I suppose this parliament can do nothing beyond preventing the importation.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Attention having been called to the subject I have no doubt the provinces will take good care to adopt any measures of prevention that may be practicable.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time at length at the table, and read the third time and passed.

DELAYED RETURNS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I should like to ask the hon. Minister of Justice about what time I may expect the returns I asked for a month ago. I had a notice on the paper of the question I wished to put, but the hon. gentleman said if I asked for the papers to be brought down the same object would be accomplished. It is a month now, and the papers have not been laid on the Table.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—To what papers does the hon. gentleman refer ?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I refer to the liquor permits of the North-west Territories and Yukon district, the number, to whom they were granted and the amounts and all the particulars connected with them.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will make the inquiry of the Minister of Interior and see that the papers are before us as soon as possible.

THE HART DIVORCE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN moved the adoption of the 5th report of the Standing Committee on Divorce on Bill (A) "An Act for the relief of Robert Augustus Baldwin Hart."

He said: Two unimportant amendments have been made since the bill was introduced, one in the date and the other in the number of the children. Copies of the evidence taken before the committee were distributed yesterday and I think the House will fully approve of the action of the committee in recommending the adoption of the preamble of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved the third reading of the bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the third time.

BILL ASSENTED TO.

A message was received from His Excellency the Governor General announcing that he would at 3.30 p.m. assent to the Bill passed by parliament at yesterday's sitting.

His Excellency the Right Honourable Sir John Campbell Hamilton-Gordon, Earl of Aberdeen; Viscount Formartine, Baron Haddo, Methlic, Tarves and Kellie, in the Peerage of Scotland; Viscount Gordon of Aberdeen, County of Aberdeen, in the Peerage of the United Kingdom; Baronet of Nova Scotia; Knight Grand Cross of Our Most Distinguished Order of St. Michael and St. George, &c., &c., Governor General of Canada, being seated in the Chair on the Throne,

The Honourable the Speaker commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to proceed to the House of Commons and acquaint that House,—"It is His Excellency's pleasure they attend him immediately in this House."

Who, being come with their Speaker,

The Clerk of the Crown in Chancery read the Title of the Bill to be passed, as follows:

An Act to protect Canada against the introduction of the insect pest known as the San José scale.

To this bill the Royal Assent was pronounced by the Clerk of the Senate in the words following:

In Her Majesty's name, His Excellency the Governor General doth assent to this Bill.

After which His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire, and the House of Commons withdrew.

DREDGING LEASES ON THE SASKATCHEWAN.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a Return of all dredging leases made by the government during the last eighteen months on the Saskatchewan River and its branches, also particulars of the parties to whom made, the rental to be paid and the amount paid, the extent of work, if any, done under same, together with the official reports, if any, which induced the government to grant said leases upon the terms contained therein.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Perhaps it might shorten the work and facilitate the bringing down of this return if the hon. gentleman did not ask for what was practically a copy of the leases. The names of the parties, the area, the amount to be paid, and the period for which the leases are to run is what the hon. gentleman really requires. If he obtains this information he would not desire copies of the leases, I suppose?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I do not require copies of the leases.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Simply all the important particulars?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes.

The motion was agreed to.

REPATRIATION OF THE HUNDRETH REGIMENT.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON moved

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, any correspondence that has taken place between the government and the home authorities re repatriation of the 100th Royal Canadian Regiment.

He said: Hon. gentlemen will recollect that a year ago numerous petitions, numbering, I think altogether some three hundred, from all parts of Canada, signed by all classes, by men in the highest authority in the land by military men and all classes generally, there has seldom been a more popular petition presented for any purpose. It was sent to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, after whom the regiment is called, &c., praying that the Royal Canadian Regiment, which was formed in 1858 and which has since been absorbed in the territorial system and its identity lost so far as being a Canadian Regiment is concerned, might be repatriated and that the depot might be established in Canada, so that the ranks of that regiment shall be filled with Canadians in the same way that ranks of Scotch regiments are filled with Scotchmen and the ranks of Irish regiments filled with Irishmen, and so on, that the two battalions might represent the territorial district of Canada for service abroad. Now that was presented a year ago and there does not seem to have been any advancement made upon the lines of the petition. I ask the government to-day what correspondence has taken place, and express the hope on behalf of the petitioners that some steps will be taken to satisfy the object of the petition. The depot of a regiment consists of two companies where recruits are trained before joining their regiments, and about 10 recruits per month or 60 every six months are necessary to keep up the ranks of a regiment. On no more appropriate occasion could this question be brought up, following as it does the Jubilee celebration of last year, and following, as it does, the determination of Great Britain to increase her effective forces by something like 23,000 men for the purpose of maintaining the prestige of the empire and enforcing what the British government believes is a necessity in the government of the world, and securing the co-operation of the nations in the betterment of the world's government. The opportunity, as I have said, is a good one now, to offer to supply one of the battalions with the recruits in order that Canadians, whether officers or men, may have an opportunity of performing service in the broad field of the British Empire, and sharing with the rest of the British Empire in the glory and renown that sheds such lustre upon so many names in the past history of the world. The British government has been liberal in giving commissions from our military college, and from the militia regiments, so that quite a number of officers from Canada are scattered throughout the British service. Now, hon. gentlemen, there is a very strong reason why the prayer of this petition should be granted by the British government, and there is every indication that the British government are quite in sympathy with the movement that was inaugurated by the petitioners for the repatriation of this regiment. The British government, apparently, have only been waiting for some disposition to be shown on the part of the Canadian government that they are in accord with the prayer of the petitioners. The history of the 100th Regiment is an exceedingly interesting one. There have, in the history of the British army, been six different 100th regiments, raised upon six different occasions, and they have been reduced and disbanded in consequence of the cessation of warfare or the reorganization of the service. The first regiment was raised in 1761 and was on active service for some three years and was disbanded. There was another regiment raised in 1784, and that served for a number of years and was disbanded. Then there was another regiment—the 100th Regiment was raised in 1795; it was raised by the Marquis of Huntley, son of the Duchess of Richmond, who was commissioned to raise a regiment, to be called the 100th. It was composed of Highlanders, and afterwards became the celebrated 92nd Gordon Highlanders which have taken such a famous position in the history of British arms. It was raised under some peculiar circumstances. It was at the commencement of the French war of that date, and the Marquis of Huntley did not succeed in getting the number of men that was necessary. His mother, the Duchess of Richmond, in her enthusiasm, herself went out among the farmers and people of Aberdeen and recruited the regiment on behalf of her son, three-fourths of whom came from the Highlands and one-fourth from the Lowlands of Aberdeen. In her tartan and Scotch bonnet she went over the whole county in her anxiety to see the ranks filled, and the story goes that one day in the market place she put a golden guinea between her lips and invited the men to come and take from her lips with their lips the golden guinea in order that the regiment might be recruited up to its strength; and when she died she wished to have it placed upon her monument that she recruited the regiment for the British service. As I have said, that is an interesting episode and the regiment was completed to eight hundred strong and went to Gibraltar for service at the time. The next regiment called the 100th was raised in 1805, and that is the regiment that came out here and served in Canada during the war of 1812 and 13. That regiment was raised in the county of Tipperary and the city of Dublin in 1805, and embarked for Canada in August, 1805. It had a rather disastrous commencement, because of the wrecking of two transports which were conveying parts of the regiment to Canada. The name of one transport was the "Æneas" and they were convoyed by H.M.S "Mercury." One of the transports with 350 on board was wrecked off Cape Ray, and all, with the exception of four of the soldiers, were lost. These four found their way the following spring to Quebec, where they rejoined the regiment and brought the news of the great disaster. A sister transport, conveying another portion of the regiment, was wrecked off the opposite coast of Cape Breton. So that at the start two transports, bringing out a very large portion of this regiment, were wrecked. None of the soldiers were lost by the second wreck. This regiment served with a great deal of distinction between 1805 and 1818, when it was disbanded. It took part in all the active operations of those days. It was stationed at one time at Ile aux Noix, and captured Plattsburg at Lake Champlain while it was stationed there. The history of that capture is an interesting one and I will just give you a short description of it, the history of which is in our archives. They were stationed at Isle aux Noix, and the Americans had a portion of the fleet they had built placed upon Lake Champlain. The design of Major Taylor, who was then in command of the 100th Regiment, was to try and capture the fleets and strike a blow at the enemy on Lake Champlain. The description goes on to say that:

> The Americans, with their usual foresight, had, soon after the commencement of the war, armed and equipped for the service of Lake Champlain, three sloops were a most valuable acquisition to us, and their loss occasioned a proportionate mortification to the Americans. These sloops had on board more cutlasses and more axes and boarding spikes than a British 18-gun brig of 121 men and 385 tons. The unfortunate possession of these sloops, named at first the "Broke" and the "Shannon," but subsequenlty altered to "Chubb" and "Finch," suggested the idea of sending against the American forts on the border of Lake Champlain a combined naval and military expedition. No seamen being, at the time, at Isle aux Noix, and none to be spared from Lake Ontario, the commander of Her Majesty's brig "Wasp," then lying at Quebec, gallantly volunteered with himself and crew, to man the two sloops and gun boats, and tried to pursuade Commodore McDonough at the head of this very superior force, to a struggle for the ascendancy on the lake.
> For the purpose of carrying into effect the intended operations along the shores, about one thousand officers and men of the thirteenth and one hundred regiments, under the command of Lieut.-Col. Murray, inspecting field officer of militia, embarked at Isle aux Noix on the 29th July in the Broke, Shannon, and three gun boats, and about forty bateaux provided for the purposes. The flotilla arrived the next day at the American town of Plattsburg, where the troops landed, and after frightening away by their looks about 400 militia, proceeded to fulfill the object of their mission. They burnt the State arsenal, Pikes, encampment, several blockhouses, the extensive barracks at Saranac (three miles off, capable of containing 4,000 troops), and every building of the United States between the latter place and Plattsburg. After performing this laborious task, the troops re-embarked, carrying away with them a quantity of naval stores, shot and equipment for a large number of bateaux. A party of the British next proceeded to Swanston, Vermont, near the head of Missisquoi Bay; there they also destroyed the barracks and public stores, as well as several bateaux lying at the wharf, and there re-embarked. Of two writers we have heard of from Burlington, distant 24 miles only from Plattsburg, one says: "We have not heard of any private property being destroyed, and our accounts are to a late hour last night." The other says: "They have done no injury to private property."

That is just a little interesting memento of the services of the 100th Regiment in that neighbourhood, the record of which is in our archives. They were afterwards transferred to another scene of action in the neighbourhood of Niagara, and there the 100th Regiment took the fort of Niagara and occupied it a year, from the 30th December, 1813, to the 14th of December, 1814. They were badly cut up at the battle of Chippawa, and their colonel, the Marquis of Tweedale, was wounded there. This brief sketch shows the part that the 100th Regiment of that day played in the history of Canada. After the war was over and peace was restored, in 1818, this 100th Regiment, following the fate of all the regiments of the same name, was disbanded, in Canada, at the same time as the Duke of Richmond came out here to be Governor General of Canada, with his son-in-law, Sir Perigrine Maitland. They were embarked in bateaux at Quebec, to come up the Ottawa here to be located as pioneer settlers of the country. The regiment came up as far as the Chaudière Falls, and there they cut a road through the woods and established their headquarters at Richmond, and the regiment which I am now speaking of, which had such an interesting history during that period, founded the great settlements that exist now in the counties of Lanark and Carleton. So that the 100th Regiment is closely associated with Canada, in so far as the regiment that was disbanded turned their swords into pruning hooks and founded the magnificent counties I have spoken of. Their descendants to-day are among the leading Canadians of our time. That is a very interesting phase of this particular question to show how identified they are with Canada. Then we come down to the time of the Crimean war. Offers were made by officers in Canada to raise a regiment during that war, but the proposition was not deemed expedient at the time, especially as the Crimean war was drawing to a close. At the end of 1857, the British government accepted an offer to raise a regiment in Canada during the Indian mutiny, fearing, perhaps, that they might have a prolonged struggle in maintaining the supremacy of British power in that country. That regiment was raised forty years ago. The recruiting commenced in March, 1858, exactly forty years ago this month. I had the honour of receiving the commission of ensign in that regiment, and I raised forty men in my neighbourhood—back of Port Hope, out in Lindsay, and that direction. The regiment was raised in this way : The major had to raise 200 men. He was Major Dunn, son of a former Receiver General of Canada, who had won the Victoria Cross at the age of 20 in the Balaklava charge. He afterwards became colonel of the regiment, and in 1868 lost his life in the Abyssinian campaign. There were six commissions as captain given, and they had to raise eighty men. There were seven lieutenancies, and each lieutenant had to raise forty men. In that way the regiment was raised in a very short space of time in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and in July it was formed in Quebec. There it received its first drill, and was uniformed in the old coatees of the days of the Peninsular war, from old stores which had been sent out here and had been lying at Quebec some forty or fifty years. When we arrived in London, that was the uniform that we were arrayed in—the old coatees of forty or fifty years previously. The regiment was 1,240 strong, and, after being drilled by non-commissioned officers of the Guards, we went to Aldershot, and thence to the Mediterranean. We served there some time, and then came to Canada and served a couple of years here; then went to England, and, after having served there for some time, the regiment was sent to India. In the course of time it became the policy of the British government to do away with the numbers of the regiments and to assign them to what is called territorial districts and to unite two battalions together in the territory, and also link with it one or two militia battalions raised in the same district; so that each district had its territorial complement of about four battalions, two of them active service battalions and the other militia battalions. When that was done the identity of the regiment was lost. It ceased to be called the 100th Royal Canadian Regiment, but linked with the 109th, a regiment that was raised by the East India Company, and they became known as the 1st and 2nd Leinster Regiment. One of the officers was Captain Smythe, from the neighbourhood of Brockville, and as a major of the regiment he fought very hard indeed and was able to retain the name of the Royal Canadians in the title of the regiment although it was known as the 2nd Leinster. This territorial system, as I said before, is confined to the British Isles. There is a disposition on the part of the British government to extend that territorial system to all parts of the British Empire—at least the self-governing portions of the British Empire—so as to identify the services that are raised for the defence of Canada, Australia and South Africa with the British army in its role, and the object of the petitioners is to endeavour by such means as they took, to have the territorial system established in Canada, and to have the 100th Regiment recruited from Canada, so as to have a distinctive Canadian regiment in the British service in the same way as exists now in the British Isles. The following is from the Morning Post and gives a suggestion on the subject of giving back to Canada our old regiment, after alluding to the letter of the Secretary of State for War from the "Service" members of the House of Commons. It says:

On the other hand we are heartily in accord with the service members in the new points which they are trying to impress on Lord Lansdowne as being necessary to the efficiency of the army. As they point out in their letter: "We cannot perceive that the disadvantages of the present system will in any sense be diminished by the substitution of 4-battalion for 2-battalion regiments." Indeed if the "linking system" of territorial regiments must be continued, it would most certainly be a distinct gain to create new double-battalion regiments for new territories, and one of the most popular of such regiments would be one which could easily be formed by splitting the present Leinster regiment into its component parts of the old 100th (Royal Canadians) and 109th, and by giving back the 100th to Canada and raising another battalion in that country; and by adding another battalion to the 109th, reinstating the Leinster regiment as a double-battalion, Irish territorial regiment. Some of the new regiments might also be raised in Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa, to the great and lasting advantage of the Empire.

That is a policy which will meet with favour in the mother country when the question is brought before the British government. Before these petitions were presented there was a letter written and a petition sent from the city council of the city of Toronto, asking that a recruiting depot should be formed, or replaced where it once existed when the regiment was first formed, and there has been some correspondence in regard to that matter. The reply that was received has been published, and I obtained it from the Canadian Militia Gazette, and it reads as follows:—

The movement set on foot by the way of a petition to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, signed by many of the leading citizens of Canada, as well as by municipal corporations, for the repatriation of the old 100th Royal Canadian Regiment, was followed by a resolution passed by the City Council, Toronto, asking the Imperial authorities to locate the territorial district at Toronto. This resolution having been forwarded through the Governor General, the following despatch in reply has been received:—

WAR OFFICE, LONDON, S.W.,
3rd November, 1896.

SIR,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 29th July last, forwarding a copy of a despatch from the Governor General of Canada, dated 8th July, together with a petition from the corporation of Toronto, praying that the name of the 100th or Prince of Wales's Regiment, may be restored, and that a depot of the regiment may be established in Toronto.

I am directed to inform you that these suggestions have been carefully examined, and that the Secretary of State for War and the Commander-in-Chief are prepared to give favourable consideration to any proposals which may tend to foster the connection between the regular army and the military forces in Canada, and to further cement the strong feeling of sympathy already existing between the mother country and the Dominion.

The Marquis of Lansdowne observes, however, that in forwarding the petition from the Corporation of Toronto, the Governor General of Canada had expressed no opinion thereon, nor is there anything in the correspondence to show whether the proposal is one which has the support either of the Provincial or the Dominion Government.

Before any further action is taken it would in Lord Lansdowne's opinion, be desirable to ascertain whether the proposal may be taken as representing the wishes of the Canadian people generally, and whether the Canadian Government concur in the views set forth in the petition and would be prepared to give them practical support.

Such support might take the form of providing barrack accommodation, medical attendance and facilities for commissariat arrangements, in the event of its being found practicable to establish a recruiting depot at Toronto, which measure, Lord Lansdowne is advised would be the best tentative and preliminary step in the direction desired by the petitioners and might, if successful, be followed by the restoration of the title of Royal Canadian and the affiliation of the two battalions of Canadian Militia to a regiment recruited entirely from Canada.

I have, &c., &c.,

(Signed.) G. LAWSON.

The Honourable, the Secretary of State, Colonial Office.

The Right Honourable Mr. Chamberlain, Secretary of State for the Colonies, under date of October 14, 1897, writes to Lord Aberdeen, asking him if the Canadian Government had furnished him with an expression of their views on the proposal that a depot of the Leinster Regiment should be established at Toronto. The Secretary of the Militia Department, Ottawa, under date December 9th, asks the Mayor of Toronto, to let him know for the information of the Minister of Militia, what answer can be given on behalf of the city of Toronto. The mayor will bring the matter before the council, but it is unlikely that any definite result will follow until after the municipal elections.

This shows a part of the correspondence that has been passing; to ascertain to what extent it has been lengthened out is the object of my inquiry at the present moment. The question of recruiting in Canada is one that should be favourably received by our government. In this very 100th Regiment that was raised forty years ago was a non-commissioned officer named Eli Clarke, who was enlisted in London, Ontario, at the time the regiment was raised. Eli Clarke served with distinction for 30 years and has now six sons in the same regiment, all occupying positions in the non-commissioned rank. One has served 12 years, another six, another five, and so on down to the youngest son. That of itself, shows the affection, at any rate, that that family have for the British service and the respect which they hold towards it. The pictures of Mr. and Mrs. Clarke and the six sons were published in the Graphic, and they are as fine and handsome a family as could be desired. There is no reason in the world why the advantage of a position in the Imperial service should be withheld from any of those in Canada who desire to occupy it. A great many people might say we are trying to get immigration into this country, and we should not drain the country of its population, but the class of men who go into the British service are military men at heart. Their desire for the life has been inherited from their forefathers. Canada has been largely recruited and settled in its pioneer days by half-pay officers and pensioners sent out and located here. Some 500 or 600 of this very regiment were the pioneers of this eastern district of Ontario, and the United Empire Loyalists are a very large percentage of the people, and all of these have military instincts. They desired to have the honour of serving Her Majesty under her colours, and their ambition is stirred to accomplish that result. The fine militia battalions we possess and the esprit de corps which is a distinguishing feature of them, is the best evidence of how our young men take to the military training. General Gascoigne has also been forwarding his policy of an interchange of service between our permanent companies and the companies of British regiments. We ought not to withhold the privilege from our Canadian people, so far as they are desirous of having facilities placed in their way to enable them to take service under the British flag in the broad field of the British Empire. It is impossible for them, at present, to do so unless they go to considerable expense themselves. I would impress upon our government the desirability of placing this benefit that the British government is apparently quite willing to afford to Canadians, of taking part in the broad field that the British Empire offers, of giving to Canada an opportunity of sharing in the honour and glory of the vast field which has been opened out through so many centuries by service under the British flag I earnestly express the hope that the government will give every consideration to that particular phase of the matter. With regard to the regiment, one of the battalions, half of which was the old 100th, has been transferred to Halifax within the last few months to relieve the Berkshire Regiment which has been stationed there for some time, so that the movement has already begun, so far as the British Government is concerned, in meeting the views of the petitioners to that extent; but when it comes to the extent of recruiting and making a recruiting depot here, naturally the British Government says "We think that the Canadian people should contribute somewhat to the expense of maintaining a regiment, not so much for the sake of the money value, but to show the desire of the people of Canada to share in the expenses of maintaining the defensive forces of the British Empire." I think it is a great advantage to Canadians that we have the privilege of lending our aid not only of men but also of materials, as an integral part of the empire in maintaining its prestige. We want that to be thoroughly recognized by the British government, which they are quite prepared to recognize. We want to assume the responsibility ourselves. We are not able to contribute a large sum, and Sir Wilfrid Lawson's letter suggested the advisability of providing barrack accommodation and medical attendance. Those are but small items, even if they would cost us anything. Whether we have barrack accommodation above what is required for our own militia is a question that I cannot answer, but if it should necessitate the construction of some additional barrack accommodation that should be no obstacle in the way of carrying out the wishes and the very proper desires that are expressed through the petition. Nepean Point here, or the Garrison Common, Toronto, would either of them be suitable sites for the purpose, or the Citadel at Quebec. The object I have in view is now to bring this question up and place before the government the views that I am advancing. It is our interest in every way and by every means in our power to support the British government in the fight that they are making all over the world in order to carry out the destiny that has evidently fallen to the lot of those who stand at the back of the British Empire. They are building a road right through the heart of Africa from Cairo to Cape Town. That is a marvellous thing. They had first of all to overcome the wild tribes, where industry is at its very lowest ebb, where slavery is one of the active forces to be met—a land which is kept apart from the rest of the world for want of transportation facilities that our civilization to-day affords. The native forces are utilized in the great work and under Imperial officers are advancing from the north and from the south, and when that railway is completed they will have accomplished a great thing for the benefit of the world. That great engineering work performed by one nation is on a par with the efforts put forth by this small Canada of ours with its five million people, in constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway, but that was done through an uninhabited country or a country inhabited with a peaceable population. The African railway is advancing in the face of hostile tribes and in the face of all the difficulties that are found in that savage country, and when the line is built it will be open to everybody for trade, open to every country in the world, and all will have the same advantages that the British people themselves possess, with protection to life and property insured. Then, again, look at the great efforts put forth by the British government in the East to keep China open for the trade of the world, not to allow Russia or any other country to seize large slices of China and exclude the rest of the world from it, not to allow one nation of the world to close the doors of China and govern it according to their own individual ideas; England says the doors of China must be kept open to the whole world and for the benefit of China herself. Now, that is a noble policy for any nation to lay down. It is pursued in the interest of peace, for it is only when people are seizing and grasping for their own selfish desires that war ensues. Therefore, in supporting Great Britain in the effort she is putting forth to-day, occupying so wide a field in the eyes of the world to-day, we are fighting, not for the agression, not for selfish objects, but fighting to ensure the peace of the world, and under wiser and better counsels bringing that about more gradually. It is a great privilege for Canada to be able to take her share and indentify herself with Great Britain and say we are part of the great Empire. California and Florida are able to say, "we are part of the United States, a nation of 70,000,000 people." Canada by herself, throwing off her allegiance to the British Empire, and striving to govern this vast country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, with five millions of people, would very soon find her efforts thwarted if she had not the power of the British Empire to protect her from aggression perhaps, on our Pacific coast, perhaps on our Atlantic coast, perhaps aggression along the boundary line from the Atlantic to the Pacific. When we, as Canadians, are able to say we are part of, and no mean part of, an empire of 350 or 450 millions, then there is something to broaden our minds and guarantee us peaceful progress; we have no right to put upon the shoulders of Great Britain the entire responsibility of maintaining a defensive force for our benefit as well as for their own. There is not one solitary advantage gained by the British government in all the efforts they put forth that we do not share to the fullest extent. I have a book here on imperial defence, edited by Sir Geo. Clarke, an officer who is very distinguished, and I think ranks with Capt. Mahon as a contemporary writer on defensive forces, and I just wish to show from it the aggregate marine tonnage of the British Empire and the comparative expenditure upon its defence. It is computed only upon vessels of 100 tons and upwards :—

Country.	Aggregate tonnage mercantile marine (vessels, 100 tons and upwards).	Aggregate annual naval expenditure.
	Tons.	$
United Kingdom.....	12,117,957	81,640,585
India.....	50,745	4,760,000
Self-governing Colonies.	937,476	1,101,080

Comparing the above figures with the tonnage and expenditure of other nations we have :

	Tonnage.	$
United States	*994,675	25,366,825
France	1,094,752	54,125,200
Germany.....	1,886,812	21,590,625
Russia.....	487,681	25,572,845

*Sea borne tonnage only.

These figures speak for themselves. The tonnage is 937,476, the expenditure $1,101,080.

The aggregate naval expenditure by the United Kingdom is $81,640,585; by India, $4,760,000; while the self-governing colonies contribute $1,101,080. That will give you a very clear idea of the proportion of the self-governing colonies together are bearing towards the naval defence, that is to say, that where England has been spending about $6 or $6.50 a ton in naval defence we don't spend one dollar a ton. They are bearing the burden of protecting the seaborne trade of the British Empire to the extent of nearly seven times as much as the self-governing colonies are contributing upon the comparative ownership of tonnage, while measured by moneys' worth it is seventy-five times as much. While we cannot do any thing more than our financial ability will permit us to do, we can show a disposition, such as is sketched in the correspondence brought before you, to do our best by accepting the opportunity that the British government is apparently willing to give to us in regard to the repatriation of the 100th Regiment and provide barrack accommodation and medical attendance or whatever may be agreed upon by correspondence between the two governments. I do not know that it is necessary to prolong my remarks so much as to test the patience of hon. gentlemen, although I am quite satisfied that the question I am debating has their fullest sympathy, and that there is no more loyal or patriotic body of men who are responsible for the good government of the country and who have a like experience behind them to guide them, than this honourable Senate of Canada.

I ask your privilege to allow me to embody in my remarks here a more complete record of the Jubilee contingent which went to England last year. I referred to it for a short time in my speech on the address, but it is a theme that cannot be too much dwelt upon when it is fresh in the minds of the people of the British Empire. I prepared it in manuscript with the view of embodying it with a list of the names of the whole contingent and some other data to be preserved as a memento of a month's service among the colonial forces of the British Empire, and which I hope might be accomplished for the benefit of the men who were desirous of preserving a record of their services together. If the hon. gentleman will permit me to so far transgress the rules of the House as to embody it in my remarks that the record may be preserved in our Hansard, I will not task your patience by reading it. It is as follows: In order that every officer, non-commissioned officer and man doing duty with the Imperial colonial contingent in Chelsea barracks, either in its organization or discipline, might have a memento of his service and the corps he served with, the nominal roll of the whole contingent force has been printed, with a short account of the occasion which brought them together. It will serve as a record of his participation in one of the most remarkable military gatherings of the nineteenth, or, perhaps any century, when contingents representing the outlying forces of the British empire, drawn from all parts of the world, came to honour the noblest sovereign that has ever occupied the British throne. By so doing, they perform the graceful and patriotic act of laying the voluntary submission of the government that sent them to the British constitution, of which Queen Victoria has been the constitutional head for the space of sixty years. At the same time that the colonial governments were represented by the defensive force of their respective countries, the premiers of the self-governing colonies assembled as the invited guests of the British government to honour Her Gracious Majesty by their presence at the Diamond Jubilee of Her reign—the golden jubilee, commemorating the fiftieth year of Her Majesty's reign, was held in 1887. During the succeeding ten years, the spirit which is to-day moving the hearts and minds of British subjects has broadened. To be a citizen or a soldier of the great empire which is assuming more definite shape as decade after decade passes by is now a proud title. The unanimity of sentiment displayed by all classes and nationalities assembled in the heart of the empire bore ample witness to that spirit. The contingent forces began to assemble in May in Chelsea barracks and their number was completed by the arrival of the Canadian contingent on the night of the 15th of June, they were met at Euston station by General Lord Methuen, Colonel Ivor Herbert and Colonel Ward of the army transport corps, with the fife and drum band of the Grenadier Guards. The pipers of the Coldstreams and drum and fife band of the 13th Middlesex Volunteer regiment who accompanied them on their march of four miles from Euston station to Chelsea barracks. Chelsea barracks is an adjunct of Chelsea hospital, the home of Britain's aged soldiers to the number of 500. Chelsea hospital was completed in 1695 under the architecture of Sir Christopher Wren, and has remained without change a monument of the solicitude the English people have always shown for the men who have helped to make their name great. The governor is Field Marshal Sir Donald Stewart, and the Deputy Governor is General Charles Robinson, a Canadian from Toronto. The chapel is the repository for some of the flags and ensigns representing British victories of the past, and portraits of celebrated officers are preserved in its precincts.

In their interior economy the contingent force came under the command of General Lord Methuen, of the Guards, who commands the Home district. For discipline they were placed under the command of Colonel Ivor Herbert, who commanded the militia of Canada for several years, Colonel the Hon. Matthew Aylmer, Adjutant General of the Canadian militia, who came over in command of the Canadian contingent, being appointed on their staff; Lt.-Col. Ward, of the army service corps, acting as Quartermaster General, Colonel Mason, of the Grenadiers of Toronto, Canada, being appointed to command the infantry of the whole force, and Colonel McInnis of Australia, to the command of the cavalry. On official parades and inspections Field Marshal Lord Roberts took command of the whole of the colonial forces.

The troops were sent at the expense of the several governments to which they belonged, barrack accommodation and the most liberal rations being supplied by the British government, as well as all transport and seat accommodation for the various reviews, etc., which they witnessed. An officers' mess for all the officers was established in the gymnasium of the barracks, under the presidency of Capt. Matthews of the army transport corps. Horses were supplied for the use of the mounted officers and men, with the exception of the Canadian Mounted Police and Australian corps, and a corps from Cyprus, who brought theirs with them. The important parade for which all the troops met together was to form an escort to Her Gracious Majesty the Queen, to St. Paul's Cathedral, on the 22nd of June, where, on the 60th anniversary of her accession to the throne, she offered her thankfulness to the Almighty for the blessings vouchsafed to the people she ruled over during her long reign.

On the 10th of June, the day after the arrival of the Canadian contingent, the whole force paraded on the barrack square. Previous to the arrival of the Canadian contingent the Duke of Connaught inspected the force that had assembled. An invitation was sent to attend a smoking concert in the evening given by the Victoria and St. George Rifles at which Lord Roberts was present. On the 17th there was no parade, to allow officers and men to attend the Ascot races cup day, His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales's horse Persimmon won Her Majesty's cup and 4,000 guineas. The Guards Club invited the officers to luncheon in their marquee which was a most hospitable entertainment. On the 18th there was a march out of all the colonial troops five or six miles through London, inspected by Lord Roberts —Conversazione at Royal Colonial Institute in the evening, smoking concert of London Scottish same evening, Colonel Balfour in the chair. On the 19th parade at 9 a.m. Infantry marched to Battersea park and practised halting on the street—mounted troops marched out and joined a brigade of Cavalry and Royal Horse Artillery to march through the streets in the east end of London where they formed a procession for that part of London which was beyond the official route marked out for the procession of the Queen and royal family on the 22nd of June or Jubilee day. On Sunday the 20th the troops attended church parade at their various churches ; at Chelsea hospital an inspection of the corps of commissionaries was held and they attended an open air service. This corps was organized by Sir P. E. Walters, a brother of the late Mr. Walters of the Times. He still commands it. It consists of discharged soldiers to the number of 2,300 who are all found to be trustworthy employees all over London in various clubs, mercantile establishments, etc., a most honourable corps. Though meeting occasionally for military inspection they form a co-operative society among themselves, subject to the rules and regulations they themselves impose for their effective discipline and government. On Sunday evening Lord Methuen entertained a large number of the officers to dinner. On Monday the 21st, parade. The mounted force marched to the Thames embankment, and took up the position they were to occupy on the following day in front of the Hotel Cecil where they were to be joined by the premiers of the Colonial governments in leading off the procession. On the morning of the 22nd they paraded at 7 a. m. to take their part in the escort which was accompany Her Majesty the Queen to St. Paul's Cathedral. A Guard of honour was furnished by the contingent under the command of Colonel Lassiten, Captain Fleming commanded the Canadian portion and they marched off separately. The force formed upon the Thames embankment at 8 o'clock as previously laid out, Canada being the senior colony led the procession with Lord Roberts at the head preceded by the band of the Life Guards, immediately behind Lord Roberts and Col. Herbert rode the unattached officers who came over with the contingents. The carriages of the colonial premiers formed up in the rear of each of their contingent forces, and at 8.30, the colonial force moved off for Buckingham Palace, passing under the archway of the Horse Guards through St. James Park, past the palace on to Piccadilly through St. James St. past St. James Palace the residence of the Duke of Connaught and Marlborough House the residence of the Prince of Wales, down Pall Mall, through Trafalgar Square and the Strand to St. Paul's, where at 12.30 o'clock a service was held in the open air by the Archbishop of Canterbury on the steps of St. Paul's, supported by the bishops and clergy of every denomination at home and abroad. The colonial force was drawn up in front and around St. Paul's, and after the impressive service which lasted about twenty minutes, the procession changed its formation and the British troops led upon the homeward journey. The state carriages containing members of the royal family followed by the Queen in her state carriage with whom was seated the Princess of Wales and the Princess Christian, all passed in front of the colonial force. Their Royal Highnesses, the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Connaught, rode beside the royal carriage which was led by the commander in chief Field Marshal Lord Wolseley who looked remarkably well. He was preceded by a brilliant staff of foreign officers, princes and officers of Her Majesty's Indian empire, the Lord Mayor of London, &c. After the Queen's state carriage had passed, the colonial forces took up their positions in rear of the procession led by Lord Roberts with unattached officers from various colonies at the head followed by the mounted troops and infantry, the Canadian Mounted Police closing the rear of the great procession. In this order the procession returned to Buckingham Palace, crossing London Bridge to the Surrey side and recrossing on Westminster bridge. Every one who marched in that memoral procession can never forget the multitude of faces they passed by for six miles. Loyalty, enthusiasm and good humour being the chief characteristics. Floral and other decorations with appropriate mottoes expressive of the occasion were visible everywhere, which with the seating accommodation in every available space and the crowds that lined the pavement made a most picturesque tout ensemble. Some 48,500 troops composed of British regiments, militia regiments and volunteer corps lined the route in single rank, supported in rear by members of the police force. From start to finish there was not a hitch in the proceedings which governed the march of the procession, no accidents and no confusion. The movement of the procession was governed by bugle sound from the rear, and it was signalled by signal men from the tops of houses so that through the heart of the great city the movement of the procession was governed as one man. The Duke of Connaught assisted by General Lord Methuen in command of the home district, and other officers were the official heads who planned and guided its movements. There could be only one impression formed during the stay of the colonial force in London, and that was, that the principles of government had reached its highest development in the government of the five or six million people within such a narrow sphere, with a cordial assent by the people both rich and poor to be controlled by the governing forces whose rule of conduct is "liberty without license." The Queen, as she stepped into her state carriage at Buckingham Palace, handed for publication a loving message to her subjects throughout the British empire. At the gate of Buckingham Palace one of the chief electricians had an instrument, and as she put her foot on the step of her carriage, she pressed a button, and immediately to every centre in her extended British Empire, her message was sent, and in some cases upon her return to the palace replies were awaiting her.

Although at the advanced age of 78 Her Majesty bore the fatigue of the procession well. Her carriage was an open one, and she was seen to the best advantage by the populace, who received her with loud acclamations. The colonial premiers of their respective governments and the various contingent forces were regarded with almost as much interest as Her Majesty. Their physique, their discipline, the variety of their uniforms, their carriage with just sufficient rivalry among themselves to please, showed them off to the best advantage, and they were all heartily received as friends and comrades by the spectators of the great procession, a portion of which was reflected by their commander, Field Marshal Lord Roberts, who led them on his Arab pony that had carried him on his celebrated march to Kandahar. The force combined great varieties of picturesque uniforms and every shade of facial colour was represented in all its gradations, from the blackest ebony of the equator to the fair sons of the north and south, all standing shoulder to shoulder in the same cause, "Our Queen and Empire."

Officers and men were under arms and on the march for nine hours, those who lined the route, probably having the most fatiguing duty. The morning was cloudy, but a little before noon the sun shone out in all its warmth and brightness, and Queen's weather was maintained on this brightest of all Her Majesty's reign.

In the evening Lord Methuen entertained a large number of the colonial officers to dinner and with him after dinner every one turned out to view the illuminations. The streets were thronged till an early hour of the morning, no vehicles were permitted and the whole of the great London thoroughfares through which the route of the procession passed was alive with human nature in its merriest mood. The decorations were exceedingly good and lighted up were shown to the best advantage. On Wednesday the 23rd, parade was in order for 6.45 to be inspected by the commander in chief, Field Marshall Lord Wolseley, in Hyde Park, who was accompanied by a large staff. After a general salute, Lord Wolseley with Lord Roberts and Colonel Herbert rode down the ranks, the band of the Grenadier Guards, who oftimes gave their services to the colonial force played for us. After the inspection the troops marched past, and the officers were then called to the front and addressed by the commander in chief who complimented the force upon its soldierly bearing and good marching, and made especial reference to Canadians with whom he had been closely allied in his past services, especially in the Red River expedition which he commanded in 1890. Lady Brassey invited the officers on this day to an entertainment at Normanhurst Court Battle to meet the colonial premiers, but the commander in chief's inspection prevented their attending. In the evening Albani invited the force to a special concert at Albert Hall. On the 24th an invitation was sent by the Maxim Nordenfeld Company to visit the Einsford ranges. The whole force paraded and took the train at 11 o'clock, tickets being provided by the company and a most hospitable repast was provided for both officers and men. An interesting afternoon was spent inspecting the works and witnessing the shooting of the rapid firing guns. The men returned to barracks in the evening greatly pleased with their day's visit and the kindness and attention of the Nordenfeld Company for the instructive day. The managers of the theatres sent invitations to the colonial troops to attend, so that all who desired could enjoy themselves to their hearts' content in the field of tragedy or comedy. On the 25th the Canadian contingent paraded at 11 a. m. to receive the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Premier of Canada, and the High Commissioner, Sir Donald A. Smith. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, notwithstanding the round of visits he had paid to some of the chief centres in Great Britain, the hospitable welcome he had received and the number of speeches he had made, looked remarkably well. He made a close inspection of the force, and afterwards called the officers and men to the front and complimented them upon the excellent appearance they had made everywhere, and the credit they reflected upon Canada. Photographers were our most constant visitors during our stay, and it was not their fault if groups were not taken of this most memorable gathering.

On the 26th parade was ordered for 4.30 a.m. to take the train for Portsmouth to witness the naval review, eleven officers in command with the colonial troops. The remainder of the officers went at 8.30 from Waterloo station, the troops were hospitably entertained to breakfast by the Admiralty, after embarking on the "Kohinoor," an excellent dinner was also served at one o'clock. They were conveyed to their anchorage through the British fleet that lay anchored in column of ships to the number of 200 awaiting the inspection of the fleet by His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, on the "Victoria and Albert." The officers of the contingent embarked at 12 o'clock on the "Dunera," which was placed at their disposal and the disposal of the representatives of the press by the government. A few of the officers were invited to witness the review from the "Campania" by the Right Honourable Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, upon which were the members of the House of Lords and Commons. Of the 200 vessels at anchor 165 were British ships of war. Foreign nations were represented by one line of battleship each. Here was seen the latest modern improvements up to date of naval architecture and armament, in which England leads the way in the essential points. The great crowds who witnessed the magnificent spectacle could not but be impressed with the advance in sea power made by the British government in the last decade. Notwithstanding the powerful fleet at British stations throughout the world which remain at their posts, the admiralty were able to muster for inspection 165 ships of war with their crews, from the most powerful line of battleships down to the swift torpedo boats seen ploughing the water at the rate of 25 miles an hour. They were all decked out in their holiday bunting from stem to stern. At 2.30 o'clock the "Royal Salute" boomed out as the Prince of Wales left Southampton with his escort of steamships, and when he reached the fleet the "Royal Salute" belched forth again from the noble array of vessels, and the yards were manned by the seamen, or rather such yards as the modern Leviathans are now enabled to display. In the evening a display of fireworks lightened up the heavens in a manner that can only be rendered with the same effect by such a fleet. A heavy thunderstorm at 6 o'clock brought into being by the artillery of the afternoon damped the ardour of a number of the sight-seers, and this magnificent part of the programme was missed by many, although the thunder storm appeared to be but the echo of the god of war and did not last longer than the earthly cannonade had done. The troops returned to Victoria station well satisfied with the new sensation presented to them by the splendid spectacle of naval power, and the attention they had received from the Admiralty upon their visit. On Sunday, the 27th, church parade. Monday, the 28th, was fine though warm. Parade was ordered at 9 a.m., but dismissed and the men had the rest of the day to themselves. The social event of the day was Her Majesty's garden party at Buckingham Palace for which the Queen returned from Windsor Castle to attend. With all the members of the royal family a most brilliant gathering of the English nobility and London society was entertained. Invitations were issued to the officers of the contingent who were members of their respective colonial parliaments and others who had recorded their names in Her Majesty's visitors' book at the palace. The crowds around the palace gates and leading thoroughfare showed the interest taken by the public in Her Majesty's entertainment. On Tuesday, the 29th, there was no parade and the men had the day to themselves. In the afternoon the commander in chief held a levee at the Horse Guards at 3 o'clock, which the officers attended in uniform, and to whom each officer was individually presented and had a private interview. In the evening the High Commissioner of Canada, Lord Strathcona, issued invitations to a large dinner party at which guests sat down to the number of 350 at the Hotel Cecil. He was supported by the Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier on his right and the Marquees of Lorne on his left. Lord Mountstephen, Archbishop Machray, Primate of Canada, Field Marshal Sir Donald Stewart, Admiral McClintock, the Hon. Edward Blake and a number of other distinguished officers and men were present. At 11 o'clock a number of the officers left to attend an "at home" of the Marchioness of Lansdowne, to which all had been invited. The streets of London at one of these great receptions of London's nobility are a sight, the concentration of such a large number of private carriages with their brilliant lamps, splendid horses and equipment and gaily dressed occupants waiting for an opportunity to alight, create a tout ensemble intermingled with the ordinary traffic the like of which it is difficult to imagine, though all controlled by the police in a remarkable manner. On Wednesday the 30th parade at 7.15, an invitation had been extended by the Right Honourable Joseph Chamberlain, Colonial Secretary, to the whole colonial force to visit the dock yards at Portsmouth and also to inspect the great battleships. Upon arrival at Portsmouth they were entertained by the mayor and citizens of Portsmouth in a most hospitable manner to a banquet, and upon their return from inspecting the ships they were entertained to supper. They were divided up into sections and conveyed by steam launches to the various ships, where every opportunity was afforded by the naval officers to inspect the men of war and their armaments. In the evening Mrs. Chamberlain had issued invitations to a reception to meet the Prince and Princess of Wales, which was another of those large social events that attracts London society in very large numbers, and Piccadilly shone like stars with the numerous carriage lamps. The floral decorations in the reception rooms were magnificent and the guests numerous to do honour to the occasion. On Thursday, the 1st of July, parade at 7.45 to attend the military review at Aldershot for the inspection of the Queen. The colonial troops entrained at Nine Elms station, and arrived at Aldershot, and their train was put into a siding, behind the commissariat department. They were met at the station by His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught, and marched, headed by the band of the Rifle Brigade, the Artillery band, and one of the militia bands. The cavalry were attached to the 3rd King's Dragoon Guards and Hussars, and the infantry were attached to the Rifle Brigade, Royal Engineers' regiment, &c., where the officers and men were hospitably entertained at the various regimental messes. The arrangements for the review were very complete, those who received tickets for seats at the grand stand, went down at 1 o'clock from the Waterloo station, and all the passengers were met by the wagons of the Army Service corps and conveyed to the review grounds, where light refreshments were provided. All the troops, including the colonial contingents, for review mustered on Laffan's Plain at 2 o'clock. The Queen's carriage with four grays and outriders followed by the other state carriages took up their position at the saluting point at three o'clock. Her Majesty was received with a royal salute of artillery upon leaving the special train which conveyed her to Aldershot and upon arriving upon the ground she was met with a royal salute by the troops under the command of the Duke of Connaught, the bands massed, playing God save the Queen. A brilliant staff of foreign officers took up their position in the rear of the Queen's carriage. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales took up his position, and as colonel, marched past at the head of his regiment, the 10th Hussars. The Duke of Cambridge also once more fell into the ranks as colonel of his regiment to salute Her Majesty—the Queen must have been a proud woman as well as a proud sovereign to see her sons and her grandson, the Duke of York and all the members of Her Royal family surrounding her and filling their station with such honour to themselves in the ranks of her service, both civil and military. The review was a grand sight, and numbered 27,500 on the parade state. Seven battalions of the Guards were present which is an unusual muster of these celebrated troops. The place of honour in the march past was accorded the colonial force which acquitted itself with credit. The Canadian mounted troops leading the mounted, and the Canadians again leading the infantry, the two wings of the colonial force was divided in two. The Canadian troops have adopted the uniforms of the British service in their dress regulations both in cavalry, artillery, engineers and infantry. The Australians were all neatly uniformed in brown, with felt hats turned up on one side; in that way they were better distinguished by their dress, otherwise the Canadian uniforms were the favourites. The Cape mounted rifles, in their rifle dress, were very smart, and were a counterpart of the Canadian Mounted Police in scarlet. The physique of the whole force was excellent. The eastern native corps were uniformed more in accordance with eastern customs, and the Sikhs were fine soldierly men. Sierre Leone, the West Indies, Hong Kong, and the numerous outlying spots on the face of the earth where the British flag waves, were all represented in filing past Her Majesty, their hearts all swelling with pride that in the historic military camp of Aldershot they could take their place as members of a great imperial force coming into existence, as Britain's world-wide interests grew and developed under the fostering influence of the British constitution. After the brigades had marched past in open column, with their massed bands leading them, the cavalry then galloped past, and the infantry returned in quarter column. The whole great line of columns then advanced in review order to Her Majesty's carriage. The Duke of Connaught, who commanded the Aldershot camp, gave the word: "Prepare to give three cheers for the Queen!" and a wave of hearty British cheers went down the line as the order was issued from right to left, bands playing the national anthem.

After this last royal salute, the Queen took her departure with her escort, receiving an ovation from the troops as she passed down the line in front of them, which did not cease until her carriage had disappeared from sight. The colonial force returned to Chelsea barracks by train. The Army Service corps in full force conveyed the guests at the grand stand back to Aldershot station, and the precision of arrangements in carrying out all the great events of the Jubilee was thoroughly exemplified on this occasion in the conveyance and management of the large crowds, and the movement of the troops. In the evening there was a reception at the Imperial Institute in London by the High Commissioner for Canada, Sir Donald and Lady Smith, now Lord Strathcona and Mount Royal. On Friday the 2nd parade was ordered at 8.45 to proceed to Windsor Castle to be inspected by Her Majesty on the lawn below the castle. The Queen hearing that some of the colonial troops had not had the opportunity of seeing her on the day of the procession, invited them down to visit her at her palace. They marched through Hyde Park to Paddington station and took the train for this historic royal residence, Field Marshal Lord Roberts and Colonel Herbert in command. The portion of the palace in which the Queen makes her home has been in continuous occupation since the 12th century, other portions have been added since. Upon arrival at Windsor the troops marched to the grounds of the palace where tents had been erected and a sumptuous repast had been provided for them. The officers were all invited into the palace, and into the Waterloo Chamber, the ante-chamber of St. George's banquetting hall. They were received by the Lord Chamberlain and the officers of Her Majesty's household. The Queen sent her autograph book to obtain the autographs of all the officers who were her visitors. The officers were then invited into St. George's banquetting hall and sat down to the number of one hundred and thirty. The Lord Steward presiding. Of all the guests who have in the past sat down in this historic chamber to accept the Queen's hospitality, none have possessed such a remarkable character or possessed so much significance in the growth and the unity of Her Majesty's subjects throughout the British empire, and the respect they entertain for one another. The band played throughout the repast which lasted for an hour. At its close the Lord Steward proposed the health of the Queen, the band playing the national anthem. He then proposed the health of our guests, and the party broke up and dispersed to visit the chambers of the castle, which had all been prepared for public inspection. To attempt to describe the beauties of Windsor Castle and its surroundings is not part of the object of this memento of daily details, especially when its beauties have been so often eloquently described, but the fact was impressed on our minds that the 930 of Her Majesty's colonial troops who were so hospitably entertained were not merely visitors to the castle, but honoured guests of the Queen. After the bodily comforts had been well refreshed, the troops were assembled on the lawn surrounded by magnificent elms, and formed up in line facing the castle. It was to all intents and purposes a private parade, no one but representatives of the pictorial and daily press being present, in addition to the royal guests of Her Majesty's household. Her Majesty the Queen arrived in her carriage with four grays and their postilions in scarlet, an outrider in front on a handsome spirited gray horse. Her carriage was supported on either side by two equerries, and Princess Christian accompanied her. The Queen was received by Field Marshal Lord Roberts at the saluting point, whom she called to her side. The colonial force drawn up in line, under the command of Colonel Herbert, received the Queen with a royal salute, the Grenadier Guards band supplying the music. The Queen then drove down the line and Lord Roberts walking beside, explained to her the various corps and the countries they came from. She stopped and spoke to one or two of the Indian officers and conversed with them in Hindustani. After her inspection of the force, the Queen again took up her position at the saluting point, and they marched past, then formed line and advanced in review order to her carriage and gave a royal salute. The Queen then directed Lord Roberts to present the officers to her, and also to select a non-comissioned officer from each corps to be presented. Commencing with the attached officers the presentations took up half an hour, Lord Roberts presenting each as they came up. Her Majesty spoke to some of the men and conversed in Hindustani with her Indian subjects. It was an impressive scene, this royal lady, 60 years a monarch, interesting herself in the minutest details, doing and saying everything that was likely to please those who had come thousands of miles to show their homage to her person and throne. After the presentations were over she asked Lord Roberts to express to her colonial soldiers, the gratification it had given her to meet them, that she wished them all a safe journey to their distant homes, and every happiness and prosperity in their future lives. After the presentations were over, a royal salute was again given and Her Majesty closed a most memorable ceremony of the numerous ceremonies that marked her Diamond Jubilee. The troops returned to the station through a dense line of Windsor's citizens who assembled to see the colonial troops and officers. They returned to London only to see another dense crowd awaiting them there, and arrived at Chelsea barracks at 7.30. Wherever the colonial troops were known to be coming or going there was sure to be a great crowd in the streets to see them pass. The Indian princes and officers who came over for the Jubilee did not accompany the force to Windsor but had a separate audience with Her Majesty on the Monday following, while the members of parliament were received by her officers Saturday, the following day to our inspection. This was only one of the almost daily receptions or inspections Her Majesty held during the three weeks of the Jubilee celebrations and is an evidence of the strength of body and intellect she has preserved during 60 years of her official life as a constitutional sovereign. The evening of Friday was marked by a large banquet at the Colonial Insiitute, presided over by the Duke of Connaught at which the colonial premiers were present, and invitations were issued to a number of officers to attend. As the Canadian contingent were under orders to entrain at Euston station to return to Canada at 3 o'clock the next day, July 3rd, and have their baggage ready by 11 o'clock and march to Buckingham Palace to receive their Jubilee medals from His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, with the exception of a few they could not attend the banquet The Canadian government having taken a return passage for the Canadian contingent upon the 1st July the steamer was delayed two days to allow the Canadian contingent to participate in the visit to Windsor and the presentation of the medals by His Royal Highness Prince of Wales, but no further arrangement could be made to prolong their stay. On Monday, the 3rd July, parade was ordered for the whole force at 10 o'clock to march to Buckingham Palace in review order to receive from His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, a Jubilee medal in commemoration of the great event which was now drawing to a close. The troops marched into the private grounds behind the palace under the command of Colonel Ivor Herbert, where they were met by Field Marshal Lord Roberts, and formed a hollow square in single rank with the attached officers on the right and the contingent forces of the various colonies and dependencies formed up in the regular order upon which they were accustomed to appear on parade. Field Marshal Lord Roberts, whose interest in the colonial forces of Her Majesty never abated, was present at their head to receive His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. The Commander in Chief, Field Marshal Lord Wolseley was also present. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, the Duke and Duchess of York, the Duke and Duchess of Connaught the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, Hon. Mr. Chamberlain, the Colonial Secretary, the colonial premiers, and a very large number of distinguished officers and statesmen were present to witness the distribution of Her Majesty's jubilee medal, an emblem of peace rather than of war, which was to take precedence of all medals except the Victoria Cross, an insignia of individual courage. His Royal Highness went down the ranks and made an inspection of the whole force, 930 strong on the parade state. He then took up his position in front of the hollow square under the shade of a wide spreading tree, where the medals were all laid out in their boxes, and the nominal roll of the force was attached. The word was then given, to the right turn, follow in succession to receive medals, and the presentation commenced with each officer, non-commissioned officer and man receiving from the hands of the Prince of Wales a medal with ribbon and fastening attached, until he had presented the whole 930 as they filed past him in single file, a ceremony which lasted about two hours. The Canadian contingent of the colonial force were invited by the Guards to mess at Wellington barracks prior to their departure for Euston station en route for Canada. After dinner the Canadian force marched to Euston station to entrain at 3.30 o'clock, the Army Service corps having already transported their baggage. They were accompanied by the band of the Grenadier Guards, the fife and drum band, and pipers of the Coldstreams and the band of the 13th Middlesex. A large and sympathetic crowd of friends and well-wishers were present to see them off by whom they were loudly cheered. Major General, Lord Methuen, Colonel Ivor Herbert and Colonel Ward with Lord Strathcona were there to see us entrain and take their leave of that part of the contingent force of the British empire that came across the Atlantic ocean or "herring pond," as it is familiarly called, to do honour to Her Majesty the Queen, and to unite with all the other troops in developing the defences of the British empire. To these three officers is largely due the successful management and discipline of the Chelsea force of colonial troops, and the sympathetic efforts they made to remove every grievance. No one can imagine for a moment the enormous strain that was put upon both official and civil life of London to carry through successfully, in the midst of a population of some six or seven million people in London, the succession of remarkable events crowded into the space of a fortnight, without encroaching upon the daily business of the population. As the train moved off the bands played their parting farewells, and the demonstration was not the least imposing of a series of parades and reviews that had followed one another in rapid succession, which showed the strong bond of union and affection that had gained strength with age for the descendants of the race that had gone far afield on the world's surface, and who had, with so much success, added renown to the British empire and strengthened its world-wide combination of force. Saturday the 3rd July, practically closed the official parades of the colonial contingent force, and preparations commenced for the dispersion of the remainder of the force to their destination. Colonel Ivor Herbert officially reported on Tuesday, the 6th July, that the conduct of all the men had been most exemplary. There were 1,000 men of every nationality, and yet not one man's name appears on the defaulter's sheet for the whole five weeks.

Detachments of native sappers from Malta, the west coast of Africa, Jamaica, Mauritius, the Strait Settlement, Hong Kong and Ceylon departed on Monday to the School of Military Engineering, Chatham, where they will undergo a short course of special training before returning to their respective stations. Fifty-four artillerymen from Hong Kong, Singapore, Ceylon, Mauritius, Jamaica, St. Louis, Sierra Leone, Bermuda, Malta and Lagos left on the same day for Shoeburyness for a course of training. The New Zealand military contingent went to Aldershot for three weeks' training with the regular troops. Portions of the Australian troops were also to remain for a short time and training. The Rhodesian force under Capt. Gifford who had lost an arm in the Matabele fighting in South Africa was a popular hero on the line of our various marches. This officer served in the Northwest field force of Canada in 1885 in Capt. French's corps of scouts. In addition to the assemblage of the colonial forces in Chelsea barracks the colonial premiers had assembled upon the invitation of the Right Honourable Joseph Chamberlain, the Colonial Secretary, to take their places in the Jubilee procession to St. Paul's Cathedral. They visited in company with the Right Honourable Joseph Chamberlain, the Duke of Devonshire and others, and were introduced to the British population where they were everywhere hospitably and enthusiastically received. A record of the important speeches that were made and the significance attached to their visit officially, all tended to broaden the statesmanship of those who are responsible for the guidance of the people they represent at home and abroad in consolidating a powerful force to aid in the promotion of the welfare of the world's population, the carrying out of which has only now been rendered possible by the advance in the rapid means of communication which the creative power of man has given. To attempt to give any account of the brilliant receptions held in their honour is beyond the purpose for which this memento has been prepared, except so far as to show that the statesmen of the countries represented by the defensive force in Chelsea barracks were helping to lay a foundation for imperial unity in working out the British constitution, which is the leading rule of political life in the governments of nations, and that, while the initiation of a united defensive force was inaugurated through their military contingents, the governing forces were aiming to work out problems which would result in a healthy march of progress.

This sketch is not intended as a description of events which have been so graphically described in the public press and which has been so widely distributed by means of the submarine cables which focus the daily events of the world, and enables the British empire in its official relationship to move by clock work. It is merely intended in connection with other official data and a nominal roll of the force to give to each soldier a memento of his service to preserve as an heirloom his participation in one of the most momentous, political, and physical forces that the world has ever known based on freedom, and humanitarian in its design. For weal or for woe it is the crowning act in the drama of the long life of a good woman and a noble sovereign. And as she heads the list of names enrolled in this soldier's memento as the supreme authority over Her Imperial army through her viceroys, governors general, and subordinate officers it gives a lustre to the list which will justly cause every soldier and every citizen whose defencive force he is to regard his memento with pride and with honour.

I have said sufficient to show you how connected the 100th Regiment is with Canada, the services it has performed, the fact that it was raised for service in 1805, the fact that it served for 13 years in Canada, the fact that when disbanded its members did not return to the old country but became pioneer settlers of Canada and that their descendants occupy a very large field in Canada itself; that the same opportunities that exist in the old country should be accorded to Canada for service in the army, and the opportunity for this service should not be withheld for the want of any effort on the part of our Canadian government. The petitions were most varied. The petitions were to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, but none the less are they significant to our government of the wishes of a large number of Canada's citizents and citizen soldiery, who believe we are entitled to take our share of responsibility in the stirring events of the world and in the government of nations which is so essential of the world's peaceful progress. From every part—I think every member of the provincial government of the province of Quebec on the east and British Columbia on the west signed it from the governor down, every senator signed it, every member of the last parliament signed it, corporations and governments and military men and regiments have all taken their share in presenting the magnificent testimonial of the Canadian people to effect the desires that I have been presenting to you to-day. It is, therefore, with very great pleasure that I now put the question to the hon. leader of the government in regard to this matter, to ask him to lay on the table of the House any correspondence there may be, in addition to what I have already presented, and which shows to the extent that it had passed that we may know exactly the position in which this matter does stand before the Canadian people in the hope that further action may be taken to identify Canada in the imperial service.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I am sure, after hearing the patriotic speech of the hon. member for Shell River, that all hon. gentlemen are desirous of enlisting in the British army, and not only themselves, but all their friends and relations. They may become corporals, sergeants; in fact, every office in the army is open to them, that is among the non-commissioned officers, and I beg to tell them that in the state of excitement they are in, all they have to do is to go to Halifax, give their name and go before the magistrate of the county and they can enlist and be received into the army without any expense or trouble.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am sure we have all listened with interest to the historical sketch which my hon. friend has given of the regiments of the British army that have borne the number 100, and he has explained to us how that one of these has in time disappeared and been superseded by another. We all recognize that there are other than legal bonds that hold the parts of the British Empire together, and this no doubt is one of them, our being associated with the British people in the formation of a regiment which served in the army, Canadians as well as Englishmen, Irishmen and Scotchmen. Constant association remind those of each nationality that they are part of the same country. The tendency of every new country is to forget the larger questions, and to turn attention to those which more immediately concern their material progress and their individual welfare. The growth of a community in its political sentiment is not unlike the growth of an individual from childhood to manhood. The questions which, in our earlier years, make little or no impression upon our minds are those of the most intense importance, when we come to reflect and appreciate their value to us. In our historical progress I think it is evident to every one that the events which have transpired during the Diamond Jubilee of Her Majesty have awakened in the people of Canada, and in every colonial possession of the empire, an intense interest, not merely in that section of the empire which they occupy, but in the unity of all the British populations as one people. We are growing in that direction every year more and more. The formation of a regiment, its return after long years, the admission of the public men of Canada to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the taking part in the negotiation of treaties which concern us, especially those of a commercial character, our interprovincial conferences, the common consideration of questions affecting the general well-being of the empire, all tend to cement us together as one people, are all of importance in our growth and progress; all show that we are becoming one people, cemented together by common interests, actuated by a determination to stand together in the maintenance of our rights in a far greater degree than were those of former generations. I think this is the necessary outcome of our progress. I have never myself regarded it as important, nor have I had any particular sympathy with those who are anxious to meet together and to devise a written constitution for the empire—a mechanical contrivance under which the empire is to be ruled and governed for all time to come. The British empire is a thing of growth. The English constitution is the product of vital forces. It is not a mechanical contrivance, and in my opinion the same vital forces which have tended to develop the English constitution, and to make it that important and delicate organization so well adapted to the government of the United Kingdom, and so well adapted to the government of each dependent or independent self-governing colony embraced in the empire, will also tend to develop an Imperial constitution equally suited to the wants of the empire, and equally well calculated to hold all its separated parts together in one political organization. I may say to my hon. friend that I shall bring to the attention of my colleagues the observations which he has addressed to this House for their further consideration, and I will see that the papers for which my hon. friend has moved are brought down during the session at as early a period as they can be.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH MACKENZIE AND MANN.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED moved:

He said: In anticipation of the discussion which will necessarily take place at an early day, I do not purpose making any remarks on the subject, but I presume my hon. friend will bring down those papess, so that they may be on the table of the House when the matter comes up for discussion.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say to my hon. friend that I am not aware that there are any papers, but I will bring the matter under the attention of my hon. colleagues, and if there are any papers they will be brought down.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—At a later day will the hon. gentleman state whether there are papers?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, I will make inquiry, and let my hon. friend know.

The motion was agreed to.

CORRESPONDENCE RE HAMILTON SMITH.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be presented to the Senate, copies of all telegrams and letters passing between any member of the government and the High Commissioner relating to Mr. Hamilton Smith, and all papers, communications and documents, the contents of which led or induced the government to send such telegrams or letters.

He said: I may say in this connection that in a very short time we expect the Yukon Bill to come before this Senate for discussion and consideration, and in view of that fact I think it is highly important that all the information should be given to hon. senators, in order that they may be able to have an intelligent discussion and give an intelligent vote on the question. There are some doubts with regard to what has transpired, or what correspondence has taken place, between the government and Mr. Hamilton Smith in reference to his connection with this contract, and it would be important for us to have those documents or letters, whatever they be, so that we can look into them and see in what way they bear on the contract with respect to the building of this railway.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no objection to bringing down the telegrams received by the premier from the High Commissioner, but, as the hon. gentleman probably knows, the production of the telegram from the premier to Lord Strathcona was refused in the other chamber. It was of a private and personal character, and the premier declined to bring it down. I am not aware that there are any other papers, communications or documents, which led to the sending of that message. If there are any, I shall be glad to make the inquiry, and give the hon. gentleman the information.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I would like to know what is meant by "personal character." How can a telegram be of a personal character if it is on public business—whether Hamilton Smith is connected with the Rothschilds or not? I do not think there can be anything personal in that question.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The premier gave a very full answer in the other chamber. The telegram was one purely private and personal. I have not seen it myself. It did not come before council in any way, and, under those circumstances, the telegram cannot be produced.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I must express my great surprise at the position taken by the hon. Secretary of State and also by his chief. As the hon. member for Halifax has already pointed out, when a question is asked a public officer, occupying the high position that Lord Strathcona does, and the answer received and that answer made public, and given to the world, how can that question which was put, which called forth that answer, be called private and personal? If a private and personal telegram were sent to any official for information, that information being received upon a private telegram, would it not be equally consistent for the answer to be withheld? I have noticed in the negotiations which have taken place by this government and provincial governments—and this is a continuance of the same policy—that when correspondence has been asked for, we have been told there is no correspondence, that the conclusion at which they arrived was after consultation, and during informal conversations. I scarcely think there is any parallel in the history of our country where the government has been conducted on those principles. Wherever any important question has arisen between a foreign nation or the Home government; or, in our case, between the provincial government and the Dominion government, there has been in the past a record of it. But it has been found convenient since the present government has been in power to carry on negotiations of the most serious character, affecting most important questions that have agitated the people of this country, and when papers have been asked for, we have been coolly told there has been no such correspondence, and there are no such records. Such was the case in that memorable discussion in connection with the Manitoba school question which every one will acknowledge was of the most important character. The government with which I was connected, in all our negotiations and intercourse with the provincial government, had everything put in writing and every document was laid before parliament. It is true that when a telegram was read in the Lower House by Sir Charles Tupper, in reply to a telegram that had been sent to the premier of the province of Manitoba, he said that just as soon as he could communicate with the premier of Manitoba he would be able to give an answer. We were anxious to make everything connected with the matter public, because we had nothing of which to be ashamed. The telegram was open, plain, distinct and to the point, but the premier of Manitoba refused to give us his assent to make it public. We had nothing to keep from the public view, we were anxious that all the facts should be known in order that the public might draw their own conclusions as to the course which we had taken. We have here a case in which a man's reputation is at stake—a man who, after investigation, I find occupies a high position in the commercial world. He stands at the head of his profession as a mining engineer in London, the great metropolis of the world. An answer comes from our High Commissioner making a certain statement. Surely the question which elicited that answer is of much importance to the people of Canada, and more particularly to those who have to deal with a question which comes before the Senate in a few days, as the answer itself was. How is it that a policy of this kind can be tolerated in this free country, more particularly a country governed by responsible advisers, is something I cannot understand. True, the premier and his colleagues can say "we are responsible to the people, we refuse to give you that information and we take the responsibility of our refusal." If the people are satisfied with government of that kind, we should know it, and the sooner the people are appealed to for the purpose of ascertaining if that is their idea of responsible government, the better. I repeat, it is unprecedented in the history, not only of this country but in the history of England, that where a question has been asked of a foreign nation and an answer given, that the question which elicited the answer has been refused. Very soon we shall have to consider an important measure on which we will be required not only to express our opinion, but in all probability cast our vote, and the very question which was asked and which elicited the telegram from Lord Strathcona might influence to a very great extent those who are to deal with the question. We have the answer—I do not know what the question was—that Mr. Hamilton Smith had no authority from Lord Rothschild to make a certain offer to the government of Canada. Mr. Hamilton Smith never made the statement that he had the authority of Lord Rothschild to do anything of the kind. The people must come to the conclusion that there is something concealed which elicited that answer, something which the government of the day are afraid to let the people know; if they were not, they would place the question before the country just as they have placed the answer. They take the responsibility to suppress the question and the people will draw, as we are drawing, their own conclusions and deductions from it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend would have this House believe that when he was in office that was the golden age and that ever since this country has more and more deteriorated. I do not think hon. gentlemen will find that the practice of the present government differs very much from the practice of the government which preceded it—

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh yes.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Except for the better. Let me remind my hon. friend of some facts which he seems to have forgotten. Take the negotiations in Washington in 1887. Has my hon. friend ever read the protocols in that negotiation? Does he know that of the forty or fifty meetings that took place each protocol consists of two or three lines and that every protocol is exactly the same, that no information was given, not a thing conveyed to this parliament? Has it ever been conveyed to the parliament from that hour to this? If my hon. friend's rule is correct, that was all wrong and yet that was all done when my hon. friend was in office. Let me refer to another matter; my hon. friend when in office went to Washington. I think the member for King's, Mr. Foster, went with him. Several telegrams passed between the colonial office and the government here through the British Ambassador at Washington.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not at that time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes. My hon. friend has forgotten, for I called attention to the telegrams and despatches and asked again and again for their production, and my hon. friend did not produce those dispatches or telegrams although without that information in our possession the hon. gentleman's colleagues insisted upon a discussion in the House of Commons.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman has alluded to another deputation, not the one that I was on. However, the principle is the same.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend says the government ought to bring down all the papers.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Well my hon. friend's proposition was a good deal broader than the facts warranted. Let me say this, there is not a British ambassy abroad in which there is not extensive correspondence that is private and confidential. Lord Palmerston on one occasion said that it would be impossible to maintain the friendly relation that exists between the different states if the private and confidential despatches, that it was necessary a government should have in its possession to warn it of dangers, were given to the public. An ambassador may believe that there are intrigues going on against his government. The reports may be foundationless and yet it is important, if there be suspicion of that kind, that it should be communicated to his government, and yet the government could not disclose it. Lord Palmerston said on one occasion that he settled more occasions of difficulty between himself and the other states of Europe, that were represented at the Court of St. James, at his dinner table than he had ever settled by correspondence. Those dinner table discussions are not brought down to parliament. My hon. friend declares that we ought not to have held personal intercourse with Mackenzie & Mann, that everything of that kind should have been done by correspondence. I deny that—that is not the rule, and if we have not any papers to produce we can produce results, as my hon. friend and his colleagues did in 1887 when they submitted to the parliament of this country the Washington Treaty without a single particle of information contained in any protocol that was kept during the period of the discussion. Now we say here you have the contract between Mackenzie & Mann, on one side, and the government on the other—that is the result. You are competent to judge of the merits of it from that. You do not require to have a report kept of every word that was said on the one side or the other, and of the various suggestions and amendments and changes that were made during the progress of the discussion.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Why then did the premier try to damage the reputation of Mr. Hamilton Smith?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There was no attempt to damage the reputation of Mr. Hamilton Smith.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Oh, yes there was.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The newspapers that support my hon. friend and that supported Mr. Hamilton Smith in his desire to foist the Washington bill on the people of this country, every one of them represented Hamilton Smith as the agent of Rothschild, and it was put forward from day to day that the government should deal with Hamilton Smith because he was a representative of so powerful a company of capitalists as the Rothschilds and those associated with them.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Does my hon. friend know that the premier, at the time he sent that cablegram, had a communication from Mr. Hamilton Smith saying that he in no way represented the Rothschilds? And will my hon. friend, while he cites parliamentary usages and precedents, cite a case in which a premier of any country unwarrantably used in such a way the name of any individual and received an answer thereto, an answer containing an innuendo which, to those not knowing all the circumstances, was made use of by the government here to vilify and falsify and slander that individual, while at the same time he feared the challenge of public opinion in producing a copy of the message he sent?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend puts a question that is at variance with the facts. Those who are supporting Hamilton Smith and seeking to damage the government and frustrate the attempts to establish an all-Canadian route to a Canadian territory, a route under Canadian control, represented Hamilton Smith everywhere as the man who had the Rothschilds behind him. Was it not perfectly natural, under the circumstances, that the Prime Minister should make inquiries and that he should make it at the only place where accurate information was certain to be obtained?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then why should he hesitate to show his inquiry to parliament?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The House was entitled to know what the answer was to the statement made whether Hamilton Smith was the agent and representative of the Rothschilds or not. That is what the public were entitled to know. That is what they do know. That information was given to the public and my hon. friend is not entitled to know what the Prime Minister put in his telegram. He may have inquired about a dozen other things in the same telegram. They may have been of a strictly private character.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We are willing that he should eliminate those that are private.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have not seen the telegram any more than the hon. gentleman has, and I think I would have an equal right to the hon. gentleman to see it, but I claim no such right. I have answered the observations made by my hon. friend (Sir Mackenzie Bowell), I have shown that he laid down rules that are never acted upon, that no government has acted upon or can act upon The reason for keeping a written record of what transpires between one state and another does not apply to the government in its negotiations with a private corporation. There is not an interview that a British ambassador abroad has with the representatives of the country to which he is accredited, in which he does not make a record of the correspondence that has passed between them, in order that it may be referred to afterwards, because it may to a certain extent, bind his government. There are political considerations and reasons of state why that should be done, but no such reason of state applies to negotiations between the government of Canada and Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann with respect to the construction of a railway, and so I say the hon. gentleman has not acted upon those principles of ideal practicability, nor has he done so heretofore.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I do not think the answer of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice is such a one as he should have given to the speech of the leader of the opposition. Any one who has experience in public life knows that there are many occasions on which it is not expedient that correspondence should be made public; correspondence relating to business negotiations being transacted at the time should not be given to he public, and under all such circumstances discretion is allowed to the government to withhold information which, if made public, might be detrimental to the public interests. We all know that the precedents cited by my hon. friend the leader of the House are perfectly consistent with constitutional usage, both in Canada and Great Britain, but these cases are not at all parallel with the case that is now under consideration. The case before us is one to which no parallel can be found anywhere, for the conduct of a government in withholding information that was asked for is unjustifiable. If Mr. Hamilton Smith had represented himself to be the agent of the Rothschilds, then there might be some excuse for giving information in the way it has been given without the telegram which elicited that information, but there is not a tittle of proof anywhere that Mr. Hamilton Smith represented himself as such agent. On the contrary, we have the clear and distinct language of that gentleman addressed to the government that he was not an agent of the Rothschilds. This telegram was sent under peculiar circumstances. A great question was before parliament, and in the public interest it had been submitted to the House of Commons that another syndicate was prepared to undertake the work which was contemplated by the bill then before parliament for a far less subsidy than the government was willing to grant to the favoured company, and that, of course, had a great effect upon the public mind. It was to discredit Mr. Hamilton Smith that the information was sought from the High Commissioner, and it was necessary to get such a telegram as would suit the purpose, especially on the eve of the elections in Ontario, for we all know that the information was given two or three days before the election in Ontario, where public sentiment was, I believe, running very strongly against the improvident bargain that the government were then attempting to rush through the House of Commons. All the circumstances point to the fact that a telegram unfair to Mr. Hamilton Smith, and a misleading telegram, calculated to elicit a reply to mislead the country at an important crisis, was sent by the Prime Minister, or some member of the government, to the High Commissioner, and that the High Commissioner was led to give such an answer as would suit the purposes of the government for the time being. The unfairness is, that the government, having given to the public one side of the question, has not given the telegram which elicited Lord Strathcona's reply. To every fair minded man it must appear that a most unfair advantage was taken of Mr. Hamilton Smith under the circumstances, that a most unfair attempt was made to mislead the country under the circumstances, and that it had the desired effect. If the government had not made the answer known to the public, there would not have been the room for complaint that there now is at the conduct of the premier in withholding the message he sent across the water, but having given the answer, I think, under every principle of justice and fair play, in order to give correct information to parliament and to the country, he was in duty bound to submit to the House at the same time the terms of the telegram which drew that inquiry from the High Commissioner. It is a most unfortunate thing that such tactics should be resorted to, clearly for the purpose of misleading the country I see no justification whatever for the course pursued by the government. The precedents cited by my hon. friend are not at all in point and do not justify the course adopted. Circumstances may arise at any time under which a government is justified in withholding information, but no circumstances can arise where an ex parte attempt can be made, such as this was, to give a wrong impression to the country, an impression which the circumstances did not warrant and which I think was not at all creditable to those concerned in it. What occurred afterwards? The most astrocious charges were made on the strength of that telegram, on the floor of parliament against a gentleman whose character stands high wherever it is known, and who is known all over the world as a great capitalist and a man occupying a high position not only in the commercial metropolis of the world but also in many other leading centres. An attempt was made to defame the character of that gentleman on the strength of this telegram, and therefore it was the simplest fair play and justice that the information on which that answer was got from the High Commissioner should have been submitted to parliament I do not consider that my hon. friend who has made this motion on the other side of the House has got an answer with which he ought to be satisfied with or which the Senate ought to consider satisfactory. The Senate can only supplement, by the opinion it must entertain on this question, the judgment which I believe has already been pronounced in the country upon a most indefensible mode of action.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is to be hoped that the speech delivered by the hon. gentleman from Richmond (Mr. Miller) is not, a sample of the spirit in which the government measure, which is coming down next week, will be dealt with here.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—That is another question.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I hope it is not to be regarded as a specimen of the non-partizan character which this House is supposed to possess.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—You are not a partisan at all.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have never denied that I was a party man, but I do not think I allow my party feelings to carry me away in the manner in which some other gentlemen allow theirs to carry them away. The hon. gentleman succeeded in the few minutes he was on his feet in making most serious charges for which there is no foundation whatever. The hon. gentleman has stated that the people of Ontario are very much exercised over this Hamilton Smith's offer to the government, in fact that the result of the Ontario elections depended on Mr. Hamilton Smith's offer. I took occasion—not thinking about Mr. Hamilton Smith particularly—after the Ontario elections were over, to inquire of gentlemen who had been in different parts of the province, as to the influence which this Yukon Bill and the business connected with it had upon the result of the elections in the different constituencies in Ontario, and the answer I received in every case, answers given from gentlemen who had been in different parts of the province, was that the Yukon Bill had not cut any figure in the elections at all.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Was it a Conservative or a Liberal who told you that?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I naturally looked for information to Liberals; I spoke to gentlemen some of whom were not very enthusiastic, perhaps, on the subject of the government measure, and I asked them for information with respect to the political effect of the government measure; and the answers which I received in every case were that, as far as these gentlemen were aware, the Yukon Bill cut no figure in the elections. So much for the Ontario elections. Then the hon. gentleman went this far—and I am surprised that even he should have taken that ground—here we have as high commissioner in England Lord Strathcona, a gentleman of, I think, unimpeachable character. It is true that a great many years ago some unpleasant references were made to him in the other chamber by prominent Conservatives, but I think those references were made under the influence of temper; and we know the leaders of the Conservative party took Sir Donald Smith to their bosom afterwards. He was one of their friends for a great many years, and I presume he is still a Conservative; and he is a gentleman of unblemished reputation.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I think in justice to the High Commissioner my hon. friend should certainly not introduce a phase of the subject which he is entirely unwarranted in introducing. There was no reflection whatsoever made on the High Commissioner. He performed a duty in answering the telegram of the Prime Minister.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Will the hon. gentleman allow me to continue my remarks? He is crying out before he is hurt. He can reply to me.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I object to the hon. gentleman misrepresenting what is said on the subject. The name of the High Commissioner was not imported into the discussion.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I did not propose to say the High Commissioner had done anything improper, but I was going to say that the hon. gentleman from Richmond had intimated that the High Commissioner was instructed as to the sort of answer he should give.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And I am saying it is not so.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Did I understand my hon. friend to say——

Hon. Mr. POWER—I said the hon. gentleman from Richmond had given the House to understand that the High Commissioner had been instructed as to the answer he should give. If the hon. gentleman from Calgary has anything to say with respect to that statement, he can make his statement now.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I did not understand my hon. friend from Richmond to say he was instructed as to what answer he should give.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Is it not perfectly absurd to suppose that a gentleman of the character of Lord Strathcona would knowingly be a party to any unfair transaction?

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—It was not knowingly.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And the hon. gentleman from Richmond said that if Mr. Hamilton Smith had claimed that he was the agent of the Rothschilds then there might be some excuse for the government's conduct, and the hon. gentleman would have thought, under those circumstances, there was no reflection on Hamilton Smith's character or reputation. I cannot understand how any hon. gentlemen can look at the matter in that way. It is alleged now, that Mr. Hamilton Smith never said he was the agent of the Rothschilds. What did Lord Strathcona's despatch say? It simply said that Hamilton Smith was not the agent of the Rothschilds; that is what he has been saying himself all the time, and the reflection made by the cable despatch was not on Hamilton Smith but upon the newspapers of the hon. gentlemen opposite which had been claiming in contradiction to Mr. Hamilton Smith, that he was the agent of the Rothschilds.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—What does the Minister of Marine and Fisheries say about it?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not know. I do not read the speeches in the other House, as a rule. I do not know what the hon. minister said, but what he said could not affect the true position. I should have preferred, myself, that the whole of the premier's communication to Lord Strathcona had been made public, but we are not to assume that the premier is an utterly unscrupulous and wicked person. That is not the reputation which he bears in the country. If he bore such a reputation as that he would not be where he is.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—But he was ready to give the telegram at first.

Hon. Mr. POWER—He thought of giving the telegram; but it occurred to him afterwards that there were objections to doing so; and the natural objection is the one suggested by the hon. the Minister of Justice, that the telegram might not have been confined to the Hamilton Smith matter, and that it contained other matters which it would not be proper to make public. We ought to try and keep calm and should not get so worked up over such a very small matter. We ought to proceed to consider the measure, when it comes before us, in a calm and temperate spirit.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I just want to say one word with regard to the reference made to the High Commissioner. I pass no reflection to the High Commissioner nor do I think him open to censure in any way. An improper telegram might have been sent to him although the answer elicited from him was proper, and the inference is that it was not a proper telegram or the public would have been favoured with its contents. As to the remarks of my hon. friend as to people keeping calm, every one knows that there is not a stronger partisan in the House than my hon. friend himself. We know it is the habit of some members to speak more warmly when in earnest than others, but I do not think it is a fit subject for remark by any member of this House. I do not criticise my hon. friend's style of speaking; I have my own peculiar style of speaking and when I speak in earnest it does not follow that I am out of temper.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The most humiliating part of this subject is that the premier had to take his word back on the floor of the House of Commons. He promised to bring the telegram but did not bring it down. Why did he not bring it down if it was simply an inquiry as to Hamilton Smith's connection with the Rothschilds and his financial standing. It was a fair question to ask what is the standing of Hamilton Smith, what is his connection with the Rothschilds? If that was the question, what has the premier to hide? Looking at the telegram he found it was not a fair and just one, but a leading question which might bias therefore the mind of the High Commissioner, he could not bring down a telegram which conveyed that impression. That is quite clear to the country and to every member of this House.

The motion was agreed to.

YUKON RAILWAY BILL.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (6) "An Act to confirm an agreement between Her Majesty and William Mackenzie and Donald D. Mann and to incorporate the Canadian Yukon Railway Company."

The bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved that this bill be read the second time on Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I would make this suggestion to the hon. minister, that it would be well, before the second reading is taken upon this bill, that we should be informed what progress has been made with the sleigh road from the mouth of the Stikine River to Teslin Lake. I would also suggest to the hon. Minister of Justice that he should ascertain the opinions of the contractors as to the utility of the line as a commercial route. I know their opinions. It was volunteered to me. It would throw a great deal of light on the subject to have their opinion.

The motion was agreed to.

THE PLEBISCITE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Before the orders of the day are called, I should like to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Justice and his colleagues to an item I have cut out of one of the Hamilton papers:

It is stated at the Dominion Council Convention of Royal Templars in session here that you publicly promised that the plebiscite would be free from any rider or qualifying question. Is it true? Kindly wire reply.

This telegram was sent to the Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and I presume, if the hon. leader of the government wrote a reply it was with the consent and knowledge of the government that that answer was given. I should like to ask the hon. Minister of Justice if the reply that was given was that they did not attend to attach any rider to the question? If the government sent an answer I hope my hon. friend will say what the answer was.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I know nothing about this.

JUDICIAL APPOINTMENTS IN THE YUKON TERRITORY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I direct the attention of the hon. leader of the House to an item that appears in this morning's Citizen, and one particularly relating to his department and affecting the North-west Territory:

There is a well authenticated rumour abroad to the effect that the government intend appointing Mr. Cook, a Quebec barrister, to be a judge in the North-west Territories, with jurisdiction extending into the Yukon district. Further, that Police Magistrate Dugas, of Montreal, is to be mollified with the position of Lieutenant Governer of the North-west Territories, and that Mr. Beausoleil, M.P., will get the police magistracy of Montreal.

I desire to make reference to the reported judicial appointment of Mr. Cook. I do not know whether my hon. friend contemplates making an appointment, but I would wish to point out to that hon. gentleman that there are members of the profession in the North-west Territories, and of the proper political stripe, who would consider themselves well qualified to occupy a position on the bench of the Territories, and whom I also feel satisfied would have the confidence of their fellow-citizens. The late government very happily adopted a precedent in the last judicial appointment, by which they selected from the bar of the Territories the most recently appointed judge, Mr. Justice Scott, a gentleman well qualified for that position; and I hope it will not be found necessary for my hon. friend to go outside of the Territories for the purpose of appointing a North-west judge. I should point out also in this particular item that reference is made to the judge having jurisdiction in the Yukon. As my hon. friend pointed out very properly the other day, the Yukon district is part and parcel of the North-west Territories, and the jurisdiction of the present judges extends to the Yukon district, as has been demonstrated by the government having sent Mr. Justice McGuire, a North-west judge, to administer justice in the Yukon. In regard to the appointment of Lieutenant-Governor, so many rumours have been afloat in regard to that appointment that we have been more than satisfied on that point; but it is very pleasant to know that Police Judge Dugas is to be mollified. That is very satisfactory. I thought that gentleman is being mollified at the present time by having been deputed to make an investigation in the case of the Crow's Nest Railway employees, but that apparently is not sufficient. A further dose is to be administered to that gentleman which I hope may have a satisfying affect.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am sure that my hon. friend does not expect me to answer this question. I am not going to enter into a discussion of every item in the newspapers. I may say to my hon. friend that I have not discussed the question of judicial appointments with my colleagues who would be entitled to precedence in that matter, and I don't think I will discuss it with my hon. friend here on the floor of the Senate.

THIRD READING,

Bill (B) "An Act incorporating the Central Canada Loan and Savings Company"—(Hon. Mr. Allan).

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Monday, 21st March, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at three o'Clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE ANGLO-GERMAN TREATY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER rose to—Inquire of the government if it is true, as reported in the public press, that the Canadian High Commissioner in London has been sent to Berlin in connection with the lapsing, in July next of the Anglo-German treaty of Commerce, and what is the nature of his instructions?

Also, whether it is the intention of the government to send Lord Strathcona to Belgium, France and other European countries for the same object?

He said: This question is not an idle one, in my estimation. We are all interested in the extension of the trade of our country, and particularly in knowing the course the government intends pursuing in the complicated or entangled state of our tariff. We all know that after the 31st of July next we will enter into new phases of commercial relations with the world, and the attitude or the course that the government is going to take is not clear to the public, if it is clear at all to the government themselves. When the rumour came that Lord Strathcona had gone to Berlin, it was supposed, and naturally so, that it was in connection with the lapsing of the treaty, for many of us are aware now—though we were not aware before, and possibly the government neither—that the nation that denounces a commercial treaty is, by etiquette at least, supposed and obliged to take the initiative of renewing that treaty; otherwise it would be considered as commercial warfare. I was informed—and no doubt truly informed—that England, on the very day of the denunciation of the treaty, which came about by the influence of our Prime Minister in England, as I understand——

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—England, through her ambassador in Berlin and in the principal capitals in Europe, did propose a renewal of the commercial relations, as she was by etiquette and courtesy obliged to do, but our government have failed to do likewise. True, we did not deal directly with those nations, but we were and are directly interested. It was gratifying for the country to hear that, although late, the government had sent to Berlin their high commissioner in London, apparently for the purpose of complying with international etiquette or courtesy. I, for one, do not know, what is the positive mission of our commissioner there, and it is with the object of finding that out that I put this motion. But the fact of his going there created some commotion in the country. I read in a Toronto paper a long article on the subject, from which I extract this part. The news came from Ottawa by despatch:

Indeed it is understood here that the feeling of Germany which takes over $600,000 of our exports is to put up a discriminatory duty of 25 per cent against Canada after the present treaty is out of the way. It is to be hoped that this is not the case but from information which is obtained from a good source your correspondent learns that the question has been discussed and that the measure is within the range of possibilities.

It is to be hoped—I hope for one—that Germany will take no retaliatory measures, and my inclination just now is to congratulate the government on the step they are taking towards rendering more easy our trade intercourse with foreign countries. We are all aware that we are in a mood of generosity. Our Premier, while in England, acted grand seigneur, as we say in French, and made generous promises to England, fulfilling what the French adage goes to say, that "it is the poor who are generally the more generous." We do not object to buying all our goods from England, or at least all we can, but we are interested in selling not only to England, but to all other countries the most we can, and relations with Germany now, hon. gentlemen, are rather one sided. In the leisure I had between my notice and these few remarks I am making, I went through our trade department reports, and I find that last year, while we exported to Germany to the value of $6,493,368, we only imported to the extent of $1,045,432. That is to say, we imported more than six times the amount we exported, which is a balance of trade decidedly against us. Now, hon. gentlemen, if by any act of our government that amount which you export to Germany should be diminished, that would not be gratifying to us. I have been looking into the reports of our commerce with other countries of Europe, and the result is not more satisfactory from a Canadian point of view. Barring Great Britain and the unspeakable Turk, our entire exportations to European countries amounted last year to a little less than two and a half million dollars, while we imported from the same countries—fourteen in number—over twelve million dollars' worth, leaving a balance against us in the ratio of one to five. That is not satisfactory. From some European countries—from Austria for example, we imported to the extent of nearly half a million, in round numbers, and exported nil according to the returns. The same with Denmark, Greece and Iceland. Only two nations—Norway and Portugal—give us the benefit of the balance of trade on a very small amount.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Do we have importations from Iceland?

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Yes. Portugal purchased thirty-six thousand seven hundred and forty-five dollars' worth from us, while we got from them sixteen thousand dollars worth, leaving a balance of twenty thousand dollars in our favour.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—I said Iceland.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—The amount from Iceland is very small. We get from them $784 and send them zero, so that would not be much of a balance.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—They have zero there already.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—So we have sometimes here, in the Senate. We imported from France over two and a half millions worth and exported less than seven hundred thousand dollars worth. That does not seem to me very gratifying. While favouring greater privileges to Great Britain as much as we can, if there should be such a thing as feeling in commercial matters, we should try and improve our commercial relation with other countries, especially France and Germany which, viewing the proposed steamer line to the continent, we will soon be in a position to increase to a voluminous extent. I have looked into the figures concerning the importations of those two countries of articles which they could buy from us, and here are a few of them. The importations of Germany last year altogether amounted to over four billions of marks—I believe a mark is worth about twenty-five cents—with exportations a little below; and among the articles which Germany imports and of which we could supply them a good portion, are the following:

	Marks.
Horses	74,843,000
Cattle	111,750,000
Copper ore	40,161,000
Eggs	74 353,000
Grains and flour	438,000,000
Hides	144,000,000
Iron ore	36,304,000
Wood	149,605,000
Wools	247,989,000

Aggregating over one billion and a quarter, and of that, hon. gentlemen, we supplied only one million, a very low figure compared with the amount of trade that we could, under favourable and improved circumstances, have with that country. The figures are perhaps more startling still in the case of Belgium, that little European kingdom which stands foremost amongst the nations of the world for commercial and industrial activity—I do not except even England. The total commerce of Belgium last year was over five and a half billions of francs, that is over one billion dollars, the importations being three billions of francs. Among those importations we find the following items:—

Horses, over	$ 4,000,000
Cattle, sheep and hogs	7,250,000
Wood	18,500,000
Pulp wood, nearly	7,742,000
Butter	3,000,000
Cheese	1,600,000
Eggs	2,300,000
Grains and flours	59,000,000
Hides	10,000,000
Iron ore	4,000,000
Cast iron	4,000,000

Of the whole amount we contributed only $354,584, which is less than one per cent of the whole importations of Belgium. For a young country, as we are, with so many things to export, it is worth while making efforts to improve our relations with that country, which would be willing, no doubt, to buy from us, if she could, on as cheap or cheaper terms as from other countries. Referring to my notice, I, for one, and I am sure the country at large, would hail with satisfaction the announcement that the government intend to take the initiative in renewing our trade relations with those countries. If retaliatory measures should be taken against us, as might be done—the article I read was from a leading Toronto paper, and it is the opinion with many that those nations, unless we take the proper steps to renew our commercial treaties, might retaliate against us—what would be the consequence? The little, I was going to say the paltry amount of our exportations to those countries still would diminish.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—According to your own showing, we would not lose much.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Still it would be something, a couple of millions, and who would benefit by it? The English importers, as they are doing now, to a slight extent, would then to a larger extent buy from us, put the English stamp on our goods and send them to Belgium, France or Germany. We would be selling those articles bona fide to English buyers at a minimum rate, and they would get a profit on them. Those considerations are worth being studied. I do not believe we can afford to act in such a way with countries which could come in and help us handsomely in our commercial relations. I will not detain the House longer at the present time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say to my hon. friend that the Canadian High Commissioner in London has not been sent to Berlin in connection with the lapsing of the Anglo-German treaty of commerce, that it is not the intention of the government to send him to Belgium or France, or any other European country in reference to that object. I have listened to the speech of my hon. friend with interest, and if I rightly understand him, he is desirous of more extensive commerce with those countries. I dare say that would be advantageous to this country if it could be secured, but I suppose so far that the people of Canada, who are engaged in commercial undertakings, have sold the products in those markets where they command the best price, and if we have sold but little in the markets of Germany and Belgium, it is because we have found a more favourable market elsewhere. I may say, further, to my hon. friend, that I do not at all question the fact that with more energy and enterprise we might perhaps open markets with some European powers, and the effect of the opening of those markets might induce this country to produce more than it is producing at the present time, for we generally find that high prices stimulate industry and that the country may produce, without any apparent increase of capital, a larger quantity of its products for sale abroad when it has a motive for doing so, than it does when such motive is withdrawn. I notice that my hon. friend refers to the amount of pulp for the manufacture of paper that is required for consumption in Belgium. That is an article which we might supply to an almost unlimited extent, and, what would perhaps be better, we might convert the pulp into paper in this country and supply the various European markets with that article. I have nothing further to say to my hon. friend's question. I have given him the information which he asks for, and I trust that the trade relations between Germany and Belgium, on the one side, and Canada on the other, will not be seriously affected by the abrogation of the treaty.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—This is a subject that I have discussed before the House heretofore, and when my hon. friend from New Brunswick rises to discuss the same question, he presents one phase of it, and probably ——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He is encroaching upon your preserve.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, perhaps so, but from a different standpoint. I am glad to see that he has started thinking at any rate. There is one thing I would like to draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to, and that is the fact that it is made apparent by the returns which have just come out, to 28th February, for eight months, that we have exported 38 million dollars from the country, more than we have imported into the country. That is a very serious state of affairs. The hon. gentleman has shown us that we have imported from European countries, made up of small amounts, some 12 million dollars while we have only exported to them two million and a half. I think those were the figures he gave. That shows that the heaviest excess of imports has come from European countries whose markets are closed. The heaviest exports have gone to the free markets of Great Britain. That proves to us that if we want to export, we must have a greater economic force through the production that we are able to put into the country in order to force our goods through high tariffs which exist on the continent of Europe, and the only way to do that is to apply the same economic force to our production that the people of Great Britain apply to theirs. If we do that, we will then force barriers in a great many articles that are natural to our country, as for instance in the article the hon. minister has just drawn attention to, the article of pulp wood. That is one of the natural productions of the country. It does not require any protection at all. If protection has any effect upon it in any shape or form, it is to reduce our power to produce it. We have the raw material, and we pay nothing for it. It is the raw product of the country. Every additional expense that is imposed upon that by protective taxation restricts our power to export that pulp, either in its raw state or manufactured into paper, as the hon. Minister of Justice has suggested; and restricts our power to force the barriers of those countries that maintain protective taxation; it restricts our power even to send it to the free markets of Great Britain, where Norway and Sweden are competing with the same product under better economic conditions; and therefore if we want to accomplish what the hon. gentleman has so forcibly suggested, and put the power to export to those foreign countries upon equality of basis to a purchasing power from them, we have to employ that economic condition which will enable us to produce it so much more cheaply than other countries who compete with us in those markets, but what I would like to suggest to the hon. Minister of Justice, and what I have suggested before, is that he should take into his serious consideration the advisability of trying to remedy that condition, which is a very serious one. The fact that we are exporting to-day 37 million dollars more than we are bringing back to the country——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We are paying our past old debts.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No, you are paying more than your past old debts. It is unfortunate that the debts have arisen, but I do not see that the hon. gentleman, or the government that the hon. gentleman is a member of, is taking any steps at all to reduce those debts. In the two years that the government has been in power, they have taken very great pains to increase those debts, and therefore, if they go on in that same condition, it will be just as aggravated as he suggests now has been the case. The result of 1897 is a loan of ten million dollars, a grant to that exceedingly rich corporation the Canadian Pacific railway of $4,000,000, a grant of two million for the Drummond railway to parallel two other lines, and an increase of the taxing power of the Grand Trunk railway to the extent of two million dollars or $12,000,000 additional burden on the people of the country. But it is not altogether the absorption by the payment of the debts. No doubt those liabilities we have to remit abroad are remitted by our exports, and it is the farmers of the country, those who produce pulpwood, those who produce lumber, the fishermen, and those who work the mines, who are paying the debt of the country through what they export. There is where the burden of taxation is lying; there is where the burden of debt is lying, upon those interested. Instead of the money they earn by the production of those exports being distributed in their own locality, in the rural, mining and fishing districts and then redistributed through the country, it is directly absorbed, and collected abroad through the system we are now pursuing, and I would suggest to the hon. Minister of Justice, as one of the free traders of the government—who as yet has made no effect at all upon the mind of the government apparently—that so far as Great Britain is concerned, he admits the products of Great Britain on exactly the same terms that Great Britain admits our products; and if he does he will see the wealth flow back to this country in a way he has no conception of at the present moment. Those debts, in the course of ten or fifteen years, will be entirely wiped out and the wealth of the country will be increased to that extent. There is not a shadow of a doubt about that; and more than that, the wealth will be more equally distributed. I explained the other day how wealth is being collected in certain hands in consequence of the policy we are now pursuing. It is a great deal better that that wealth should be distributed by the hands of those who produce it than by our protective legislation creating monopolies that absorb that wealth. Every hon. gentleman in the House knows perfectly well that the foundation of the wealth of Canada comes from the soil, from the forest, and from the raw products of the country—that that is the only source of wealth here, and that it is the equitable distribution of that which should receive the honest attention of any government that may be in power, because our condition is being forced upon our attention to-day by that very fact that we are parting with thirty-seven million dollars worth of the products of Canadian labour more than there is a visible return for coming back to Canada. The question which the hon. gentleman has put to the leader of this House as to the visit of Lord Strathcona and in connection with the treaties has received its reply, that it has nothing whatever to do with the treaty, that was denounced a year ago; but I would impress upon the government that most beneficial results to the whole country would flow from a further reduction of our tariff, making it free and allowing British goods to come into this country on the same terms that Great Britain admits our goods. It is nothing but fair play and justice and cementing that union which every hon. gentleman in this House hopes will be always closer. I have taken the opportunity of this question being put to advance once more the views which I have from time to time expressed in this House.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I do not think that I am strictly in order in speaking on this question, because an inquiry calls simply for a reply, but inasmuch as some hon. gentlemen have taken advantage of this opportunity to say a few words, I may be permitted to say something also. If there is anything that should be satisfactory to the Senate in connection with the recent tariff, it is the fact of its being lowered in favour of Great Britain. My hon. colleague from New Brunswick has taken the trouble to quote from the trade returns showing that several countries from which we should expect trade are practically taking nothing from us—in fact, his own expression was that the trade is nil. That alone is sufficient to show that we should turn our attention to that country which takes all the goods we have to sell. Great Britain is our best customer and best friend, and therefore we have a right to arrange our tariff in such a way as to favour the mother country. The government should be congratulated for having done so. I trust that when the new tariff comes fully into operation, Great Britain will supply us with a market for all our surplus products and that, if possible, we shall in purchasing confine ourselves to dealing with Great Britain in return. This is the cardinal point that I wish to place before the House and the country. It is very satisfactory to me, as an old trader, and I am glad that this question enables me to express my opinion on the subject.

DRUMMOND COUNTY RAILWAY.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved:

That a special committee of the Senate be appointed—

1. To inquire into the amount, source and expenditure of all subsidies granted to the Drummond County Railway Company, and of all other moneys received and expended by the said company, and the times and manner of such expenditure.

2. The capital stock of the company, proceeds of all sales of same by the company, subscriptions of stock, names of subscribers, amounts subscribed, calls made thereon, and amounts paid on same, transfers of stock from time to time, and to whom.

3. The financial position of the company, its liabilities, matured or accruing, inclusive of bonds sold and their proceeds, of loans, or advances made to or by the company, and the application of the same, together with particulars of all guarantees or endorsements given to or by the company in relation thereto.

4. The particulars of all offers, or negotiations for the sale, lease or transfer of the company's property.

5. The classification and condition of said railway and equipment, at any time or times, together with all matters and things relating to the said Drummond County Railway Company, inclusive of all negotiations and dealing swith the government of Canada in reference to the said company.

Said committee to be as follows:—The Honourable Messieurs Clemow, Cox, De Boucherville, Ferguson, Kirchhoffer, King, Loughheed, Landry, Miller, Mills, Macdonald (B.C.), Power, Prowse, Primrose, Thibaudeau (de la Vallière), Wood, and the mover; with power to send for papers, persons, and records, and to employ such persons as the committee may deem necessary for the purposes of the said investigation, and to report from time to time.

He said: The reason why I asked some ten days ago for a postponement of this motion is upon record. I have watched as closely as I could the proceedings of the investigating committee of the other House, and if the past is to be a guide to the future, the information sought by this motion will not be obtained; otherwise, I should have asked the Senate to postpone this matter to a future day. But when I see witnesses refusing to answer important questions intended to elicit the information that this motion is intended to bring to light, and that a majority of the committee have justified the action of that witness, I came to the conclusion, as I think every other man who desires to ascertain the facts in connection with this matter, has, that under the circumstances it is the duty of the Senate to appoint its committee to proceed with the investigation. Had a motion not been carried at the last session of parliament by this House for the purposes indicated in this motion and postponed at, I think I might say, the solicitation, or at least by an agreement with the then leader of the House, with the distinct and positive understanding that we should proceed with an investigation this session, I do not know that I should have taken upon myself the responsibility of asking for a committee, until the other House had exhausted the question as far as the scope of their committee would permit. But under the circumstances, and in view of what has taken place, it is my duty as a member of the House, having placed the motion on the notice paper (and I deem it also the duty of the Senate, after what took place during the last session of parliament) to proceed now at as early a date as possible to elucidate all the facts possible in connection with this transaction. I realize, and I think every member of this House realizes the importance of the action which we are taking. I think also, we realize fully the responsibility which now devolves upon us in view of the action that was taken during the last session of parliament. We took the responsibility of rejecting an agreement which had been made for the leasing of this road in connection with a section of the Grand Trunk, and having taken that responsibility—and that responsibility was taken under the firm conviction that the bargain that was made was an improvident one, that it was one into which the country should not enter,—without discussing the question at all of the necessity of having a western terminus at Montreal, that it becomes our bounden duty to proceed now to ascertain whether the action of the Senate in the last session was justified, or not. If any one reads the remarks which I made upon that occasion, he will find that I took the ground for the course that I pursued upon the presumption, and the firm conviction in my mind, that we were paying too dear for what we were obtaining; and if that were the case, that we should not confirm the agreement that was made. The great majority of the Senate took the same view that I did, and the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution at that time; and having done so, now it is our duty to proceed, and if it can be shown that the government paid no more than the value of the property, then they will be justified, and the Senate will have to bear any odium that may attach to the investigation. If, however, it can be shown that the bargain was too extravagant that it was not in the interest of the country, then the country will say that under the circumstances the Senate was justified in what it did.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Before my hon. friend sits down may I ask him this question: like, I presume, many hon. members, I have not been following the evidence, taken before the committee of the other House, as closely as my hon. friend, and for the information of these other members and myself, perhaps the hon. gentleman will be good enough to state in what particular the committee of the other House have failed in the discharge of their duty.

Several Hon. MEMBERS—No, no.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think it is reasonable; we are asked now to take a rather important step on the ground that the committee of the other House has not been carrying on the investigation taking place before it in a thorough way, and it is only reasonable that we should know where the defect has been.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not know that it becomes my duty to do this. Hon. gentlemen are as intelligent as myself, and have had the same access to all the information that I have had, because all the information that I could possibly receive has been through the newspapers. I read the first report of the committee appointed by the House of Commons to look into this question and noticed a paragraph stating that the evidence was to be printed daily for the information of the committee. In the past I know that when evidence of that kind has been printed from day to day, it has been at least accessible to other members of parliament. I took the trouble to go to the distribution office to make inquiries about it. Having placed this motion on the paper, I felt it my duty to keep myself fully informed of what was going on. I was told that there were no printed reports of the proceedings sent to that office, nor did they know anything about them. I then turned my attention to the newspapers, which are open to my hon. friend as much as they are to me. I do not deem it my duty to enter into a full explanation at the present moment, but I may say this to him that when certain questions were asked which would have given the information on some of the points specially indicated in this motion, the witness refused to answer them and he was sustained by the committee.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I stated last year my objection to the form of the motion of my hon. friend from Richmond, and I make today the same objection to the first proposition contained in this motion of my hon. friend. I pointed out then that this House was not clothed with authority to directly institute an inquiry with respect to the appropriation of public money by parliament. I referred to a case in the House of Lords—and my hon. friend also referred to it this year—and the case is as well illustrated by what was said in respect to the motion then before the House as by what was said in respect of the matter itself. The motion that was before the House of Lords was one to inquire into expenditures in India. Mr. Disraeli quoted the rule as to the inability of the House of Lords to inquire into the expenditure of public moneys, and Mr. Gladstone said he admitted the accuracy of the hon. gentleman's contention in respect to the appropriation of money made by parliament, but this inquiry was not in respect to the appropriations of money made by parliament, but in respect to the appropriations made by the government of India for Indian purposes, and that, not being an appropriation made by the House of Commons in the United Kingdom, it was as open to inquiry by the House of Lords as it was to inquiry by the House of Commons, and that, therefore, it was proper that a joint committee should be constituted to inquire into this matter. My hon. friend from Richmond last year, and again this year, referred to the 18th section of the British North America Act, which he thinks gives to this Senate broader powers in respect to inquiries of this sort than are possessed by the House of Lords. That rule reads as follows:

> The privileges, immunities and powers to be held, enjoyed and exercised by the Senate and by the House of Commons, and by the members thereof respectively, shall be such as are from time to time defined by act of the parliament of Canada, but so that the same shall never exceed those at the passing of this Act held, enjoyed and exercised by the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and by the members thereof.

Now my hon. friend contends that as the privileges, immunities and powers of the House of Commons in the United Kingdom are the standard by which the rights, privileges and immunities of both Houses of this parliament are measured or restrained, therefore this parliament has broader powers than the House of Lords has in England, and that we are to look to the powers, immunities and privileges possessed by the House of Commons in the United Kingdom to ascertain what the powers, privileges and immunities of this House are. Let me say, hon. gentlemen, that that is only correct to a limited extent. For instance, one of the powers of the House of Commons in England is to vote supplies. Will it be argued that because the House of Commons in England possesses that power, that power is by this section conferred upon this House?

Hon. Mr. MILLER—No, of course not. We are restricted in that respect by the express terms of the Act.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then it is true in regard to all other matters? I say certainly not. I say that you look at the powers, immunities and privileges as a limitation which never can be exceeded, but not as a grant of powers, immunities and privileges that may be in every case entirely covered, and you are to look at the nature of the constitution of this House and at the nature of the constitution of the other House to see what the powers, immunities and privileges of both Houses are under this particular section. How are we to distinguish them from these words—what are the powers of this House and of the House of Commons in this matter? You look, let me say hon. gentlemen, to what the power is in respect to making an appropriation. It is within the power to make the appropriation that power to make the inquiry arises. I have a perfect right to inquire into the expenditure of my money with which I have entrusted my servant and my agents, but my neighbour has no such right to inquire into the expenditure of my money by my servant. It is out of the power conferred upon the House of Commons in this matter that that House has a right by the constitution of a committee to follow the expenditure and see what has become of it. That is the power the House possesses. But we have no power to make the appropriation, we have no power to amend it or alter it, and that being so, we have no power to inquire into it and see what has become of the money so appropriated. I am calling the attention to the legal position of the matter, and what I would suggest to my hon. friend—and it does not practically restrain it, but makes the motions that are proposed in this House conform to the law of parliament in this regard—is to inquire into the finances of the Drummond County Railway Company, and of moneys received and expended by the said company and the times and manner of such expenditure. Then you are inquiring, not in express terms into the appropriation of public money, but you are inquiring into the financial standing and management of the affairs of this company, and as an incident to that, you may have drawn under your notice the fact that public moneys have been granted, and you may inquire what has become of them, and in precisely the same way as you may with regard to any other money for the purpose of ascertaining the main object of your inquiry—the management of the finances of the company. My hon. predecessor here last year made a promise to this House that it should have the privilege of inquiring into this matter; with the approval of the government. He invited inquiry. The motion was made at so late a period last session that it was felt that it would unduly delay the termination of the session. I am not at all calling in question the duty of the government to fulfil that promise; all I am calling the attention of my hon. friend to is that the motion should be put in such a shape as to conform to the functions and powers of this House in respect to matters of this sort. It will not in the slighest degree limit the inquiry, but it will remove from the motion an objectionable feature, an unparliamentary feature, which, I think, appears upon the face of it.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I did not expect that the motion of the hon. leader of the opposition would be opposed on this occasion, because of the promise given by the leader of the House last year, that a committee would be granted to investigate this question of the Drummond County Railway. I did not think either that my hon. friend, under those circumstances, would repeat the argument which he addressed to the House last year—an argument as strong, possibly, as could be addressed to it by any one holding different views on the powers of this body in parliament from my hon. friend opposite (Sir Mackenzie Bowell) and myself; an argument well and ably put now, as it was last session, but I think my hon. friend has failed altogether to satisfy this House as to the position he assumes with regard to the powers of the Senate to investigate a subject of this character. I tried last year to vindicate the position I took with respect to the difference which existed in the attributes of this House, as a legislative body, and those of the House of Lords. Although the constitution of Canada is modelled in principle on the constitution of Great Britain, it does not follow from that fact that the powers of the Upper Chamber are the same in Canada as they are in England. We all know that the House of Lords is a body which has been evolved after centuries of existence, and is founded on usage and precedents and its customs, its usages, its powers and privileges are all the result of long development and founded upon these precedents. With this body, it was altogether different. Although I say in principle we are intended to represent the functions of the Upper Chamber in England, still we are created by a written charter, which clearly defines our position. Our rights rest upon a written charter, which enlarges our powers, and renders them greater than those of the House of Lords. I say, therefore, that precedents such as my hon. friend cited, which would be applicable in England, as certainly the precedent cited by Mr. Disraeli was applicable to the question then before the British House of Commons, these precedents cannot have any application to us, if they are not in harmony with the power we possess under our constitutional charter. If any member of this parliament could attack my position successfully, that member would be the Minister of Justice, because he has given a great deal of study to these questions, and is admitted to be one of our parliamentary authorities with regard to them; but when my hon. friend attacked my position, in claiming for this House the same powers, privileges and immunities as the House of Commons possesses under the quoted section of the British North America Act, he was not very strong in the point he selected for illustration. The only point he attempted to make against that position was that, if I were right, then we would have the power of voting supplies. The House will see how utterly weak that point is. We have not the power of initiating money votes; therefore we have not the power to vote supplies. We have not the power of initiating money votes, because that power is directly given to the House of Commons. Therefore it does not at all strengthen the argument which the hon. gentleman tries to make against the rights, powers and privileges of this House under the 18th section of the British North America Act. I am glad that my hon. friend has not attempted by any other illustration to weaken the force of the argument which I based on that section, and which view, I am glad to see, is now held by the hon. gentleman from Halifax, for he went further than I am inclined to go when he said that under that section he believed we had the power to amend money bills. I do not believe that we have a right to amend money bills. We have a right to reject them as a whole but we cannot initiate or amend them. We can reject them or any other bills that come before this parliament, that is all I claim. The argument made against our powers under that clause by my hon. friend convinces me, by its weakness, more strongly than I was ever before convinced, of the powers of this House. I do not think that my hon. friend desires to lessen the powers of the Senate unfairly. In fact, I was pleased to hear him say on one occasion that he would like to see the powers of the Senate greater than they are, and perhaps it would be better if they were. I do not think that my hon. friend is justified, after the unanimous vote of the House last session and the promise of his predecessor, in opposing in any way the granting of this committee, or in attempting to lessen the scope of its investigation. The reason my hon. friend (Sir Mackenzie Bowell) asks for the committee is that he wishes to cover a larger ground of investigation than is attempted in the House of Commons, and which he believes it is in the public interest should be investigated. I am hardly disposed to agree to the suggested amendment; however, I leave my hon. friend to take any course he thinks best in that regard. I hope this is the last time we shall hear a discussion on the rights of this House to make an investigation of this kind, because it would be depriving ourselves of one of our most valued privileges, and one of our greatest means of usefulness. I believe the section of the British North America Act, quoted by my hon. friend, was designedly put there to expand the powers, privileges and immunities of the Senate, and it is worthy of note that that is the only section of the British North America Act that has been twice passed upon by the Imperial parliament. In 1873, when the difficulties arose with regard to the Pacific Railway, it was desired to appoint a committee to investigate that matter under oath, and it was found that the constitution did not give power to this House to do so, because the clause as it was originally placed in the British North America Act gave to the parliament of Canada only such powers, privileges and immunities as were possessed by the House of Commons at the time of the passage of the British North American Act in 1867; but in 1867, the time of the passage of the Union Act, the House of Commons did not possess the power of examining witnesses under oath but between 1867 and 1873 the British House of Commons had taken that power, and it was necessary to re-enact this important section of the constitution to meet altered circumstances on which we base so much the powers of this House. It was a good thing to be done, but it was done irregularly, and there was some dissatisfaction about it at the time. A motion was made in the House of Commons censuring the government for the irregular manner in which the change was made, but it was withdrawn, because the amendment to the constitution was considered a necessary one. The amendment was that the powers, privileges and immunities of the Senate should be the same as those of the British House of Commons as declared by the parliament of Canada, so long as they did not exceed the privileges of the House of Commons at the time the parliament attempted to clothe us with these privileges.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Will the hon. gentleman tell us what privileges they had then?

Hon. Mr. MILLER—That clause was twice enacted by the Imperial parliament, and if any other amendment was needed it would have been made in it at the time. I do not want to prolong this discussion. I presume the committee will be granted and that the investigation will be on the lines indicated by the leader of the opposition. It is well that this investigation should be as wide as the powers of the Senate enable us to make it. I do not think that the terms of my hon. friend's motion are wider than they should be in order that the investigation should be as comprehensive as the public interest in the case demands.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They are wider than the law warrants, that is all.

The motion was agreed to on a division.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILWAY.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be presented to the Senate, all reports and surveys made by the officers of the Department of Railways and Canals, regarding the straightening of certain curves on the Prince Edward Island Railway at or near North Wiltshire; and also, a statement showing:—

1. The amount expended on straightening the said curves, and whom paid.
2. How was the expenditure made, by tender or by day's work.
3. The nature and extent of the changes made.
4. What further changes, if any, are contemplated.

He said: I have no remarks to make at present, but merely wish to have this motion passed and I hope my hon. friend, the leader of the House, will bring down in due time the information asked for.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I cannot give my hon. friend any information at this moment, because I have not inquired of the Minister of Railways, but I have no objection to the adoption of the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (13) "An Act to amend the Mounted Police Pension Act of 1889." (Hon. Mr. Scott.)

SAFETY OF FISHERMEN BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the second reading of Bill (G) "An Act for better securing the safety of certain fishermen."

He said: Hon. gentlemen, I say with respect to this bill what the hon. gentleman has just said with respect to his—it is only a little bill; and I hope it will not take very long to discuss. Probably hon. gentlemen may not have read the bill, and it may be better that I should read part of it. The first clause is as follows:

1. No dory, flat, whaler or other boat whatsoever shall be launched or set out from any vessel engaged in deep-sea or bank fishing, for the purpose of fishing with hooks and lines, trawls or other similar appliances, or with intent that the same shall be used in so fishing, or for the purpose of examining trawls, set lines or other similar appliances for fishing, unless there is placed in such boat and retained therein during absence from such vessel an accurate and serviceable mariner's compass, and unless there is placed in such boat at least two quarts of drinking water and two pounds of solid food for each man of the crew of such boat.

2. The owner of every such vessel shall supply her at the commencement of her voyage with as many serviceable compasses as she carries boats, in addition to the vessel's compass, and also with the necessary utensils for holding water, and with a fog-horn or trumpet.

It is hardly necessary hon. gentlemen, to say anyting in favour of this bill, because it must commend itself to the common sense and sense of humanity of every hon. gentleman. Hardly a season elapses in which we do not read in the newspapers of cases of fishermen who have set out from fishing vessels, in dories, to examine trawls or to fish, and who, in case a fog or heavy breeze comes up, fail to get back to their schooner and very often suffer great privations before being rescued, or before reaching another vessel, or reaching the shore; and in some cases they have actually died in their boats. It is not necessary to go into the bill at any length. In the first place, this bill provides that in each boat there shall be a mariner's compass. It is perfectly clear that that is necessary, for if a boat leaves a vessel and a fog comes up the men in the boat are very likely to fail to be able to get back to the locality where the vessel is, and if they lose the vessel they do not know in which direction to row for land. If supplied with a compass, knowing where the vessel is, they can steer for her; and if they fail to find the vessel they can steer for the land. Then, that there should be something to eat and drink in case the boat loses the vessel seems a matter of course. This measure was before the Senate in the session of 1889, and again in the session of 1890, and in both cases it passed this House without division. I shall not refer particularly to the debate which took place further than to read what was said in 1889 by the hon. gentleman who led this House at the time, Hon. Mr. Abbott, afterwards Sir John Abbott. The quotation will be found on page 409 of the Senate debates for 1889:

Hon. Mr. ABBOTT—It does not appear to me that there has been really any substantial objection made to this Bill. (Power; one objected to it—Mr. Kaulbach.)

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—There is no necessity for it.

Hon. Mr. ABBOTT—That, I suppose, is very much a matter of opinion, and this bill appeals, at all events, to one's sense of humanity, as I read and hear frequently of losses, of deaths and wrecks that occur from neglect of precautions of the kind provided int his bill

Hon. Mr. KAULBACH—There are no cases of that kind from my county.

I may say, with respect to the Hon. Mr. Kaulbach, that he said in his county that the owners of vessels already provided them with these things and naturally, if they do, the law does not affect them.

Hon. Mr. ABBOTT—I have myself frequently read of fishing boats being lost from their schooners during a fog. What my hon. friend from Charlottetown says about the vessel moving is undoubtedly true; but it must be remembered that a sailor in a boat, knowing the general direction in which he left his vessel, could form some idea from the direction of the wind where she would be four or five hours afterwards. I do not pretend to understand the question, but I think the proposition is a good one, and if the fishermen already do these things which this bill proposes that they shall do I do not see that the bill can do any harm.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I certainly approve, as I think every other member of the House approves of the bill, but I want to know whether in the bill there is any way to ascertain that the men have the compass, water and food in the boat; is it customary, when the boat clears out, to ascertain it, or how is it to be done? If left merely at the option of the owner of the boat, there will be very little gained by this legislation. There should be some clause in the bill which would compel every vessel going out to follow the rules which are laid down in the hon. member's bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I do not rise to oppose the bill. I am very much of the opinion of the late Senator Kaulbach, that the bill is not necessary. However, it can do no harm. Perhaps there was no man in the House more qualified to give an opinion on this matter than the late Senator Kaulbach. Like myself, he came from one of the chief fishing counties in Nova Scotia. Almost without an exception vessels intended for the deep sea fisheries carry compasses for use in the boats whenever they leave the craft, and they also carry a supply of provisions for the time they expect to be out. The trouble is, however, that very often these boats go away four or five miles from their vessel, and a fog springs up, and perhaps, with overconfidence, they continue at their work, and may have drifted from their bearings, and a compass is of little use to them by the time they make up their minds to reach their vessel. They may then float about the ocean for days and their little stock of provisions, a couple of pounds of bread and so forth, gets exhausted the first day, and they may have their compass on board but it does not do them any good, as they do not know the course to steer to find their ship. They have no means of taking bearings, they may pull about in a fog and go within a mile of the vessel and not find her, and this explains how these accidents occur. I know that the fishermen almost invariably carry a compass in their boats, and the men will certainly not go away for a day's work without taking provisions with them, but it is when they get astray and when compasses are of no use to them in finding out where their vessel may be that loss of life occurs. The vessel may have had to take up anchor, or the wind may have driven the vessel away from her anchorage, and in consequence of these contingencies the sad loss of life that we so often read of happens. As I said before, I do not intend to oppose my hon. friend's bill. It can do no harm; it will only comply with the customs that prevail. I do not think there has been any petition for it, and therefore it is a strong proof of the position I take, that it is not a very necessary bill.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—It is a good thing for a man to have a compass on board.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—They are never without it.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—If they have them already this can do them no harm. If they have a compass on board they can tell which direction is east or west, or north or south. They know when starting from their vessel in what direction they go, and which way the wind was, and that should give them an idea how to get back. I would like to see the law give them a little more water and a little more provisions. It may not go far enough in that way. I am sure that the Senate ought to be satisfied to have such a bill passed. I would like to see it. These men are engaged in a hazardous industry and they should be protected as far as possible. Owners of vessels may want to save a little money, but the life of a poor fisherman ought to be protected as far as possible. I am glad the hon. gentleman has brought in the bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

CANADIAN MINING REGULATIONS BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Second Reading (Bill E) An Act to amend the Canadian Mining Regulations for the Yukon.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON moved that the Order of the Day be discharged and that it be made the first Order of the Day on Thursday next.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have no desire to impede the progress of the hon. gentleman's bill, but the House will be engaged in discussing the Yukon Bill on that day, and I think it is going too far to make this the first Order of the Day.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is this not a bill almost exclusively within the province of the government?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is a bill to amend the regulations which have been adopted by the Governor in Council, and my hon. friend proposes—I dare say he has very good reason for it—to amend those regulations, but I am inclined to think it is a matter which pertains almost exclusively to the action of the government and not to private individuals.

The order was allowed to stand.

The Senate adjourned.

YUKON RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MILLS moved the second reading of Bill (6) "An Act to confirm an agreement between Her Majesty and Wm. Mackenzie and Donald D. Mann and to incorporate the Canadian Yukon Railway Company." He said: This bill, the second reading of which I now move in this House, is one of immense importance, not only to the country, but also to this body. It was passed in the House of Commons by an immense majority—by a House of Commons that has been as little under the control of the administration as any House of Commons that has been elected since the establishment of this union. The bill deals with an important section of the public domain of this country, and in that respect it is a bill dealing with the public revenues of the Crown. Under the constitution, such measure is under the special jurisdiction of the House of Commons, as much so as if it had been a bill making an appropriation of a portion of the public money. It is the opinion of some hon. gentlemen in both Houses of parliament, and of some who are not members of either House, that a money compensation ought to have been given instead of a subsidy in land. The government thought otherwise. We knew the temper of the House of Commons, and I think also we knew the temper of the country. And so far as we could ascertain either the House of Commons, who are representatives of the people, nor the people whom they represented favoured a money subsidy; and so the government have done in this matter that which in their opinion best comports with public opinion, with the wishes of the community, and with the view of a vast majority of those who sit in the House of Commons. They have undertaken to aid in the construction of this road into the Yukon country by a subsidy in land. There is a strong feeling throughout the country that we have been moving too rapidly in the way of granting money subsidies to public enterprises; that the people of this country and the resources of the people which are available for the purpose of government, have been already very severely taxed in the construction of great works and undertakings and we are of opinion—and this opinion has been confirmed by the action of the House of Commons—that it was in the public interest that the country which was to be opened up for occupation, to which ingress was to be afforded to those who might go thither, should, out of those natural resources which were being made available, contribute to the increased cost of government in consequence of what was their being done. The lands of the Crown in the Yukon country, being a part of the public revenues, like other portions of the revenue are under the special jurisdiction of the House of Commons, and therefore this bill could not originate in this House. It was a measure that could only originate in the House of Commons. And with regard to the appropriation of the public revenues that was made by it for the purpose of furthering this enterprise, it could not be amended in this House. The Senate in this matter, the same as in any other appropriation of public revenues, can approve or disapprove of what it has before it. The matter is one of peculiar interest, therefore, to the House. Hon. gentlemen who were in the Senate in 1874 will remember a case in which the Senate undertook to amend a bill relating to the appropriation of lands in the North-west Territories. That measure was carefully considered in the other chamber by men distinguished for their knowledge of parliamentary law and parliamentary procedure, and it was then decided that an appropriation of public lands did not differ from an appropriation of public money, and that it was not in the power of the Senate to alter or amend the appropriation, to increase the amount of land that was proposed to be granted; and I think that from that time down to the present that view has been acted upon. There is, I apprehend, hon. gentlemen, no doubt upon this point—and I refer to it for the purpose of showing what are the special functions of the House of Commons in this matter and what are the powers which belong to the Senate. We have decided in this matter to aid this railway enterprise by a subsidy in land, that is a benefit conferred or a compensation given to these contractors who have entered into a contract with the government to construct this railway within a certain period of time. If we had given a money compensation, there would be no doubt as to the power of the House of Commons in the matter. It would have been a beneficial contribution from the public treasury, and what has been done is supposed to be at least equally advantageous to the contractors—it is a contribution from the public resources, it is a value bestowed. That value may at the present time not be one which is easily ascertained, but it is a value which makes it a part of the revenues of the Crown and brings it under exactly the same constitutional provisions which apply to the appropriation of public money. It is not necessary to detain hon. gentlemen with a consideration of the question whether it was better that the grant of aid should have been in money, or whether it should have been a subsidy of land. With us, from what I have said, it will be seen that this is only an academic question. It may be one of interest, but it possesses no greater interest to this honourable body than it does to any other body of citizens well informed, and who take an interest in the discussion of the subject. In the opinion of the government, the House of Commons, in approving of an appropriation of public lands rather than an appropriation of public money, decided wisely. The prevailing sentiment of the country corresponds with this view; and under any circumstances, even if we did not think it were the best, since it is the public view, it is one entitled to be treated with respect. I am not going to detain this House with the consideration or discussion of the question whether the government could have let this contract at an earlier period, whether the construction of this railway might not have been earlier begun. If it could have been, that is the fault of the government and not the fault of the contractors. It does not, in the smallest degree, detract from the value of the undertaking. If it was proper to begin this undertaking three months ago, it has not become an improper thing since. We ought not to confound the mistakes of the government, if there be mistakes (and I do not admit that there have been any in this matter), with the merits of the undertaking. The project is not bad because it was not begun sooner. This House has before it now much the same information which the government had when this work was projected. It has the report of Dr. Dawson, the report of Mr. Ogilvie and the report of Mr. Jennings. The first two of these reports give us but little information with regard to railway construction. They deal with the geological and mineral features of the Yukon country. They give us a great deal of valuable information upon that subject, but in respect to railway construction, they did not afford the government any material assistance. It was known ten years ago that there was gold in the Yukon, but whether it was in paying quantities or not was not a matter upon which any government was informed. The distance from the settled portions of Canada in which that sub-arctic country lies is such as to have made it, almost ever since confederation, a neglected country. It is one upon which but little information was had, because it was not supposed to have any special value. We have immense districts capable of being utilized for settlement to which our attention was directed and upon which our resources have been expended. We have endeavoured by large expenditures to secure immigration, and to increase in this way the population of Canada and to increase its wealth and prosperity. Many of the districts upon which large sums have been expended are still unoccupied districts, and though neither those who have preceded them in office, nor this government at the beginning were disposed to hasten railway construction in the Yukon country; they had, in their estimation, a large number of projects on hand which had not yet produced those results which it was thought reasonable to expect. A year ago gold seekers hastened into the Kootenay country. This government had been but a few months in office. They had pressed on their attention the necessity of furnishing those people with greater facilities for ingress and egress, and to furnish to the manufacturing and mercantile classes of the country whatever market there might be secured to them by sales to the population that had gone thither. For the purpose of securing that market, and for the purpose of furnishing greater facilities to the miners and to the capitalists who have gone into that portion of British Columbia, the government undertook the construction by subsidy to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company the railway to the Crow's Nest Pass. That road is nearly completed. More than 300 miles of railway will have been constructed this year, but before the year had expired, and before that work was completed, the government were pressed to undertake the work of railway construction into the Yukon country. When, then, you consider the magnitude of the work that is pressing on the attention of the government at this moment, it is easy to see that the government have not been indifferent, nor are they open to the charge that they have not exercised sufficient attention and energy to further the public interest in these regards. It cannot be said that we have been dilatory and negligent in this respect in the discharge of our duties. We are not the authors of the circumstances which have impelled us onward. We have endeavoured to be awake to our times and to join in the march which has carried the people of this country forward at no inconsiderable pace during the past twelve months. It was not, however, I may say to hon. gentlemen, until immigration began to flow into the Yukon country in such numbers as to make it necessary to appoint administrative officers for the enforcement of law, for the protection of life and of property and for the administration of justice, that the government felt itself impelled to act. It is not necessary that the government, having under its jurisdiction an immense territory such as ours, the greater portion of which is still unoccupied and uninhabited, to follow every explorer, wherever he may go, with a railway charter or with an executive officer and judge. We acted, I think, in the Yukon country as soon as the circumstances justified that action in the matter of government and of administration, and in the matter of railway construction, in affording a highway to those who may wish to go into that country or wish to have egress from it, we have acted as soon as the circumstances of the country justified our action, as soon as it was apparent that the numbers who were going thither were such as as to require from us what we were now doing. We therefore found it necessary to make regulations to secure miners' claims as soon as the placer mining was begun in that country, to determine their extent, to give a certain amount of security to those who undertook to work them, to state the conditions upon which this work might be carried on and to make such additional provisions as might afford to the government some revenue to enable it to meet the additional expenditure that was thereby incurred. I may say to hon. gentlemen that from looking at the map few realize the vast extent of territory that is under our jurisdiction, and in which, at the present moment, we are obliged to make provision for the enforcement of the law. If we except the empire of Russia, I apprehend we have on this North American continent the most extensive region under any one government. Formerly we had the town of Winnipeg upon our frontier. We regarded that as a distant place. Later there was Calgary, a thousand miles further west; then Vancouver and Victoria, that are three thousand miles away; but when you are at Victoria you are still 1,500 miles from the town of Dawson. This will give to hon.

gentlemen some idea of the extent of this country, stretching more than 1,000 miles to the east and nearly 5,000 miles to the north-west into the Yukon district. Beside the immense distance that this district is from the capital, there are political and geographical impediments which increase the inaccessibility of that country. The physical obstacles that intervene are very serious, but those physical obstacles would be far less serious were it not that our neighbours hold several hundred miles of the sea coast, and have in their possession those gates of admission to the Yukon country through which entrance to it can be most easily had. It is unfortunate for this country that that strip of coast should be in the possession of our neighbours. It formerly belonged to the government of Russia. They claimed it by discovery and occupation from the sea shore, while the British government claimed the whole interior of the country in consequence of what had been done by a Canadian trading company—the North-west Company. That company which was organized at the city of Albany, in the province of New York, while it was still a British province, and, after the American revolution, was transplanted to Montreal, carried on its trading enterprises to the Arctic Sea, and along the Pacific Coast, down to the Gulf of California, and it was in consequence of its enterprise and energy, its indomitable perseverance and its great successes, that the government of England was enabled successfully to claim the territories which we now hold both in British Columbia and in the Yukon district. The political situation of the Yukon country is as important as its commercial situation, and in dealing with this bill and the contract into which the government have entered for the purpose of securing the construction of this road, the political consideration is in my opinion paramount. The question of commercial advantage must always be, as long as the shore is in the hands of another country, the paramount consideration for us. The holding of that territority puts, as I have said, all the convenient gateways into the Yukon country into the hands of our neighbours. Whether we would be permitted, if we did not construct an independent route, to send the products of this country through the United States borderland without the payment of duty would depend entirely upon their grace and favour. I do not think it would be possible that anything more calamitous to this country could happen than that we should abandon the project of constructing a highway upon our own soil and depend upon a highway through this strip of border territory, held by the United States, into the Yukon country. If we did so, we would every day in the year and every hour in the day be dependent on the grace and favour of our neighbours as to whether the products of Canada could pass from the older portions of the country into the Yukon country or not. It was, therefore, important when this question came before the government for solution that it should aim at accomplishing two things—access to the country, and the maintenance of its authority over the population that may be found in it. Before I enter upon the discussion of the highways that may be established through United States territory, let me call the attention of hon. gentlemen to what may be done within our own. There are three routes which may be opened within Canada to the Yukon country. We may begin at Yorktown and extend that railway that is constructed from Portage la Prairie to that point in a north-westerly direction to Prince Albert across the Saskatchewan, in a north-westerly direction into the Peace River country, and so on into the Yukon district. We could also extend a road from Edmonton northward. If we began at Yorktown our road would be over 2,000 miles in length; if at Edmonton, we would require to construct 1,600 miles of railway; and if we were to build a mile a day it would require over five years to complete a railway upon that line. Now, I admit for agricultural purposes, starting either at Yorktown or Edmonton, an immense country could be opened up suitable for agricultural settlement. I have no doubt whatever that some day that will be done. But the construction of a road upon that line at the present time was an impossibility. It would not in any degree meet the exigencies of the situation. We require admission into the Yukon country at once if we are to control and govern its population and to furnish the means of ingress and egress required, and it could not be done upon this line and without the lapse of several years, and several years could not go by if we were to hold the Yukon country. Then we could start from Ashcroft on the Canadian Pacific Railway and follow the old telegraph trial and reach the Yukon district from that point, but that would be a railway of very considerable length and would occupy a considerable period of time in its construction. I am told that there is every reason to believe that there are great mineral resources upon this line, as there are great agricultural resources opon the first that I have mentioned ; but neither upon the onenor upon the other could a railway be constructed by any resources that the government of Canada could command in time to give us that security for our possessions which the circumstances of the moment call for. Then there was the third line in which you start either from Portland Canal or Observatory Inlet and extend from there northward to Telegraph Creek and on to Teslin Lake. Now this is the line which has been adopted, and we began our construction at the middle point. We began at Telegraph Creek on the Stikine River and by our contract with Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann they are to construct that road by the 1st September northward so as to be fit for traffic and travel by the 1st September next. We did not begin at Observatory Inlet, because the southern portion of this line is not absolutely necessary at the present moment, and that would have required at least two years in the construction of the road, whereas we will be able within a few months to establish communication in the way marked out. In this method of construction that has been adopted we are enabled to utilize the navigation of the Stikine River. We have the navigation of that river secured to us for commercial purposes by treaty with the United States, and we are by the provisions of that treaty enabled to utilize the river up to the border of our own territory, and to navigate it within our own territory till we reach the initial point mentioned. The government will, in all probability, have a wagon road constructed before the summer is ended from Telegraph Creek southward to Observatory Inlet, which will afford a basis for railway construction if it becomes necessary to complete this part of the line.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—How many miles is that ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—About 200 miles—180 miles, I am told, to Portland Inlet, and to Observatory Inlet a few miles further. Now the United States hold those ways which start from the Lynn Inlet, which is several hundred miles further north. There is the Dalton Trail, there is a height over the pass from Dyea, and there is the height over the pass from Skagway.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Do they not claim the Portland Canal as well ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No ; they claim that the boundary begins at the head of Portland Canal, and they say that Portland Canal is common water to both. Observatory Inlet is wholly within Canadian territory, but Portland Inlet is on the border, according to the United States contention, and so from Portland Inlet we cannot be excluded. Now, from a commercial point of view, the highway that may be constructed on the Dalton Trail has, no doubt, advantages over the road that we are about to construct. There is sea navigation several hundred miles further north. The railway distance is consequently shorter. You are nearer Dawson City at Dyea than you are at Telegraph Creek. There is no doubt of that ; but when you construct a railway on the Dalton Trail, or through either of the passes which I have mentioned, you have a railway which the government of the United States controls. Whether you send in any products of Canadian industry through that way or not, will depend entirely on them. They could not, if you had difficulties in that country, permit you to send in either troops or police or arms and equipment of any kind. It is perfectly clear that no government at Washington, if you had fifty or sixty thousand people of United States birth, or who are citizens of the United States, in that country who would undertake to lead any insurrection, or do what the adventurers did in Texas, or what the British population did at Johannesburg, it would be utterly impossible for any United States government, however much it might sympathize with you, to allow you to send a single rifle or volunteer, or a pound of ammunition through that territory for the purpose of sustaining your authority.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Would not that apply to the Stikine River route as well ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend asks would not that apply to the Stikine route as well? Certainly not, because a great portion of your supplies could be easily sent in as merchandise.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I mean troops.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I told my hon. friend that the government proposed making a highway immediately, or to ask parliament to furnish an appropriation for that purpose, from Portland Inlet, or from Observatory Inlet to the initial point of this railway.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Could you send in soldiers from the Stikine?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We could send them from Portland Canal.

Hon. Mr. MILLER — But from the Stikine?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If we had difficulty, I suppose we could not. But one important thing that so far as the Stikine is concerned, we could send in food and clothing, we could send in those articles which contribute to the comfort of a population, and which would prevent unrest, discontent and insurrection. I say that in the construction of this road we are obliged to bear in mind its political features. You must consider the importance of having a railway constructed wholly upon Canadian territory.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—You are doing, under the provisions of this contract, as much as it is possible to do in one year; you are doing it at that point which will contribute in the highest degree to the utility of the work and you are at the same time constructing a way that becomes an essential part of the continuous road down to the sea. I say all these are matters of immense consequence, and all these are things which ought not to be overlooked. Upon the Lynn Inlet, just at present in the possession of the United States, they have several towns that depend for their existence upon the trade which has arisen in consequence of that being the chief highway into the Yukon country. The population of those towns, the trade which is done in them would all be within the territory of Canada if your railway was wholly within the territory of Canada. I say, then, commercially although this route is longer than a route constructed through the United States territory that the increase of population and the increase of trade upon those points that become the base of departure would be transferred to Canada instead of being in the United States. If we make the political question paramount we must have the road in Canadian territory. We cannot afford to have a railway constructed in the United States. My hon. friends, I see, have, in some cases, referred to the fact that a United States line, if a railway were constructed, would be most convenient. I am not disputing that fact, but I am calling attention to the fact that it would be a United States line, and if you hold the country you would still have a Canadian line to construct and you would have the whole burden of the maintenance and defence of that road thrown upon the government. If you construct a line wholly in Canadian territory, and if you decline to afford facilities for the construction of a road through the United States borderland, you secure the commercial as well as the political use of the railway, and by securing that commercial use you make the road self sustaining, and you relieve the public treasury of the burden that otherwise fall upon it. The gold mining population within the next year in the Yukon country, if the ordinary anticipations of the public are realized, will certainly be not less than 100,000. Nine-tenths of the population are likely to be aliens. The most that we can hope for is that they will be indifferent to public and political affairs. They are citizens of another country and knowing that the most convenient ways into our country are in the hands of their own government, they are naturally anxious that the highways into the Yukon country should be constructed through this border strip of territory. If that were done, it is perfectly obvious that the territory would be for all commercial purposes annexed to the United States, and cease to be in that regard Canadian territory. That is a matter which cannot be overlooked, and whoever proposes to construct a railway from Lynn Inlet into the territory of the Yukon will bear in mind that, in doing so, they are proposing to place the trade of the Yukon country entirely under United States control. I would like to know if the goods that are shipped from Victoria and from Vancouver to-day, which are sent westward from Montreal and Toronto, had imposed upon them at Dyea or Skagway fifty or sixty per cent, such as the United States tariff proposes, how much of those goods would go through? Is it not clear to every one that every miner who would go into the country, whether a Canadian or an American, would buy his supplies on the United States side of the border in order that he might escape the vexations of the custom-house, and I say we cannot overlook that, and that whatever concessions the government of the United States may make to us for the moment, if the road was once constructed and we were thereby put in their power, then those regulations would be made just what they pleased. We know that the bill, which I have here in my possession, that was passed in the United States Senate, imposed regulations and restraints contrary to our treaty rights were they to be made law, is a pretty clear indication of what the feelings of the western people are with respect to our possessions in that part of the country. They cannot understand, after putting impediments in our way, after enacting alien labour laws and imposing restrictions of various kinds, thinking we were entirely in their power—I say, they cannot understand how it is that we can have any territory or any rights near the Pacific coast which would give us special advantages. Now, I am most anxious that we should be on terms of good neighbourhood—I am quite willing to deal liberally with our neighbours across the way, as liberally as they will deal with us, but while I am disposed to live on terms of friendship, I am not, for the sake of being called a friend, disposed to place the resources and the future prospects and the future hopes of this country at the mercy of our neighbours, however generous they might be disposed to be. There are associated with every government as it grows in wealth and in population, duties which impose increased responsibility. These are of great consequence and it is important that those who are entrusted with the conduct of public affairs should have the courage to face them boldly and incur the burdens and responsibilities that are associated with them. Now, we have duties imposed upon us by the recent discoveries in the Yukon country and by the influx of population into that part of Canada. It is necessary that life should be there supported and protected, and that the law should be effectually administered, and order and good government should be maintained. It is as important as the commercial side of the question to the material prosperity of the country. Without law and order, without security for life and property, prosperity cannot exist, and therefore the political side of this question is just as important to be considered as the commercial side. We have also to consider how we are to uphold the Dominion of the sovereign in that country, and this I say can only be done by the construction of a railway wholly under the control of Canadian law and Canadian authority, a railway upon our own territory, the use of which we may regulate and which we shall not use by sufferance. I admit that the friendship and good will of the United States are worth a great deal, but I am not willing that a deadly blow should be struck at the future of this country in order to satisfy the wishes of those who are seeking to supplant us in the markets of the Yukon country. I am pleased to be able to call the attention of this honourable House to some observations that were addressed to the House of Commons by the leader of the opposition. There is much in a very able speech which the leader of the opposition made in the House of Commons to which I do not subscribe, but there are many observations contained in that speech to which I do cordially subscribe, and I beg to invite the attention of hon. gentlemen to some of these observations. Sir Charles Tupper said, in addressing the House of Commons on this subject a few days ago:

> I believe it would be impossible to overrate the importance to Canada of securing, at the earliest possible moment, and as far as practicable, an all Canadian route, so that that great trade shall accrue to the benefit of Canada, instead of benefiting a foreign country. In my judgment, from the first moment the great importance of that Canadian Yukon gold field attracted public attention, there has been a most determined effort on the part of the United States of America and of citizens of that country to grasp and turn to their own advantage all the enormous benefit that is to be derived from the furnishing of supplies to the people who go in there, and to provide for their transit into and out of the country. Therefore, when my attention was directed to this subject, I gave it the most careful consideration in my power, regarding it, not as a party question, but as one of vital importance to every Canadian; and having felt it my duty to examine the question, in the light of all the information I could get while on the Pacific coast, where I was receiving a great deal of attention, I came to the conclusion that the route by the Stikine River and Teslin Lake was, not only the best route, but the only available route for the construction of a railway during the present season.

Now that is the opinion of Sir Charles Tupper, who is interested in the trade of that country and who visited the country to the west with a view to obtaining all the information on the subject possible.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—He took it all back.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, my hon. friend is mistaken. He is conservative in his habits and so is not likely to change so readily.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Read the speech through.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Let me take another quotation :

It has been stated in the press that the question at present between the opposition and the hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches is a question between the Stikine route, as to which the contract has been made, and another and different route which is promoted by parties with whom Lord Rothschild was connected. I have no hesitation in saying at once that I entertain no such opinion. I have no hesitation in saying that I should oppose much more strenuously the expenditure of a dollar of public aid or any assistance whatever from the government to the latter route than I would to this.

And I do not well see how he could put his views stronger or more decisively in favour of the route which the government has selected, and to which this contract relates, than he has done in the two paragraphs which I have read. Then again he says :

I infinitely prefer the route now under consideration to any route that crosses a foot of territory claimed by the United States, and all the other routes to which I have referred are open to that objection. From Pyramid Harbour down to Dyea and Skagway and Taku Inlet—not so much Taku Inlet, but all the others ; the Taku Inlet route is placed beyond consideration by the fact that glaciers render it absolutely dangerous for vessels to attempt to reach that inlet—but all the other routes from the Pacific coast are, in my judgment, infinitely more objectionable than the route now under consideration. There are other routes—all-Canadian routes. There is the projected route from Ashcroft by the old Telegraph trail away through to Telegraph Creek. There is the route through Edmonton, and also the route from Prince Albert, whose greater length would perhaps render it more objectionable. These are all Canadian routes, but not routes that can be made valuable to-day for the purpose of facilitating ingress into that country. It is on that ground that while I feel that the Edmonton, and the Prince Albert, and the Ashcroft routes will all furnish valuable trails, their long distance from the sea is against their practicability from a commercial and national point of view, as compared with the route chosen.

So Sir Charles Tupper in that speech discusses the various Canadian routes and United States routes, and he has made to the adoption of any one of these United States routes exactly the same objection that I have made here to-day. He has also made the same objection to the adoption of either of the other two Canadian routes—the length of time required for their construction and the impossibility of bringing a railway into operation in sufficient time to enable us to retain that country and to continue to govern it and control its trade. I hardly think these observations of Sir Charles Tupper will be questioned here.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Did Sir Charles Tupper approve of the price we are paying?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will come to that in a while. I ask my hon. friend's indulgence until I reach that part of my speech. This is a measure from the responsibility of which no Canadian, who is called on to vote, can escape. It involves the question whether we are to remain master of our own possessions or not. It involves one of the most important questions, one of the most serious questions that has ever come before a legislative body to determine, because it is impossible to seriously argue that we can retain the control of the trade of that country, or that we can effectively govern it except by the suffrage of the population which continues there, if we do not also possess the means of ingress and egress to the country. Objections have been made to the use of the Stikine River as a temporary expedient and for temporary purposes. We can freely use that river for commercial purposes, and no doctrine of international law is better established than this, that where you have the right of navigation you have also, as an incident to that right, the right of transhipment, of loading and unloading and of mooring to the shore. The legislature of the United States have, no doubt, the right to make regulations such as would protect them against smuggling from Canadian vessels going into that territory, but they would have no right to make regulations that would impose special burdens upon Canadian trade. Our goods that are transhipped, that are loaded and unloaded, are not subject to the tariff of that country. Under the treaty of St. Petersburg, when the boundary was agreed upon between the governments of England and of Russia, the absolute right of navigation was secured, not merely in the three rivers mentioned in the Washington treaty, but in all the rivers which flow through that narrow strip of territory from ours to the sea. That right of navigation, which was a territorial, a sovereign right, because it was associated with the settlement of the boundary and was a condition upon which the boundary was accepted by both countries, was overlooked at the time the Washington treaty was negotiated. The Americans spoke to the British representative on that occasion as if it was a concession by them for the first time, and they offered us, in consideration for concessions made to them, the right to navigate the Porcupine, Stikine and Yukon Rivers, through United States territory, to the sea for commercial purposes. That is an easement instead of a proprietary right. Whether our right under the treaty of St. Petersburg continued after that provision of the Washington treaty or not, was raised in the case of a party who had committed a murder in our territory, in the upper waters of the Stikine. He was arrested and sent to Victoria for trial. He was sent down the Stikine River to the territory of the United States. The United States government demanded his release. The Canadian government maintained that it had the right to take him down the river under the treaty of St. Petersburg, and our view was pressed by Mr. Blake upon the attention of the Colonial Office, who brought the matter under the attention of the law officers of the Crown, but they said that the government of the United Kingdom, having entered into a treaty with the United States, and having accepted the navigation of the Stikine, the Porcupine and the Yukon Rivers for commercial purposes only, their rights were limited by that condition of the treaty. That correspondence will be found, I think, in the papers of 1877 or 78, I forget which, but I remember very well the discussion. It was raised by Mr. Blake specially for the purpose of compelling the law officers of the Crown of England to pass upon the question. Upon this question the leader of the opposition in the same speech from which I have quoted before ——

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Is that the speech on the address?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, it is the speech on the Yukon Bill. He said:

> The United States bought that country but they could not get what Russia could not give. Unfortunately, by an oversight that treaty was renewed with the United States of America who knew that the people of Canada and every British subject possessed an indefeasible right to go in and out of the river Stikine without let or hindrance of any kind whatever. Those are the words of the treaty and in the new treaty they provide that we have the right of free navigation of the Stikine River subject to such regulations as might be found necessary.

The words of the treaty are "the free navigation of the river for commercial purposes." I agree with the view which was expressed by the leader of the opposition in the other chamber. The discussion of the treaty of St. Petersburg has only an academic value to-day. Our rights rest upon the treaty of Washington. We have the right to use the river for commercial purposes, and that right I say enables us, for commercial purposes, to connect our trade from Victoria or some other port upon our western coast, with the railway which we are about to construct to the Stikine River without being subject to the control of the United States tariff or any other control than that which the establishment of reasonable police regulation to prevent smuggling and to prevent the commission of crime may make necessary. Let me say to hon. gentlemen, the government and parliament of this country thought it proper to construct the Sault Ste. Marie Canal at a very large cost, not simply for commercial but rather for political purposes, because there was no impediment in the way of using the United States canal nor had any ever arisen. How much more important is it that we should have from distant portions of our country within our own territory the means of intercourse? In the case of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, if the Americans refused to allow the troops to go through, the transhipment might give rise to some inconvenience, but could not occasion any very great delay. The distance is very short, the impediments to pass from the lower waters to those above are not very serious, but the government of Canada considered it right, in order to be in a position more effectively to exercise jurisdiction and control over the territories, to construct that canal and to construct it at a great cost. I say I do not call in question the propriety of that Act, but if that was proper under the circumstances, how much more appropriate, how much more necessary is it that this road should be built in order that if difficulties should arise in the Yukon country, our authority might be effectively asserted. Several towns have sprung up, in the last year or two, along the border of the Lynn Inlet. United States custom-houses have been established there. The people who have gone thither claim that the mountain height that surrounds the bay, which we say is the utmost of the claim that it would be possible for them to make, is not a limitary line of boundary at all, that they are entitled, under the treaty of St. Petersburg, to measure ten marine leagues from the coast, and so to extend their jurisdiction to Lake Bennett, and several United States people went thither and established a municipality, erected the United States flag and asserted the United States authority. Now, we felt that that territory was clearly within our territory, that the utmost claim that they would be entitled to make would be the summit of the passes, and in order to protect our rights—because possession is in matters of this sort of immense consequence—we have stationed a considerable body of police in each of those passages, and the custom-house has been removed from the vicinity of Lake Bennett to the summit of each of these passes. Our policemen who are stationed there—I think 20 or 25 at each place—have supplies furnished them for eight months. But how are we to get supplies in when those supplies are exhausted? It is in the power of the United States government at any moment to say, "no further supplies shall be sent in for police purposes, no arms shall be carried through, no ammunition shall be carried through." They could hardly say that no man shall go through, because he could go through in civilian's clothes. That is the condition of things, and until we make a road on our own territory we will, after those supplies are exhausted, retain our authority by the forbearance and sufferance of our neighbours. Now, I say that it would be a most humiliating condition if it should arise, and it is one that no man, having a proper regard, at all events from my point of view, for the honour and self-respect of his country, would like to see enforced upon this country, and the only way that you can peacefully maintain your authority and uphold the jurisdiction which has been asserted is by the construction of this railway, by some person or other, at the earliest possible moment, and it is consideration such as the one which I have mentioned which induced the government to press for this agreement, because these political considerations are of a greater consequence than any theory we may have of the admiration of public affairs and any question of mere cost.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—How does this route meet these political considerations?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I say to my hon. friend that it does in the way that I have mentioned.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Does not the American Transportation Company supply the mounted police today at Dawson city?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They were the source of supply. We have the right of navigation of the Stikine, and we have the right to carry up supplies, too, after the police are in the country. I dare say no government will ask who ate the food or used the clothes that were taken in.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—You could not send in arms or ammunition.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Except as merchandise. I suppose a merchant sending in arms or ammunition would not be prevented although if a rebellion should arise, then the government of the United States might be called upon by its own people to intervene.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—We would not want the ammunition otherwise.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Now, I have already pointed out that if the highway in this country is constructed through United States territory, we will be in a position of absolute dependence and that for all commercial purposes the Yukon territory will be annexed to the United States. You might claim political jurisdiction, you might by sufferance assert your authority, but you could only do so by forbearance, because until the highway is constructed you have no means of reaching that territory. Now bear this in mind, that if you have perhaps not more than one-tenth Canadians, not more than one-fifth or one-fourth of the population British, however friendly the government of the United States might be, you could not expect that it would actively interfere on your behalf. If you had a foreign population there that once obtained ascendency, the only way up to the present time of bringing them up to subjection would be by blockading the coast and starving out the whole population, but that would be war. That would be war against the people of the United States and it would be in the highest degree unwise, it seems to me, for the people of this country to neglect to establish a highway at the earliest possible period upon their own soil. Now I say that the leader of the opposition in the other House is in entire accord with the government on this question. He agrees with them that we have taken the only route that is open to us, the only route that is available and that meets the exigencies. He also agrees with us that it is of the very first importance that the road should be constructed immediately, and that our authority should be asserted. There is no difference between him and us upon these two questions. The point of difference is, however: he thinks the road ought to be built by the government instead of by contractors, and that the amount granted is larger than ought to have been given for that purpose. Now I am not going, at this moment, to discuss that question; I shall do so before I have done speaking. I have already called the attention of the House to the fact that if the United States government were to say that we shall not send troops up the Stikine River, that we are only entitled to use it for commercial purposes, nevertheless that if we can use that highway for commercial purposes, as we are using it and the way of chief importance during the period of quiet and peace that nevertheless we could easily march our volunteers and could easily send forward our military supplies from Observatory Inlet or from Portland Inlet to the southern extremity of this railway. I am sure that the people of this country will be prepared to make some sacrifice for the maintenance of our authority in that country. I am sure that they will not be indifferent to the assertion of our rights and to the adoption of all reasonable means which may be necessary for their maintenance. Many a state might have escaped great wars and great hardships, if it had made extreme concessions to its neighbours. It preferred to take the risk of war, rather than to subject itself to political degradation. Great trials and great burdens have followed from such contests, but the state that risked its existence for the maintenance of its rights and interests, has always risen to a higher level, in consequence of the sacrifices which it has made, and we, in the maintenance of our jurisdiction over that country, in full realization of the duties that devolve upon us in our readiness to take the responsibility of giving, to whoever may go thither, the means of ingress and egress and the means of obtaining the necessary supplies and clothing while thither—I say in doing this, we will act in accordance with the public wishes and our conduct will meet with the public approbation. There can be no doubt that there are other considerations than mere commercial, that every community must consider if it remains a self-respecting community, and those national characteristics which are developed by these sacrifices, by meeting the difficulties that present themselves are of far more consequence to the prosperity of a country, are far more powerful contributors to that prosperity than those commercial considerations that sometimes are chiefly taken into account. Why, let any one compare to-day China and Japan, or Scotland and Venezuela, and he will see, as history shows, how little the prosperity of a country depends upon the salubrity of its climate or upon the fertility of its soil. It depends upon the character and enterprise and indomitable perseverance and courage of its population; and these are characteristics which may be developed or which may be smothered. In meeting a difficulty such as presents itself on this occasion, in meeting the obstacles which are put in our way by persons living in San Francisco and Seattle and Juneau, who come here for the purpose of pressing forward other schemes and who go to Washington and get the Senate to go a certain distance in legislation to frighten us or the capitalists in England—I say these parties should not deter us from the discharge of our duties and the maintenance of our rights. That is what is being attempted—that is what ought not to be yielded to. The measure which the government are pressing upon the attention of this House, which was before the other chamber, which received the support of an overwhelming majority there, is a measure in the public interest, a measure for upholding Canada's authority and strengthening a spirit of union and of nationality in this country, and of making the people of Canada, so far as they ought to be, a self-contained people, capable of maintaining their own rights, capable of holding together, capable of developing their own resources remaining the masters of their own destiny. Let me say this with regard to the subsidy that is given. We are told that we have given far too much land. I confess, hon. gentlemen, that I do not understand the force of that observation. If we were making an appropriation of agricultural land, we know that the more that is given the greater the advantage which the company receiving it has conferred upon it. You have before you, visibly, the character of the soil, whether it is fertile or whether it is arable, whether the climate is too dry or whether it is a moist climate, which is likely to give the cultivator of the soil sure and certain crops every year—you know precisely what you are getting. When dealing with mineral lands you are placed in a little different position. Take, for instance, this grant; there has not been discovered in the country a placer mine in any gulch or creek where the gold deposit is one hundred yards in width. If, instead of going three miles back on either side, we had allowed the parties to follow the sinuosites of the river, and had given them a strip of territory one hundred yards wide of the same length that is given to them now, they would have had just 108th part of the amount of territory they possess. So far as the placer mining is concerned, they would have had exactly what they have at this moment. Is it not, then, little short of nonsense to speak about the cost of this being an evidence of an extravagant bargain? Why, sir, you lay down a line giving the general direction of a river or valley; you allow the placer mining operations to be carried on there, and you measure back three miles on each side, but if you follow the sinuosities of the river the contractor is just as well of if he has 100 yards width as if he had those six miles in depth three miles on each side. Every miner knows that; every one who has considered the question with any care knows that. Then is it not nonsense, under these circumstances, to say that the grant in the respect is an extravagant one. Let me call attention to the question of the quartz mining, for that after all is a very important matter. I am told that some gentlemen addressing certain senators here to-day informed them that nobody knew anything about this 45 miles from Dawson, and if his view is correct the whole placer deposits might be taken out within the next six weeks, and the company would have no placer mining at all. But I put that to one side. I call your attention to the fact that the extent of the area is no indication of the amount of gold that has been granted. Let me again refer, as I was about to do, to the quartz mining. Every one knows that in quartz mining more than ninety per cent is taken up in the form of wages, and there is a moderate interest upon the capital, and in that country quartz explorations are more difficult than in any country in the world where gold has ever been discovered. Let hon. gentlemen bear this in mind, that except upon the tops of the hills and mountains the whole country is covered with moss, some places two feet in depth, in nearly every place, I am told, from one to two feet in depth. All that has to be removed before you can make an examination at all. You have difficulties, you have expense to be incurred in order to do your prospecting which exists nowhere else. Then I ask how can it be said that these men have received too much? Let me say this further: I have already pointed out the percentage that is required in order to pay the ordinary expenses of getting the gold out of the ground. Why I notice some times in the newspapers articles written as if the gold, without a copper's expense, if any exists in the lands which this company are to receive, can be taken out without any expense at all; that if there are ten or twenty millions there, they have ten or twenty millions in their possession and there is nothing to be expended in order to get it. Is that so? Does not every man know that is not so? Does not every hon. gentleman in this House who has investigated the subject of gold mining, know that the universal testimony is that the value of the labour spent in mines, in the richest and best mines in the world, is always equal to the value of the gold that has been received.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Why do you take ten per cent royalty from them?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman knows that that 10 per cent is conditional. The party gets $2,500 first. He is mining in the gulches where there are the placer deposits, which require no capital to work, no moss to be removed in order to find out whether there is gold beneath or not.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The moss is the easiest part of it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, the hon. gentleman is mistaken. It is a very formidable part.

An Hon. MEMBER—You should have been in room No. 8 this morning.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I was not in No. 8. I do not live in San Francisco. I prefer my own country.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I was not there either.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am glad to hear it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It does not affect the facts. Deal with the facts.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly it does not affect them; and I am dealing with the facts. I say, so far as these contractors are concerned, that the expenditure in quartz mining will be very great. If they can make it pay they will be fortunate men. I shall be pleased if they do. I shall not grudge any profit they can make. We, in making what we regarded as a liberal contract with these contractors, did so because of the exigency of the situation. We did not want Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann to go upon the market and fail in the arrangement. It was of the utmost consequence that they should succeed, because it is important that our authority should be maintained in that country. We cannot maintain that authority without a railway upon our own territory. We cannot control the trade without that.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Are we to understand that we cannot do it without Mackenzie & Mann and this contract?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I did not say that. I say that we can maintain it when we get the road through. We want means of access to the country. It is of great consequence to us that we should have it, and this agreement affords us the opportunity of getting what we require. Now, I need not detain hon. gentlemen with a further discussion on this subject. I have pointed out the political features of the question which make it urgent. I have pointed out the commercial features of the question, for without a road upon our soil we cannot control the commerce into our own territory. I have pointed out this fact, that the area of mineral lands granted is no indication that the bargain was specially advantageous. I hope that the grant is one which will afford liberal compensation to the contractors. I hope that that liberal compensation will enable them to raise whatever money they require in order that the work may be made certainly successful. I bear this fact in mind, that the men whom they employ during the coming season will have to receive miner's wages, and that this road is likely to cost the contractors far more than any road that has been constructed on this continent, and that has cost any of the parties who have undertaken that construction. I do not care how well that road may be built, or with what care it may be constructed, the wages which Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann will be obliged to pay in order to secure men to work upon the road and to keep them from running away to the mines, is out of all comparison greater than any parties have been obliged to pay heretofore. I need not say anything further on the subject. The contract and the measure by which it is to be made law have been discussed minutely in the House of Commons. That contract has long been before the public. Its contents are well known, and I therefore, without any further observations, move the second reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—The hon. gentleman who introduced this measure has made a very long and able speech. From a constitutional point of view many of his arguments are irrefutable nor does any one want to refute them. Were it only a question of constitutional and international law I should say that the hon. gentleman has made an admirable argument and that this House had better follow the example of the popular chamber, and pass the bill without further discussion. I do not think therefore that I shall waste the time of this House by any disquisition on that point, but come down to what I consider to be the real hard facts of the case, which in the wealth of verbiage to which the hon. gentleman has treated us, are very likely to be lost sight of. The matter seems to me to be a very simple one, we have here before us a contract whereby a very large portion of the richest land of this Dominion is being handed over to a firm of contractors. What we desire to investigate is : Was the giving of this contract a necessity ? Was it entered into in a proper and business-like way ? May we not be giving too high a price and granting too large a concession, for what we are getting in return ? If the discussion goes to show that the government have acted fairly and honestly in dealing with the great trust that has been placed in their hands ; that they have acted in a fair and judicious manner, such as a man would adopt in dealing with his own property ; that a square and honest bargain has been made with these contractors ; and that the country is not, as the saying is, " paying too dear for its whistle " ; then I think we should find there will be no trouble in passing the bill through this House.

Now, we all know that the government of a country, the ministers of the Crown, collectively and individually, are merely trustees for the people of the country, and are bound by the same rules, in business, in ethics, and in morality, as any individual who is acting in a private or judicial capacity. Let us apply the ordinary rules of life to this transaction, and see if the government have acted for us, as we would wish an agent or trustee to act for us, in dealing with our private business. It is known that away back in the spring of 1897, the government were aware of the enormously rich strikes that were being made in that Yukon country, and that the prospects were that there would be a tremendous rush to the gold fields. They knew so both from the reports of travellers who had made their way into the country, and from their own agents and servants and engineers. The difficulties attendant upon gaining access to that region were well known to the government, but no steps were taken to provide for the difficulties of travel. The ministers appeared most quiescent, almost somnolent in fact, when suddenly the country was electrified by the announcement that the government had concluded a bargain, and actually signed a contract for the construction of a railway into the heart of that country over an all-Canadian route, and which would not cost the country one cent. I well remember the first announcement which I saw made about this contract, it was given out in the most theatrical manner and amidst tremendous cheering at a Grit banquet in Montreal, by Mr. Tarte ; no details were given, but at the first blush it seemed a capital thing ; people were dazed because they did not understand it and the whole country, metaphorically threw its hat up in the air and shouted after the manner of the Ephesians for the space of several days "great Laurier of the Frenchmen." Simultaneously the party press, with a unanimity that smacked of a prior arrangement broke out into pæans of joy over the wonderful genius of the rising young statesman from the west who was the author and finisher of this grand deal. Much was made out of the magnitude of the undertaking and the stupendous difficulties to be overcome. Interviewed on the subject Mr. Sifton is thus reported in the local press of Victoria : What, he was asked, do you really think of the difficulty of building this railway ? He replied : It is a superhuman undertaking nothing like it has ever been attempted on the continent of America. And for a time we all believed that true. Indeed it was several weeks before not only the inherent badness of the bargain itself, but the secret and suspicious circumstances under which it was concocted and awarded, roused the public, the press and the people's representatives to a knowledge of what was going on. Many people have wondered how it was that Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie were singled out from amongst all the other contractors in the country to have this particular bonanza, this most favoured contractors treaty thrust upon them. Perhaps some of you may be under the impression that this is Mr. Sifton's first railway deal, that he is a novice at railway building, and that in this matter he met Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie for the first time. You are very much mistaken, Mr. Sifton was for a number of years a member of the celebrated Greenway government in Manitoba and anything that aggregation does not know about subsidizing and building railways with most-favoured contractors, is not worth knowing. The Dauphin Railway in Manitoba was constructed by Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie for Mr. Sifton under circumstances which were to what I might call the mutual satisfaction of Mr. Sifton and these contractors. And I do not hesitate to say that were the inner workings of that deal known to the public it would make a situation mighty uncomfortable for more than one government. But even the outside history of that deal is interesting reading.

The road is 100 miles long, if you ask Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie what they got for building it they will tell you, Oh! a land grant of 6,400 acres a mile and a cash bonus of $40,000 a year for 20 years from the federal government. How much will you ask from the provincial government? Not a cent they will reply. And it is strictly true, but when in your rude inquisitive way you probe this matter a little further you will find it to be a fact that the land grant and the Dominion subsidy, which amount to $800,000, is, according to the opinion of the best experts in the country, sufficient to build and fully equip that road. But this did not satisfy our liberal and large hearted Minister of the Interior who was then Attorney General of Manitoba. He thought that was not enough for these contractors; he therefore put through a deal whereby he practically made them a present of $8,000 a mile by guaranteeing the principal and interest on their bonds to the extent of $800,000. I say he practically made them a present of it, because he did not even take security on their land grant, all the security he took being a lien on the road, and that is a second mortgage as the Dominion subsidy ranks first.

So you see to build that prairie road that had $16,000 a mile and 6,400 acres of land, and you can easily see that, after the building of the road and the expenses attendant upon negotiating the bonds, Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie and their associates had a good few hundreds of thousands to the good without putting up one single penny of their own money. This is what is called financiering.

The Minister of Railways said in introducing this bill that these contractors were going to put their hands into their own pockets. Gentlemen, they will do nothing of the kind as long as that good old time honoured institution known as the British public has a pocket in its pants. They will use the country's resources, and can get all the money they want, and should a loss ever arise, you may be quite sure that it will not fall upon Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie, but on the holders of their bonds; you can rely on it that if there was the remotest chance of a loss in this transaction Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie would not be in the same parish with it. They are not built that way, and I don't blame them. But you can now see that the innocent Mr. Sifton and the confiding Mann & Mackenzie having been "into it" before to their mutual satisfaction, nothing was more natural than that he should again send for them and make this new deal, to their mutual satisfaction.

Now it came out in the discussions in the other House that Mr. Sifton conceived this scheme without the knowledge of the premier. We westerners are nothing if not enterprising, and Mr. Sifton determined to "make the score off his own bat," so to speak.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—With what authority does the hon. gentleman make that statement?

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—Because I heard it made in the other House and not denied.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is entirely erroneous; there were a great many statements made.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—The gentleman was there who could have denied it if he had chosen to do so, but he did not deny it. How then did Mr. Sifton go about this business? Did he put into practice the professions so often made by him and his party, and put this work up for public tender? This has been a cardinal principle, one of the rules of faith of the Grit party, enunciated and thundered upon every platform for the past eighteen years. One would have thought that they would have eagerly grasped at the opportunity of proving that they could practice what they preached, to show how mentally superior they were to the wicked Tories. But no. Did Mr. Sifton act like a minister who was anxious to make the best bargain that could be obtained for this country of which he was the trustee? Did he consult with his colleagues, decide upon the route that was to be taken, get his engineers to make an estimate and report upon the cost, and then, in the most public manner possible, have the matter placed before the contractors and capitalists of the continent and of Europe. I regret, for his own sake, that he did not do so. Mr. Sifton is a young man, he is able and brilliant, and should have a political future before him. I will not make any charge against Mr. Sifton. Let the facts speak for themselves. We will assume that he was perfectly innocent of wrong-doing in this transaction; but I say that if he was innocent, he has been a most unfortunate victim of the most extraordinary concatenation of circumstances that has ever worked the ruin of any innocent statesman. But whose fault is it? His own, and his only. Had he been jealous of that which above all else a public man should hold dear, his own honour, had he been anxious to preserve his own fair name untarnished, he would not have placed himself in the position of having his name bandied about from one end of the country to the other as the author of a measure either incompetent or nefarious. It is a sad thing to think that if this is not true a stigma should be attached to the name of a public man which can never be disassociated from it. Shakespeare says: "The evil that men do lives after them." The good is often interred with their bones; and it is indeed melancholy to think that a presumably innocent man cannot by a lifetime of reparation, of regret, of penance, remove from his name the taint, the stigma, which has been attached to it, not by the attacks of his enemies, not by his political opponents, but by his own hand and by his own actions.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman is not justified in making the statement he does This is the act of the government and not of Mr. Sifton.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I say that any minister of the Crown is the head of his department, and the department is responsible for all that he does, and the government is responsible for that action.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was not in his department.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—Well, whatever department it was, Mr. Sifton is the author of the scheme.

Hon Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—He says so in his speech.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—He took the responsibility of it and stated so, but to please the hon. gentleman I will assume that Mr. Sifton is perfectly innocent in this matter. Now, there is no one who will accuse Mr. Sifton of not having his wits about him if called upon to use them in an ordinary business transaction. If a gentleman owned a large estate and instructed his agent that he wanted to build a fine house upon it, would this agent have kept the fact that he was going to build the house a profound secret from all the builders and contractors in the country, but have sent for one firm, locked the doors, pulled down the blinds and then said: I want to have a house built, it must be four stories high and cover a space 50 by 100 feet; I have no plans or specifications, and I don't know what it ought to cost, but I have lots of money, you can figure on it as you please, I won't let any one else have a chance at it. Now no one would blame a contractor for taking advantage of such a confiding, simple innocence. After all, contractors are but mortal, though I fancy Mackenzie & Mann have almost obtained immortality in Canadian history through their connection with this matter, even as has Mr. Sifton. But if while these parties were figuring another contractor should get word of it and call upon the agent and say, I understand you are going to build a house for Mr. Smith (not Hamilton Smith, you know Smith is a fictitious name), let us have a look at your plans and specifications and we will tender for it, and the agent should reply, casually you know, House? Mr. Smith did you say? well no. I haven't really thought of building a house for Mr. Smith, and promptly proceed to sign a contract with the other parties, when Mr. Smith found a bargain had been made for him which would cost him ten times as much as it should have done, could he be blamed if he made a fuss about it, and tried to repudiate the contract? Do you suppose that with such facts made public, and as in this case without any explanation being given about it, that agent would ever again be employed by Mr. Smith or any one else who heard of the transaction? I think not. He might become wealthy and influential though people who had never heard of it (that class of man often does), but to his last day, as he drove past in his luxurious carriage, people would say: Ah there goes Brown who made that extraordinary deal about Smith's house, don't you know. Now if we cared so to take leave of our senses as to imagine this agent to be perfectly square and honest and actuated by a desire to do his best for his principal, would we not say that he had taken a very extraordinary mode of showing it? I do not wish to dictate to this House or even to indicate the course I shall myself adopt in regard to the bill. I merely wish to place these facts before you and if you are satisfied with the manner in which the deal has been made, why it is your duty to vote for it.

Now as to the route which has been adopted. Of course the original claim that it was an all-Canadian route threw a glamour over it that for a time obscured the real issue; but, as the facts became known, it was apparent that such was not the case, and that the country had been deceived in that as in the other statements in connection with the deal. At first it was only whispered and promptly denied, then it was suggested and as promptly contradicted, that we should have to pass through a foreign country to reach our terminus. At last, however, this damning fact was admitted; but Mr. Sifton went down to Washington, and there (I don't know whether he had Ned Farrer to assist him), he fixed things up all right and came back with the assurance that the Americans were perfectly amenable and that no difficulty would be thrown in the way of our government or our people. Has this promise been carried out? Alas, no, from the difficulties and the quarrels that have arisen at that port, it is now painfully evident that we can never reach our terminus without having a Wrangel. But is this the only route which could have been chosen? Wrangel we know is in American territory, but equally do we know that Dyea, Skagway, and Pyramid Harbour are, according to the Canadian interpretation of the treaty in Canadian territory. Why is it that we have chosen the only port under discussion to which it is admitted we have no claim and which bristles with difficulties of every nature to the exclusion of those which are not only according to our own interpretation of the treaty on Canadian territory, but which by a comparison of the routes present many advantages in their favour. Why, I say, for no other reason but that this government has all along shown that they are either taken in by the more astute American statesmen, even as the English statesmen have been in every deal connected with the acquisition of this country, or the defining of its boundaries, or else our people are for some reason afraid of mentioning anything which would even controvert the most preposterous claim, or offset the most selfish or extraordinary action on the part of the American government. There are grave international difficulties which according to our leader in this House cannot be more than alluded to, much not be whispered about, or discussed even with bated breath. Why? Is it that we are afraid of saying or doing one single thing to assert ourselves for fear of offending them? And is this policy successful? Why we have only got to look at the results; the more we recede the more agressive they become, we are driven ignominiously from our position to another. And just at this point though it is foreign to the subject, I might say that I should consider it of the highest importance that Canada should have an accredited representative at Washington. Not one of the Ned Farrer type nor even Sir Julian Pauncefote, whom our honoured leader called our agent and with whose agency he has expressed such entire satisfaction. I think that if our honoured leader were to travel abroad, if his colleagues were to send him down on a trip to Washington, he would see how very little attention or trouble Sir Julian Pauncefote gave to or took about Canada, except where matters were absolutely forced upon him, and that it would pay Canada well to have a first class man at Washington whose first duty should be to attend to Canadian interests.

Now, I am not here to represent or advocate any particular line of country for this railway; in fact weknow so little about that region, practically unexplored except by the nomadic mining population, that many routes may yet be discovered which will prove far easier than those whose merits are now being discussed. But for purposes of comparison I will take the proposed route from Pyramid Harbour over the Dalton trail. Pyramid Harbour at the head of the Lynn Canal is, as we know according to our interpretation of the treaty, on Canadian territory. It is a deep water port, where the largest ocean-going vessels in the world could tie up to a pier. A railway from Pyramid Harbour to Rink Rapids would be about 300 miles in length and could be kept open all the year round. The steepest grades I am informed could be limited to 2 per cent. The starting point at Pyramid Harbour is as near Dawson City in actual distance as the terminus at Teslin Lake of the line describebed in the contract. In other words after you have gone up the Stikine and over the proposed Teslin-Stikine Railway you are no nearer the objective point, Dawson, than you would be at Pyramid Harbour. If I were not afraid to appear to treat this matter with the slightest levity I might almost be tempted to say that this is really the Stikine point.

Rink Rapids are the head of navigation properly so called and there is five feet of water there all the year round; if the business of the country should warrant it, a railway could easily be constructed from Rink Rapids to Dawson City, the distance by the river being only 225 miles. Certainly on paper this would appear to possess advantages over the government route. In reference to this I would like to read a letter which I lately received from Mr. H. T. Mann, a very well known traveller, who has spent years at a time through that country, penetrating to within 50 miles of the arctic circle, and who has just returned by the all-Canadian route. However, I do not wish to influence this House, nor even indicate what course I am myself going to take, I merely desire to place the merits of the different routes fairly and dispassionately before you. If you think that the government route is the best and there are no other valid objections to the bill, why then, of course you should support it. I shall, with the permission of the House, read a letter which I have received describing the character of this route:

The state of affairs I found at Wrangel is indescribable. The river has broken up for about five miles, and for twenty-five miles further the ice is covered with slushy snow, knee-deep. Sleighing, either with dogs or horses, was impossible when I left (Monday, 27th), and a couple of thousand people were huddled on the rocky flat, where Wrangel stands, like sheep, unable to move, nor is it the general opinion any one will be able to get up, unless going very light with dogs, until navigation opens, about April 15th. So much for the "all-Canadian route." I have seen one or two old captains who have navigated the Stikine, and their unanimous opinion is that the fleet of boats now building for the river are far too many to safely navigate it. A builder here counted me twenty-four he knew of which were in course of construction or built, for the Stikine, and though a telephone service and other precautions are spoken of, the opinion is that the river can never be operated by so many boats safely. It is a rather small river at best, and about ninety miles from the mouth there is a narrow cañon three-quarters of a mile, which is extremely dangerous. Steamers run this three-quarters of a mile, on strong water, in 1¼ minute. Imagine a mistake in the telephone system and a collision there. An old captain of fifteen years' experience says there are several places on the river where a sunken or disabled steamer will block the traffic until blown up and the machinery removed, and the many sharp turns will assuredly lead to accidents, no matter how careful the navigators are. A few—2,000 or 3,000—prospectors will get in via Glenora, then the block of traffic will be so great, and the accidents so numerous, the river will be condemned and the other routes taken. It seems to me no one at Ottawa has raised this question seriously, but rather taken for granted the navigability of the river. Consider, too, that it does not become passable on the ice till some time after navigation closes—(I forget the exact date this year)—and is impassable now, probably till April 15th to 25th, and you can see what a futile, one-horse route it is to all intents and purposes. It is safe to assert that though an experienced man with dogs might now get to Glenora, very lightly loaded, all serious traffic has ceased till navigation opens. McKenzie & Mann's engineers (T. Henry White, chief engineer), are still at the island at the mouth of the river, and one of their party (returned) tells me they will probably not be able to get up till navigation opens. What a brilliantly useful clause the sleigh road to Teslin becomes, and how ably our statesmen informed themselves of the conditions! They have practically insisted on a sleigh road for 150 miles, from Glenora to Teslin, which (at the stipulated date of its completion) is absolutely cut off for serious traffic by 150 miles of impassable river ice, i. e., from Wrangel to Glenora; and yet they could have had the experience of twenty-five years' constant summer and winter travel on the Stikine, from men now living in Glenora, to deduce facts from. This all-Canadian route is a farce.

No one is more alive to the fact that our "great reserve" needs opening, then I am, but let us open it to where the trade is, not through one thousand miles of (so far) useless country, which, mind you, has been not a little prospected in the sixties and seventies.

That is the opinion of a gentleman who has seen a great deal of travel in that northern country. However, I do not wish to influence this House; I merely desire to place these facts before them.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—In that communication he speaks of this trail being 150 miles long. It is really 300 miles long. The contract speaks of the mouth of the river, and that is a flaw in the contract.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—That is worse than I made it out. The hon. gentleman comes from that country and of course knows about it. The monopoly clause and the reduction of the royalty are both objectionable in that they give exceptional rights under this most favoured contractor's treaty. Of themselves they make this railway a valuable asset; they are, however, merely details and not of such importance as per se, to call for the rejection of this contract. But it is when we come to the land grant that we touch the crucial point in this matter, by this most favoured contractor's treaty they are granted an acreage which has been estimated to cover 3,750,000 acres which the contractors have exceptional rights in selecting. An attempt has been made to belittle the value of this concession, but we will see what the man best qualified to speak on this question, says about it. In Mr. Oglivie's report, page 92, he says:

Those three lines bound an area of about a hundred and twenty-five thousand square miles, over which gold is scattered more or less profusely. At many of the points mentioned it will pay well for working under present conditions. . . . The district owns its world-wide reputation to the richness of a hundred and forty claims in the Klondike division. To use a mining term, many of those claims are world-beaters, and if the known indications are worth anything at all they are worth from sixty to seventy millions of dollars. Take the division as a whole, including the three creeks named—a district thirty-five miles in length by twenty-five miles or more in width. If the indications can be relied on there are a hundred million dollars in sight in that area. No one can guarantee this amount, but the prospect so far developed points to that sum pretty conclusively. This district is exceptionally rich. Nothing has ever been found like it heretofore in that country. In fact, in very few countries has anything been found like it. . . . Taken altogether we have a vast field with fair prospects ; as fair, it may be claimed, as any other equally extensive region in the world.

We all know that while the Yukon country contains a vast acreage only a small proportion of it, comparatively, can be said to be gold bearing, the precious metal being only found in the beds of the rivers and the branches contiguous. By the time therefore that Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie have secured the pick of these lands they may be fairly said to control the gold bearing area in the district. I am quite willing that Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie or those associated with them should make a large fortune, but I, in common with the other citizens of this country, would like that we should as citizens have a small interest in that country ourselves. Placer mining is the poor man's business. The capital required is a pick and shovel and plenty of muscle, let a portion at least of it be set apart for the poor man, and do not let these millionaires have the whole of it, even though we may contradict the scriptural saying that: "To him that hath shall be given." However do not let me dictate to this House, but if you consider that such a gift as this is a reasonable remuneration for building 150 miles of tramway, why it would be your duty, if it presented no other objectionable features, to pass the bill. Now, what is the position of the Senate to-day in regard to this question? The bill has passed the Lower House, and you are the sole arbiters of its fate. You are supposed to be here to give a calm and unbiassed opinion upon the issues before you. We are told that this is not a party question, and we do not intend to treat it as such. But how does the other side endeavour to show us that it is not to be made a party question. Why every Grit sheet from Halifax to Vancouver has been put up to bark at us, to threaten us with extinction if we do not pass this bill. I will read you a few choice specimens of the way in which these gentlemen, through their press, think that they can engineer this bill through the Senate. The first extract I will read is from the Globe of February 7th, last:

WILL THE SENATE OBSTRUCT?

The rumour that a Conservative majority in the Senate will be urged to throw out the Yukon Railway agreement has caused serious alarm among the leading outfitting firms in Toronto and other cities. The object of such a move would be to embarrass the government, and in that respect it would seem to be good tactics, from the standpoint of those who regard politics as a game of interest only to the players. If the antagonistic manœuvring of the government and opposition began and ended on Parliament Hill, such tactics would excite little interest. But when it is proposed to destroy for a year and permanently injure a trade that promises so much to the whole Dominion, and for the sake of scoring a win in the political game, the bounds of public endurance are passed. It is something the people of Canada simply will not tolerate, and the sooner that is realized by the Senate the better for that august body. Long trafficking in politics seems to have obscured the public interest and the real purpose of political institutions in the eyes of the Ottawa opposition. They have assumed that their duty to the country consists in obstructing and not in criticizing the ministry. Under ordinary circumstances this misconception of the sphere of an opposition and disregard of the public interest would be settled by the vote of the parliamentary majority. But the Senate, overwhelmingly Conservative, has authority to throw out any measure passed by the popular majority in the Commons. This senatorial majority has been developed by appointments during a long Conservative regime, and is an unavoidable legacy of that political misfortune. The people voted for a change of men, a change of method and a change of principle in public administration, but could not get rid of a majority with power to frustrate the popular will. It was hoped that the majority in the Senate, having regard to their anomalous position and the clearly express will of the people, would be content with registering decisions under the new ministry as under the old. No one ever dreamed that they would enter into the more childish phase of the party contest and obstruct the government in carrying out a great project, utterly regardless of the calamitous consequences to the business interests of the Dominion. The majority in the Senate is led by Sir Mackenzie Bowell. After a short reign as premier he was deposed by his own party. At the subsequent general election he and his party were voted out of office. Yet he still has authority under our constitution to prevent the building of a Canadian railway to the Yukon or the carrying out of any important project by the ministry responsible to the people. When this power was given the framers of the constitution never dreamed of it being exercised in petty tactics and in utter disregard of the public interest. It will be most unwise for the Senate to adopt a course certain to show that a public trust is misplaced. There are some things the people of Canada will not stand.

So you know what fate is before you when you vote for this thing. Now I will read an extract from the Montreal Herald of 4th March. It is an interesting though rather illogical argument:

THE SENATE'S OPPORTUNITY.

For thirty years following confederation the Senate demonstrated nothing so clearly as that with the same political party in a majority in both Houses, the Senate might better be dispensed with. The little good it was able to accomplish was dearly bought at the price paid for maintaining it. But there yet remains a possibility that, with the infusion of new elements, the Senate may be made to serve some useful purpose.

That is the reform of the Senate we have heard so much about.

It has been amply proved that if the Senate simply acts in accord, upon all occasions, with the wishes of the dominant party in the House of Commons its utility is exceedingly meagre.

That is exactly what we say.

It remains to be seen whether it will draw upon itself the further condemnation of the country by proving still further than has already been proved that it is a privileged appendage of the Conservative party, now a minority in the popular chamber and in the country. It is safe to assume that if the Senate co-operate with the Conservative party in opposition in the same faithful way as when that party was in office, the day is not far distant when it will receive short shrift at the hands of the electors.

I think they would deserve it too if they made a party matter of this and acted as a Conservative party.

The Senate it will be remembered, did not interfere with the Canadian Pacific Railway contract, with its various supplemental bonuses, land grants and monopoly clauses. This they allowed to go through without protest. By their complacency at that critical juncture, they abandoned all claim to the position which they are now asked to assume. And, apart altogether from the imperative necessity of passing this bill in the interests of the Dominion, public opinion would not tolerate the assumption now of a position that was abandoned on that occasion. Unless the Senate is prepared to prove that corrupt practices have entered into the consummation of this contract, the Conservative majority should keep its hands off the Klondike Railway Bill.

Is the Senate going to throw out a bill on this ground? We do not believe it, but if it does, what better fighting ground could the abolitionists desire than such a wanton perversion of the Senate's powers to partisan objects?

It is pleasant, after reading such abuse as this, to turn to the meeting of the Letellier Club in which Mr. Lebœuf spoke on the Yukon deal:

Referring to the Yukon contract, he asked the meeting whether its rejection by the Senate would be the cause of its abolition. He did not think so. He had denounced the Conservatives for years for giving out contracts without tenders, and he would not now preach a new doctrine. It was necessary to build the road at once, yet there was time enough to call for tenders. He thought it would be no crime for the Senate to throw out the bill, and perhaps by so doing they would confer a favour on the government. It would permit them to carry on the road as a national undertaking, and the present contractors would be recompensed for their outlay. He advised all to remain true to the Liberal party.

I think that in spite of the mutterings and threats of the Grit press, this House will fully appreciate the value of such advice and the motives that prompt it. The members of this House are neither fools nor cowards, they do not need newspaper advice, nor do they heed its threats or dictation. They know what their duties are, the constitutional and reasonable limits of their power, and the impregnable position which this House holds as part of the parliament of the country. A partisan majority in the House of Commons is as incapable of controlling the Senate's privileges and powers as it is of passing the most insignificant bill into law without the Senate's consent. This House also knows that among the thinking people of this country this House and the work it does are appreciated and valued. They know that when it has used its undeniable powers and prerogatives to kill foolish, wicked or unwarrantable legislation, public spirit has invariably supported it, and that when it went farthest in opposition to a partisan majority in the House of Commons, whether Liberal or Conservative, the praise it received was the most emphatic. It has been the fashion amongst ignorant people to say that it is only since a Liberal government came into power that there is any instance of the Senate vetoing a government bill that had passed through the Commons. But I can point to two instances in the time of Sir John Macdonald. The cases of the Nanaimo Railway, and the Harvey-Salisbury Railway. These were both bad. The Senate gave the country a year to think about them, and the result was that they were never introduced again.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Nanaimo measure was and passed.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—It never passed through the House, and never went into operation. The men with selfish interests, of course, cursed the Senate, but the people applauded, and the men with selfish interests cannot be considered as against the country at large. There is nothing of a partisan nature about this controversy. There are, I am told, good, staunch and true Conservatives who for reasons best known to themselves and which they no doubt consider valid, are voting with the government. The Senate is in no sense a party tribunal, they work to facilitate all good and useful legislation that is introduced; but when schemes are passed through the other House which are plainly and palpably contrary to the public interests, proposals for the usurpation of parliamentary powers, the creation of dangerous guilds or for the wasting of public lands or public moneys, the country may rest perfectly assured that the Senate will do its duty; and the House may feel equally assured that the country will support it in such action now, as it has done in the past. Let our motto be: "Millions for defence, but not one cent for tribute." I would like to say that I had intended moving the six months' hoist to this bill; but, on account of being obliged to leave for my home in the North-west, as it is one of the rules of this House that a member must be in his seat when the motion is called on, I am unable to do so, and the Hon. Mr. Lovitt has kindly paired with me for the division.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I move that the debate be adjourned till to-morrow, as I understand that some hon. gentlemen who would like to speak on the bill have other engagements to-night.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The plea of urgency was used at the beginning of this question; when the government first brought it down and laid it before the Commons, they took the unusual course at the beginning of the session of parliament to move that it take precedence every day till disposed of, but now it appears that the urgency no longer exists; and if that be the case I suppose we may as well adjourn. But if that great urgency which was advanced as a reason for the setting aside of the rules of parliament still exists, we ought to go on. However, I am not going to oppose the motion. The plea first set forth may have had force; but the conduct of the government since, shows it not to have had any effect. In order to assist in the elections in the province of Ontario with the whole weight and influence of the Dominion government thrown in the scale of one party, that urgency vanished and we had a week or ten days' vacation, in order that they might devote their time to what evidently was considered by the ministry of much greater importance—that is the retention of power by the Liberal party in Ontario—than the passage of this bill, which was to save half the continent from starvation. I merely point this out to show that there must have been some other reason than the urgency of the case to have induced the government to make this contract. Now, a dinner party is much more important, it is quite evident, to the gentlemen sitting on the opposite side of the House—or an at home, or something of that kind—than the decision of the Senate upon so important a question as the passage of this bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think my hon. friend is a little bilious this evening, or else he would never have addressed the remarks he has to the House. There are a good many hon. gentlemen who want to speak, and some of them are not quite ready to do so to-night. I think that the bill is urgent, but I do not think we will make any progress by insisting on sitting to-night. I think we may very well sit to-morrow evening.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am engaged to-morrow evening.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—As I stated, the reason for adjourning to-night is that several hon. gentlemen wanted to speak and they are not quite ready to do so. I think that is a sufficient reason to meet the objection of my hon. friend.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The explanation of the hon. leader of the House is not at all in accord, nor does it tally with that given by the hon. the Secretary of State. I am not at all surprised at that, because in another branch of the legislature we have had an illustration of the same kind; but if it be the reason for adjournment that certain gentlemen have an engagement to-night—for that was the reason given the Secretary of State—their engagement to-morrow night by other gentlemen, would equally good for a further engagement.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That was one reason; it is not necessary to give all the reasons.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It used to be the practice that when a minister spoke, he spoke for the government; but now if we hear one minister we must hear the rest before we know what the government really mean to do. If the hon. gentleman adjourns the House, and that is the reason for the adjournment, I might ask the House to adjourn to-morrow night in order to permit me to attend a dinner.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (74) "An Act further to amend the Petroleum Inspection Act."—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

Bill (73) "An Act further to amend the Gas Inspection Act."—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

Bill (75) "An Act further to amend the Inland Revenue Act."—(Hon. Mr. Scott.)

Bill (24) "An Act to amend the charter of the Union Bank of Canada."—(Hon. Mr. McMillan.)

Bill (43) "An Act respecting the Board of Trade of the City of Toronto."—(Hon. Mr. Cox.)

Bill (22) "An Act respecting the Hudson's Bay and Pacific Railway Co."—(Hon. Mr. McMillan.)

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Wednesday, 23rd March, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'Clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (H) "An Act to incorporate the Alberta and Yukon Railway Navigation and Mining Company."—(Hon. Mr. Lougheed).

CORRESPONDENCE FROM COMMISSIONER WALSH.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to ask the leader of the House whether he is prepared to bring down any of the correspondence from Commissioner Walsh, which was asked for some five days ago—the correspondence received by the government from Commissioner Walsh since he left on his way to the Yukon, or since his arrival.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not aware that there is any such correspondence, but I will inquire and let my hon. friend know.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend seems to forget that I made a motion with reference to it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That address was carried by this House, and if the correspondence is not brought forward in a reasonable time, I will make inquiry and see that it is brought down, if there be any such correspondence.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We should have it for this discussion if we are to have it at all.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We did not put on paper the instructions to Major Walsh.

CANADIAN YUKON RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

DEBATE RESUMED.

The Order of the Day being called :

Resuming the adjourned debate on the Second Reading (Bill 6) "An Act to confirm an agreement between Her Majesty and William Mackenzie and Donald D. Mann, and to incorporate the Canadian Yukon Railway Company."

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said : Last evening there was some hesitation on the part of hon. gentlemen to move the adjournment of the debate. Nobody seemed desirous to do it, so I moved it myself. Of course I am quite prepared to go on, but I believe there are other gentlemen who would like to speak this afternoon, or immediately, and I would be very glad to give way for them.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—I simply rise to place myself on record on this occasion. I am not at all able to make a speech. I am not very well, but I thought it my duty, as I have always done before on questions of this kind which I consider very important for the good of our country, to come here and place my views on record. I do not stand here as a partisan. I think that every senator ought to give his voice for the good of his country, without favour or affection for either party. In the government I have no friends ; with the contractors I have none, and in the future I may have very few of my past friends. Be that as it may, I am here to give my opinion as a merchant for the welfare of the trade of our country, and to support the bill that is before this House, to provide for the transportation of men and provisions and goods of all kinds to this new country which we are so fortunate as to own, and in which very great wealth may be developed. That remains to be seen. I have known of gold fields which at first appeared very promising, but which disappointed those who worked them. I hope that the Klondike will prove a profitable field for those who are working claims there, and a source of revenue to the Dominion. Our duty is plain. We should give rapid transportation to that country as soon as possible. The enterprising youth of the country, who are unemployed in their homes to-day, are watching the fate of this bill and will be governed in their decision as to whether they will go to that country or not by the action that we take upon it. If this bill becomes law, many of them will go to that country and eventually settle down and remain citizens of the Dominion. I may be told that whether we pass this bill or not the road cannot be completed this year. I would reply that whether it can or not, if we defeat the bill the construction of the road will be still further delayed. If we postpone it until another session, nobody can say that there would be a road into that country for three years to come. I raise my voice in favour of building a railway into the Yukon country as soon as possible. I favour the immediate construction of the line, though I know nothing of the route that has been selected. Those who are acquainted will, no doubt, speak on that point. Let us have a road into the Yukon through our own territory if possible. There is hardly any one in this House who would not support a measure for the construction of a road through our own territority, via Edmonton or some other all-Canadian route, but it would take four or five years to complete such a line, and we want a highway which will be available sooner. My view of the question is this: we are living under responsible government. When the late government was defeated, the present government came into power and by a majority of 39 in the popular branch they have passed this bill and sent it to us. Some of us may regard it as an extravagant bargain, and claim that we should not give it our sanction. I have heard it said that the land grant is too large. If the land were worth a dollar an acre it would be equal to $25,000 per mile, and that would, no doubt, be excessive, but if it is worth only 25 cents an acre the contractors would not be getting a fortune. No one can say what the real value of that land is. In opening up any new country the government has to take some risks, and I say this government is justified in taking the risk it has faced in this instance. I do not say that this is the best arrangement that could be made, but it is the best, so far as we know, for the time being. We are ignorant of the character of that country and the best routes to it. I doubt if any one in this House is in a better position than I am to say which route should be preferred, and I know nothing at all about it. Every man you bring into this country begins to contribute to the revenue from the time he takes his first breakfast until he leaves the soil of Canada, and, therefore, whatever can be done to encourage immigration should be done. We have been paying a great deal to bring settlers into the country, and here the government are opening up a field for immigration, for immigrants of the first order, men with money and courage and enterprise, who are prepared to take the pick axe and shovel and dig for themselves in the Klondike. After they get tired of mining they will be inclined to settle in our north-west and become permanent residents of the country. This is not the first time I have had the honour to vote for what appeared to be a wild scheme, at the time, but which afterwards proved to be an enterprise of the highest importance to the country. I was called crazy when I first stood up for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway—will any one say that the stand which I took at that time was a mistaken one? The enterprise has furnished a highway from ocean to ocean for the whole world, and greatly strengthened the British Empire.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Will this 150 miles of railway do the same thing?

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—The 150 miles is the beginning. If the hon. gentleman could tell us, from his own personal knowledge and experience, that this is not the best available route at the present time, he might be in a position to say that the government and those who support their measure are wrong, but he can tell us nothing about it, because he has never seen the route. The government are taking a risk which may turn out to be beneficial to the contractors; if so, it will be so much the better for the country. But it may not prove beneficial to the contractors. Often people take such risks and lose in the end. Every new country requires to be assisted by the government, as the Hudson Bay Company were assisted at the beginning of their enterprise. They took great risks and received great advantages, and if it had not been for the aid the Hudson Bay Company had at the beginning, where would that western territory be now, or where would be the wealth that we are taking from it? We took a great risk, we were told, when we commenced the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Our opponents said we were giving away the wealth of the country giving thousands and thousands of acres of land and so much money. But hon. gentlemen it has not turned out very badly for the country, and I think that we may reasonably take a risk here. If this is a bad contract from a political point of view, I would just as readily throw the responsibility on the government of the day as on any other hon. gentleman. If it is a good one, the country gets the benefit of it. There will be no money made. For every dollar that will be taken out of these mines there will be at least ninety cents spent in getting it out.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Then it is an outrageous thing building the railway. It is a fraud on the country.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—It has been the same in other places, and the fortunes have been few. My reason for supporting this measnre is that the revenue of our country will benefit by it. Immigration will come into our country. We are asking for immigrants, and whether it be from Europe, or any other quarter of the globe, we want them here. Some will say, "Oh, well, the Americans will come over and settle, and they will be in the proportion of three or four to one." If the Americans are more enterprising than our own people, we do not want to shut them out. We have been coaxing the Americans, that are now on their farms in Dakota and other western states, to come in and settle in the Northwest, and some of them are doing it. But we want the European emigrant to come here with his money. There are hundreds and thousands of young men to-day waiting for an opportunity to make their fortunes in this Yukon district, and we should not block them from coming over. We should not say that we will stop anything of the kind. We should encourage them. Others, opponents of the bill, say, "Oh, but those contractors will sell the bonds for an enormous amount in England and make a fortune at the expense of the British capitalist." We have been in the habit of letting the English gentlemen take care of themselves, and I think they can do so yet, and they will buy just as many of those bonds as they think proper. If they do lose a little it will not hurt them, because they have plenty more to fall back upon. It is different with the man who loses his last dollar. He frets. He is left on the world without anything, as a pauper, but none of that class of people are coming to this country, and none of them will buy the bonds of this company, and, therefore, I say it is no hardship for us to let men do just as they think proper with their own money. We have been in the habit of doing so with the Grand Trunk Railway and other enterprises. There was invested in the Grand Trunk three hundred millions of foreign capital and very little Canadian money, and would we not feel rejoiced if this country could pay from three to four per cent to the widows and orphans that put their money into that company? We did not coax them to invest. They took the risk, the same as we are saying to the contractors now, "take the risk, do the best you can, but give us a road into that country," and then as soon as they do that, we will call on the government of this country to give us another road from another quarter. I need not say much more, but I do say this, that as a Conservative——

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." Yes, hear, hear. I am not a deserter; I take no sneers or insults, without resentment, from any quarter, or any man, or any party in this country, for I want nothing from any of them. Therefore I have a right to stand in this House, as every man ought to do, and give utterance to his feelings that are for the benefit of the country he lives in, and I have no other object in view. Let every immigrant, every able-bodied man, the man with a thousand or fifteen hundred dollars in his pocket, come in. These are the men we want to remain here. I will say this, however, that a strong government sometimes are too strongly conservative. Some of my friends may irritate me, as my friend from the jumping off place down there did to-day; but I say, hon. gentlemen, it is not well for governments or parties to be too conservative.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—It will not do; they often do a great deal of harm by being too conservative. I would hate to see it go before the world that we are here for the purpose of blocking the enterprise of the present administration because we are opposed to them in politics. I have no object in the world in supporting this bill but to get rapid transit into that country, and to furnish them such supplies as we can furnish here. On what will be imported, the country will receive a large revenue, from 25 to 30 per cent as a rule. It was suggested by the hon. leader of the House that in a few years, if the road was built, there might be possibly 100,000 people in there. Supposing there were 50,000 in there, supposing there were 25,000 in there only, and that it cost every one of those men so much to live, if the government got so much out of each miner as, say 25 cents a day, why, hon. gentlemen, it would amount to an enormous sum of money, and they would be getting something for the lands and it would be settling up the country. But the most of the supplies will come from our own country, and they do come from our own country now, with the exception of flour and bacon. The flour comes, as I understand, from San Francisco to a great extent. The bacon comes, also, from the other side, and therefore, hon. gentlemen, those are two items I have understood that we cannot reasonably supply at present. The freight may be against the one, and the mode of curing the bacon against the other, but these are only trifling things. Every railroad in this country would benefit by the passing of this bill. Every idle labouring man that could go there and could be taken there by the contractors would benefit by it, and by that man being taken away from us here, where we have not employment for him, another can take his place. I say, hon. gentlemen, if we had not had a state of depression for the last seven or eight years, perhaps I would not have advocated this so strongly, but we wanted something to bring life into this country, something to give employment to the young men who cannot get employment here. We want every young man to have an opportunity to begin to push his fortunes and lead the way for others to follow. All my life in this country, since the year 1832, I have always gone in to forward the progress of our country, and I intend to do so when any measure in the interest of the country is proposed, whether by Grits or Tories. If, on the contrary, I do not like a measure, no matter what side it emanates from, I shall very likely take a different stand. The government of the day have a right to govern the country the same as we did. For 18 years we kept them in cold opposition, and why should we say now they have not the enterprise and ability to deal with this question? If they have not, in a very few years the country will know, and the verdict of the country will be pronounced against them. It will be time enough then to say to them, "gentlemen you are not a success, therefore we ask you to retire, by the advice and at the request of the electors of this country."

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I hope the warmth with which my hon. friend from Toronto, who has just resumed his seat, has spoken on the bill before the House may not make him liable to the censure of the hon. member from Halifax—that warmth or earnestness is not in good taste when criticising adversely the actions or measures of the government, but as my hon. friend is now on the right side, in the opinion of the hon. gentleman from Halifax, it is probable no objection will be taken to the warmth of his remarks, or his earnestness in uttering them. I am sorry I cannot agree with my hon. friend from Toronto on this occasion as I generally do, for he is seldom on the wrong side as at present, but we all feel satisfied that on whatever side my hon. friend may range himself, his action is the result of sincere conviction, and what he believes to be the faithful discharge of his public duty as a member of this Senate.

I do not intend, hon. gentlemen, to trespass at any great length on the time or patience of the House in this debate, but I am unwilling to give a silent vote on the important bill before the Senate, in which, it must be admitted, public interest just now is very marked and widespread throughout this Dominion. The subject of the bill, however, has been so fully discussed both in the public press and in the other branch of the legislature, that I believe every hon. gentleman I am now addressing, feeling the grave responsibility his position as a member of this body imposes on him, has made himself thoroughly acquainted with all the facts necessary to enable him to give a correct and intelligent vote on the motion of the hon. Minister of Justice for the second reading of the bill. I do not pretend to be able to shed any new light upon this extraordinary measure, but I desire, as concisely as I can, to place on record some of the reasons of my very decided hostility to it.

I could not help feeling as I listened to the long and somewhat laboured—but at the same time, as an oratorical effort, very able and interesting speech of the Minister of Justice; and I am sure this House did not listen to it without being impressed with the same feeling, that the task my hon. friend had undertaken to perform in defending the unwise provisions of the bill was both difficult and disagreeable to him; that the measure had not his sincere approval and endorsation of its improvident provisions, although responsible for it as a minister of the Crown, and therefore bound to justify it on the floor of this House. This to my mind accounts for the hon. gentleman's entertaining address, abounding as it did in historical information, patriotic sentiments and high sounding generalities, but avoiding almost altogether the many weighty and unanswerable objections on all sides urged against the bill. Much that my hon. friend said regarding the desirability of opening up communication with the Yukon gold district no one is disposed to dispute, but I think the hon. minister is very much mistaken if he supposes that a majority of the people of this country consider the contract with Mackenzie & Mann the right way to the accomplishment of that end. The manifestations of public opinion all from the Atlantic to the Pacific—indeed all over this Dominion—have been decidedly hostile to this measure, and the idependent press of the country is almost unanimously against it.

Notwithstanding the hon. leader of the House exerted all his admitted ability and ingenuity in debate in defence of the policy of the government, he evidently felt and showed it, that he was undertaking a hopeless task in attempting to convince the members of this House that the interests of any considerable portion of the people, or the general interest and welfare of the state, demanded the passage of this unjust, improvident, and in every respect most objectionable bill. I feel quite confident that had the duty devolved on the Minister of Justice, or on either of the hon. gentlemen occupying ministerial seats in this chamber, to negotiate the terms of a contract for this Yukon railway, or any other railway or public work, we would not have been asked to support the improvident measure now before us, and above all I am certain that to any bill that might emanate from either of them, there would not exist the slightest suspicion, in the mind of parliament or in the public mind, that the interests of the country had been sacrified to any selfish or other unworthy purpose. Both these hon. gentlemen, it is a pleasure to all of us to know, are above any such suspicion, although I fear, after the remarks that fell from the hon. member from Brandon in his place yesterday, it might be risky to say the same thing of all of his colleagues in the ministry, and especially the minister chiefly responsible for this bill.

On this point, however, I do not wish to be misunderstood; on the contrary, I desire to place myself on record as not imputing to any public man here or elsewhere connected with this measure, any charge of malfeasance or corruption without the clearest evidence of its correctness, which I do not pretend to possess. But at the same time, it cannot be denied that the secrecy in which the contract was negotiated, the startling prodigality of its concessions to the contractors, especially in relation to the enormous land grant, its unjust discrimination against actual miners in respect to the imposition of royalties, coupled with the unreasonable monopoly given to these government favourites, Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, cannot be denied that an unfortunate impression has been made on the minds of the people of this country, that immense possibilities of corruption and malfeasance are covered by the terms of the contract, and the provisions of the bill. I believe every candid person, I care not what may be his political creed, must make this admission. For my own part I cannot help saying that the authorative article in which the great organ of the government, the Toronto Globe, announced to the world late in the month of January the execution of the contract with Mackenzie & Mann, the tone of apology, of trepidation, of anxiety, of concealed guiltiness, with a free mixture of audacity, mendacity and boastfulness in which it indulged, was calculated to alarm and excite the suspicions of every reflecting man, and certainly did alarm me when I read it. I was satisfied then, and am satisfied to-day, that the man who wrote that extraordinary article knew then, and knows now, more of the "true inwardness" of this business than either of the ministers in this House knew, or ever will know about it.

Shortly after I had read the Globe article I had an unexpected visit from a reporter of the Ottawa Citizen, who in the next day's issue of that paper gave the following correct report of his interview of me:—

> Yesterday a Citizen reporter asked Senator Miller's opinion on the contract, who said: "Of course, I am not in a position to say, in the absence of fuller information, whether the scheme is or is not a wise, or advantageous one. The possibilities, however, involved in it are, to say the least, very alarming, and it is a bold thing for the government to enter into such a contract on the very eve of the meeting of parliament. Urgency may probably, and perhaps not unfairly, be pleaded in the premises, but there is a difference between urgency and indecent haste. It is true that the scheme is to be subject to the approval of parliament, but we all know that parliament will virtually not be a free agent in dealing with it, if it has to consider the subject after the government has entered into a contract. In fact, it might be fairly contended that it would be a violation of the privileges of parliament to sign such a contract within a little more than a week of the opening of the legislature."

The hon. Minister of Justice spoke of the large majority the government secured for the bill in the House of Commons, but he did not tell us that the majority of only thirty-nine in that body did not represent the usual voting strength of the ministry on ordinary party questions. He did not tell us that some of the most pronounced Liberals in the House of Commons, voted against the measure, and others did not vote at all. We know besides that many supporters of the bill had all along before recording their votes on the second reading, denounced the contract in unmeasured terms, and expressed the hope that it would be defeated in the Senate—a hope which I have no reason to doubt they still entertain. This proves how true were my predictions in the interview just cited, that parliament would not be a free agent—and especially the members of the House of Commons would not be free agents—in dealing with the subject, after the government had committed themselves and their followers to the bargain with Mackenzie & Mann. We all know how reluctant are loyal party men to desert their colours in an emergency of this kind, and how unlikely are another class of followers to oppose or offend a strong government when the favours and patronage of that government are dangled before their eyes. Consequently, when the snap of the party whip resounded over the heads of these men, of both classes, most of them fell into line, and voted submissively, for a scheme they condemned; but there were some notable exceptions among the rebels and recalcitrants. There are many men to-day who voted in the majority of which the Minister of Justice boasts, who secretly pray that the Senate will reject this bill, and I am not sure that even a majority of the cabinet may not be included in that category.

The paragraph I have quoted from the columns of the Ottawa Citizen of the 29th of January last, is a fair summary of the opinion I formed of the Mackenzie & Mann contract, after all the ingenuity of the Globe had been exerted to place the transaction in the most favourable light before the people. After reading the Globe's clever special pleading, I searched the columns of the opposition press, but searched in vain, for further information. The majority of the newspapers were silent in relation to the deal that had taken place in secret between the government and the contractors, and the few that did refer at all to the subject seemed to look upon the contract with indifference or approval. To the Ottawa Citizen is due the credit of having struck the first note of alarm that aroused the country to the impending danger, and its vigilance in discovering and its courage in denouncing the monstrous bargain, under embarrassing circumstances, should not be forgotten by the public. But since my interview with the Citizen reporter, I have given some attention to this important question. I have had—we all have had—ample means and opportunities of informing ourselves regarding it, and I have come to the conclusion that the contract with Mackenzie & Mann, is one of the most reckless, one of the most indefensible, one of the most wasteful and full of the greatest possibilities of plunder and wrongdoing that was ever submitted to the parliament of Canada or any other legislative body on this continent. The contract, I repeat, was negotiated in secrecy, surrounded with suspicions and with indecent haste, under what is now known to be a false and absurd pretence of urgency, with unjust and unreasonable concessions to the contractors in regard to monopoly privileges and exemptions from royalties, and with almost fabulous territorial rights and privileges over at least 4,000,000 acres of the public domain, said on good authority to contain the richest gold deposits in the world, and as it has come to this House with all these iniquitous conditions materially unaltered, it should be unhesitatingly rejected by this chamber.

I condemn the contract embodied in the bill before the Senate, as well as the bill itself, for the following, among other, reasons :

1. Because it was negotiated in secret with an evident desire to avoid publicity or competition, and with the determination to give this Yukon railway contract to Mackenzie & Mann, and nobody else, under an Order in Council, contrary to the public interests, and to the principles of parliamentary government we are supposed to possess in this Dominion.

2. Because it confers a monopoly on the contractors in regard to the construction of railways in that section of Canada unjust to other persons desirous of competing with these contractors, and detrimental to the public welfare, which should not be granted by this parliament.

3. Because it is not an all-Canadian route, capable of creating and protecting Canadian trade and commerce with the Yukon gold fields, free from control or interference by a foreign power, of whose hostility we have already undisguised indications.

4. Because, in the imposition of mining royalties, it makes an iniquitous discrimination against ordinary labour and enterprise in favour of the contractors

5. Because the blind and improvident grant of gold-yielding lands to the contractors, or to the company created by the bill, is indefensible from every point of view, and must prove disastrous to the peace, prosperty and progress of the Yukon gold district, as well as a great loss and sacrifice of the national wealth.

6. Because the route from Port Wrangel to Dawson is not the best available for immediate use for which purpose the route should be from some point at the head waters of Lynn Canal, as the construction of an all-Canadian route from Portland Inlet is unadvisable at the present time on account of the great liability it would impose on the Dominion, without any certainty of equivalent advantages in return.

7. Because the policy of the government should be to secure a route to the Yukon gold fields that would most surely foster and develop Canadian trade, commerce and agriculture, and create by commercial intercourse, a community of interests between the eastern and western provinces of the Dominion, and that these ends would be most certainly attained by promoting connection between Edmonton and the Yukon gold district, without unduly adding to the burden of the people.

There is abundant evidence, hon. gentlemen, to support every one of these propositions or allegations, indeed I may say there is such a redundancy of facts and proofs to sustain them, that it would certainly try the patience of hon. members if I were to attempt to deal with much less than one-half of those facts and proofs in a single speech. Nor is it necessary that I should do so, as I know that the numerous and unanswerable objections to the bill will all be ably put before the House by hon. senators who will follow me in what I anticipate will be a protracted debate. With regard to the first proposition or allegation, it cannot be denied that this contract was negotiated with unaccountable secrecy, and with a set purpose all through to effect a deal with Mackenzie & Mann. Every step taken in the negotiations showed that the government did not want any outside competition to interfere with their favourites. They did not desire publicity, because they knew it would result in the keenest competition for the construction of this railway by parties who were ready to undertake the work, and were cheated out of their chances of doing so by the subterfuges of the Minister of the Interior. Publicity and competition did not suit the schemes of the minister, although they would have protected the rights and interests of the public, and at the same time be more in harmony with the spirit of parliamentary government than a secret Order in Council in a business of the greatest magnitude, which should only be transacted in light of day and after the freest discussion and criticism in parliament. We all recollect how fiercely the members of the present administration denounced government by Order in Council when they were in opposition, and contended for public competition in connection with all public works and expenditures. Pages of the Hansard are filled with their bitterest denunciations when this primary principle of parliamentary government was violated by their political opponents. I will only quote a single extract from one of the speeches of the present Minister of Trade and Commerce. Sir Richard said :

> Both sides of the House ought to be at one upon this question, both sides of the House ought to feel, that whether they have confidence in the ministry of the day or not, it is their duty as members of parliament, it is their duty above all as members of the House of Commons, to insist that the government do not put their hands into the treasury or use large sums of money without the previous sanction of parliament. Unless that principle is laid down, unless that principle is enforced, it is obvious that it is utterly hopeless to have any proper control over the acts of government.

Sir Richard there well and truly asserted that the observance of these principles lies at the very foundation of responsible government in this country, and I am sorry to see an hon. gentleman who was so loud in denouncing the abuse of those principles when his party was in opposition, and who promised the country such a different course of procedure when they obtained power, falling into the same mistake and committing the same culpable error which they charged against their opponents. We have within the short period that they have been in power had two contracts, the Drummond County Railway deal, and the Grand Trunk Railway deal, in connection with the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal, involving some seven millions of capital. We have those contracts negotiated secretly, without any authority from parliament, and now it seems there has been another secret negotiation and bargain, also unauthorized by parliament, in fact in the face of a direct vote of this branch of the legislature against the first contract that had been entered into by the Minister of Railways in connection with that public work. Then we have this contract, the consequences and importance of which perhaps none of us fully realize, not only entered into in secrecy, but with an evident desire to prevent publicity and competition, and to prevent anybody else interfering to spoil the little game that was going on between Mr. Sifton and Mackenzie & Mann. It was no haphazard thing at all, but all the circumstances point in the direction that it was a premeditated plan that this contract with all its valuable franchises—and they are perhaps of untold value, none of us, I repeat, can estimate their value—that this contract with all these wasteful franchises shall go to these people.

I know it has been alleged that Sir Richard on the occasion I have quoted only had reference to revenue expenditures, but it is an absurdity to say that this principle is not as applicable to a grant of the public domain or any other source of national wealth, as some of the organs of the government contend—a contention, however, that the Minister of Justice very properly repudiates. There is always danger, there must always be suspicion when negotiations are conducted in secret where enormous pecuniary interests are at stake. Can there be a doubt that there was an object and studied purpose about this secrecy to prevent outside competition interfering with the old-time friends of the Minister of the Interior, Mackenzie & Mann? There is the clearest evidence, that outside competition was anticipated unless the contract was hurriedly signed before the meeting of parliament. Here is a clipping from the Ottawa Free Press of the 29th of January, the day after the Toronto Globe announced the completion of the Mackenzie & Mann contract. The government organ has the following with reference to the Stikine-Teslin Lake Railway, headed in large letters :

> MONEY DROPPED.
> The government bargain with Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie for the construction of a railway line from Teslin Lake to the Stikine River has dealt a hard blow to the capitalists who were promoting other railway schemes and fondly getting them ready for parliament. Some thirty applications which would have come up for consideration this session are dealt a death blow before the House opens, as the contract distinctly states that no competitive lines are to be given a chance through Canadian territory for five years. A gentleman who represented a large proposition for which he has been working for months, says that no less than a quarter of a million dollars in cold cash has been dropped by the parties who have surveyed routes into Dawson and made partial arrangements for building the same.

The Free Press is the organ of the government at the capital, and as we all know is frequently inspired by the government—and it makes this important declaration in its editorial columns, from which we learn that there would have been almost unlimited competition for railway charters, for the purpose of opening up communication with the Yukon district, as soon as parliament was convened, if this deal had not been consummated. The probability is that more than one company would be willing to construct the proposed railway, for the monopoly privileges alone, without an acre of land or a dollar of cash subsidy if this improvident contract had not been entered into before the meeting of parliament. We all know that one syndicate in particular was eager to get the ear of the minister—and that it meant business. I mean the company represented by Mr. Hamilton Smith, but how was that gentleman treated? It is now matter of history that in order to cover up or draw away attention from their crooked dealings with Mackenzie & Mann, ministers have not hesitated elsewhere to defame the reputation of an honourable man, and a substantial British capitalist; and never were meaner tricks resorted to—such as the telegram to Lord Strathcona—than were resorted to by them to accomplish their unworthy purposes. I have in my hand a moderate article on this subject from the able editorial pen of the Montreal Star of March 3, which I think should go on record in our Hansard, and I shall therefore read it:

It is to be regretted that Sir Wilfrid Laurier has decided not to bring down his cablegram to Lord Strathcona with reference to Mr. Hamilton Smith, because his refusal is incompatible with that nice sense of honour that the people of Canada, irrespective of party, would like to recognize in Sir Wilfrid.

Had the premier chosen to ignore Mr. Hamilton Smith and his offer to build a railway to the Yukon, that would have been simply a matter of policy. But he has chosen to publicy challenge the good faith of Mr. Hamilton Smith, and on the floor of parliament, with great formality and dramatic effect, he produced some correspondence, and subsequently gave out to the press a cablegram with the evident purpose of convicting Mr. Hamilton Smith of bad faith.

He, however, made one significant omission; he omitted to produce his own cablegram to Lord Strathcona inquiring about Mr. Hamilton Smith. When he was asked by Sir Charles Tupper to produce this, he promised to do so. But, on mature reflection, he declines to fulfil his promise, and declares private his own part in a correspondence the rest of which he has chosen to make public.

On the strength of this correspondence, Sir Louis Davies yesterday, in the House of Commons, called Mr. Hamilton Smith a prevaricator, which is the parliamentary equivalent for the lie direct. Such an issue as this being raised, it is most unfortunate for the premier that there should be in the correspondence a cablegram of his own which he is ashamed or afraid to produce. Sir Wilfrid's severest critic has never said about him anything half so bad as the unavoidable inference to be drawn from this refusal. The whole conduct of the government in connection with this matter, especially the angry feeling manifested, is calculated to give the Hamilton Smith offer an importance in the public mind that otherwise it would not have had.

It is only just to the gentleman whose offer to accept a contract from the government at a lower price than Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie's has so aroused the anger of the ministry, to point out that there is no evidence before the public to indicate that Mr. Hamilton Smith ever claimed to represent Messrs. Rothschild. The only reference he makes to that firm in his letter to the premier is in the following terms:

"In this connection allow me to state that no offer to build the line was made from the house of N. M. Rothschild & Sons, as has been stated in the House of Commons."

That Mr. Hamilton Smith has some kind of connection with the Rothschilds seems likely from the guarded terms of Lord Strathcona's cablegram to the premier:

"Lord Rothschild authorizes me to say Hamilton Smith is not their agent and is in no sense authorized to make any proposition on their behalf to the Canadian government."

Surely this is not the language in which Lord Strathcona or Lord Rothschild would have denounced such an imposter as Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Sir Louis Davies would have us believe Mr. Hamilton Smith to be? The significance of the answer is entirely dependent upon the nature of the question, which the premier is afraid or ashamed to produce.

Another proof of the insincerity of the government with regard to this matter is the fact that it was only after long delay and after pressure that Mr. Sifton yesterday acknowledged in the House that he had had a conversation with Sir William Van Horne before December 20th, in the course of which Sir William mentioned "that there was a gentleman named Hamilton Smith, who was prepared to call upon him (Mr. Sifton) for the purpose of discussing the question of a railway to the Yukon."

The only thing that seems to be very clear about this business is that the government for its own reasons (no doubt ample ones) did not want to discuss Yukon railway with anybody else but Messrs. Mann & Mackenzie. The petulance of the ministers and the offensive remark of Sir Louis Davies were not justified by anything that Mr. Hamilton Smith has said or done publicly. Perhaps "the storm" in Ontario had an irritating effect. But if the ministers value their reputations as gentlemen and men of honour, they will insist upon the production of Sir Wilfrid's cablegram to Lord Strathcona or upon an ample public apology to Mr. Hamilton Smith.

At first it was attempted to justify the secret and hasty negotiation of the Mackenzie & Mann contract on the ground of urgency, and an alarming picture was drawn of the terrible disaster and misery that would inevitably be the fate of the thousands that would rush into the Yukon district in search of gold during the coming season, if this Teslin tramway was not immediately constructed. Disaster and ruin to the trade of Canada with that region were also predicted on similar grounds, until urgency seemed to be the only plank on which the government had to stand. But that plank has had to be abandoned, for in the light of the information we now possess there never was and never could have been any urgency in the business. I will not cite authorities that have been fully cited elsewhere to show that since the first report of Mr. Ogilvie in 1887, but especially since the early part of 1896, year by year, we have received all the information that we needed to prepare the government to deal with that country without any urgency or indecent haste. The Minister of Railways is authority for the declaration that before the close of last session, the ministry had full knowledge of the value of the Yukon gold district and anticipated an enormous rush into it during the present year. Here are the minister's own words which as completely nullify the plea of urgency as it is possible for language to do it :

> In obtaining information with regard to the probable influx of people into that country, we were led to believe that the number of people who would be likely to seek the Yukon region during the present year would be exceedingly large. I believe that agents of transportation companies, who have the means of acquiring accurate information and forming a pretty fair judgment, advised—at least some of them did—that as many as 250,000 people would be finding their way into the Yukon country during the present year. Others connected with transportation companies also did not form so high an estimate of the probable numbers, but a large proportion of them, at all events, put the figure at 100,000, and none, so far as my information goes, put it as low as 50,000.

How absurd and misleading does the plea of urgency appear, in relation to the signing of the contract in January last, when we have the admission out of the mouth of the Minister of Railways that all the information that was needed was in the possession of the government while parliament were in session last year. Nay, more, in the course of a preliminary discussion in another place on the 2nd day of the present month of March, it came out that the government as early as the 16th of last March, a year ago, had Mr. Ogilvie final report on the great Klondike discoveries although they did their best to keep the news from the public. Then, as the Ottawa Citizen truly says, for full seven months they were culpably inactive in securing this much-needed (as they contended) railway communication for which they now plead such great emergency. Thus the plea of urgency, the strongest plea the ministry had to depend on, is completely demolished and exploded. With all this information in their possession why did they not take parliament into their confidence last session, and ask for authority to deal with the difficulties that faced them. Their reprehensible silence, showing as it does such a contempt of parliament, I have no hesitation in saying, is the greatest outrage on parliamentary institutions such as we are supposed to possess that has ever disgraced the annals of this country, and would alone justify this House in rejecting this bill.

The monopoly clauses of the contract are among its worst features, but if they were unavoidable, they ought alone to have been an ample inducement to capitalists to build this Stikine-Teslin tramway. Let me read these clauses to the House :

> 4. For five years from the 1st September, 1898, no line of railway shall be authorized by parliament to be constructed from Lynn Canal or thereabouts, or from any point at or near the international boundary between Canada and Alaska into the Yukon district, and for five years from said date no aid in land or money shall be granted to any person or company other than the contractors and the contractors' company to assist in building any such railway.
> 5. The contractors and the contractors' company shall be entitled to receive in preference to any other person or company during ten years from the said 1st of September, 1898, such aid or assistance in land or money as the government may be authorized and may see fit to grant in aid of a line of railway from the Stikine River to an ocean port in British Columbia, provided that the contractors or contractors' company are willing to undertake the construction of the same at once and completion thereof within a reasonable time upon receiving notice thereof from the government.

I am not going to detain hon. gentlemen by an calculation showing the immense value of this unwise monopoly. The cost of the road is estimated by the government engineer at $25,000 per mile, as it is intended to be a low grade road. If a tithe of the number is realized that some persons have contended will go into the Yukon district this year, the company's monopoly alone will, it is calculated, yield a profit on the capital invested greater than is derived from any railroad on the continent. If this improvident bargain had not been made there is little doubt that among the numerous applications which the Free Press tells us would have been made to parliament this session but for the execution of the Mackenzie & Mann contract—this tramway might have been constructed without any special privileges by some other company. Is there any doubt that if the government were to-day in a position, or had been in a position at the time parliament met for the present session to call for tenders, that we would not have had our table loaded with petitions for charters to build this railway, perhaps without an acre of land or a dollar of subsidy, or a single monopoly advantage. This is the opinion of men whose judgment in this respect is worth a great deal more than mine, because that judgment is founded on long practical experience in these matters. It is the opinion, that if this contract had been left open till the meeting of parliament more than half a dozen companies would be found knocking at our doors asking for permission to build this railway without an acre of land or dollar of subsidy or a single monoply privilege. And yet in the face of all this we give these people a monopoly which of itself, if the anticipations of the government are realized at all and immigrants into that country as is expected they will come, the lowest figure upon which the estimate is made for the influx this year would be fifty thousand people; some put it at two hundred thousand. I read a calculation made on the basis of twelve thousand people going in there this season, and on that calculation the profits of the road would be about nearly half a million dollars. If with an influx of only twelve thousand people, such enormous profits, greater than any railway on the continent would show, could be realized, what would they be on fifty thousand, the lowest calculation which reasonable men who understand the subject place the immigration at? There can be no doubt under all these circumstances, that without any subsidy — without even a monopoly this road could have been built, and therefore I say it was most unjustifiable to enter into such an improvident contract.

I am opposed to the road again because it is not an all-Canadian route. I need not dwell long on that point. When the scheme was first presented to the public one of the great merits it was represented to possess was that it would be an all-Canadian route, but now I do not think anybody ventures to say for a moment that the line from Wrangel to Telegraph Creek and Teslin Lake is going to open up an all-Canadian route to the Klondike. It can not be an all-Canadian route because it has first to come up the Stikine. In view of recent developments, I do not think that the parrot cry of an all-Canadian route will be any longer indulged in by the friends of the bill. The government have had a rude awakening at Washington by the action of the Senate in regard to our treaty rights of navigation on the Stikine River, which certainly puts a new face on this all-Canadian route, which the ministry should have anticipated in dealing with a people whose good faith, Canadians have no reason to hold in very high esteem. I believe the recent legislation at Washington is a clear violation of our treaty rights, but it may take years of diplomancy to settle the questions involved, and in the meantime where will be our all-Canadian route, if our shipping is not allowed to navigate the Stikine River in United States territory, unless under conditions as injust as they are insulting, and which no administration in this country dare entertain for one instant. What a pitiful exhibition of bungling and incompetency is here presented by the ablest government that Canada has ever had in not foreseeing and providing against the present complications, before entering into this reckless contract. I say the Stikine-Teslin route is not an all-Canadian route, and therefore it can have no preference with our people on such ground; but since the fact has become palpable by the action of the Senate of the United States, that we may possibly have trouble at Wrangel, a new idea has taken possession of the government, that is, to extend this road to Portland Inlet or some other Canadian port. We hear now, after giving these enormous concessions to the company for the building of this little tramway from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake, that we are to be burdened with a money subsidy to extend the road from Telegraph Creek down to some port of our own upon the coast of British Columbia. We are told the distance is 200 miles. I have been given to understand on good authority that it is nearer 300 than 200, through a rough and difficult piece of country, and I ask where is this money to come from to build the extension after all this treasure has been thrown away to the tram road. Can the Dominion of Canada afford to spend millions to extend that road to Portland Inlet at the present time? And, by implication, the government admit the road is no good unless that extension takes place. I do not believe parliament would be induced to grant the large sum of money necessary to extend that road from Telegraph Creek to a British Columbia port, and then only giving us a very incomplete and imperfect connection with the Klondike gold fields, because this road after all is simply a road of 150 miles connecting the head waters of the Stikine River with the waters of Lake Teslin, and is only available, as we know, for about five months in the year. There are seven months in the year when this road will be useless. The best authorities tell us that even if we extend it down as far as Portland Inlet, it would be useless in the winter season. The gentleman who addressed a number of senators in one of the committee rooms of this House yesterday, said he had just crossed from Dawson to Dyea, at the head of Lynn Inlet, on his way to Ottawa and that if the Stikine railway had been completed he would do the same thing, that it would be shorter to cross there than to come down by the contemplated route by way of Telegraph Creek, and that, even if the railway were completed, he would not use it; he would come out the way that he did. I have a little book before me which gives some information on this question. Even if this road is completed it is only going to be a summer road. We have the best authority for saying it will be used only when the navigation is open. There are five summer months during which it will be used, and during that time, the natural means of ingress to that country by the Yukon River will be cheaper and more expeditious than this railway. It will be more expeditious and cheaper alike for traffic and travel to go into Dawson City by the Yukon River than to take this railway and water route by the Stikine. Therefore during the time when this road would be available it is not likely to be used because the natural means of communication with the Klondike would have the preference. I think it must be evident to hon. gentlemen that this road, even after paying the enormous price we are going to pay for it would be an exceedingly bad bargain for this country. Let me read from the book which has been put into my hands with regard to these means of communication:

> It is 150 miles from the mouth on the Stikine River to the point at which it is proposed the railway shall begin, 65 miles from the head of Lake Teslin to the head of the Hootalinqua River and 135 miles thence to the junction of the Hootalinqua and the Lewes—that is to say 350 miles of waterway not navigable more than five months of the year and some years not so long—350 miles of waterway of which the railway is not designed to cut off one its length (150 miles) being the distance from the Stikine and the head of Lake Teslin. From Skagway to the junction of the Hootalinqua and the Lewes is only 226 miles; so that travellers might be expected to prefer the route they are now using, even with the railway a fact instead of a proposal, during at least seven months of every year.
> The Lewes and the Yukon are closed by ice about the same months as the Hootalinqua, and in that for seven months, at least, of every year a person journeying from the mouth of the Stikine River to Dawson would, notwithstanding the aid of a railway such as is proposed, have to make his way by dog team or otherwise for 680 miles on the ice, the confluence of the Hootalinqua and the Lewes being 330 miles from Dawson, it is clear there could be no better freight traffic by way of the Stikine, for it has been abundantly shown by men of the Yukon, and indeed by several distinguished explorers of Arctic regions, that he does well who can make a journey of that sort encumbered by nothing not essential to his maintenance en route.

So that even if the road were completed during the winter season it would be better to take the route from Dawson out to the head of Lynn Inlet than to come down to Telegraph Creek and in that way get out to the Pacific coast, and this road if it is useful for anything at all, it will simply be a competing line with the natural means of communication during the season of navigation. Yet this is the road has been proclaimed as a complete Canadian route, and it was contended that it was urgent and necessary that the government should take the steps they did without seeking for tenders or giving publicity to their proceedings to secure its construction at once. Notwithstanding the fact that my hon. friend the Secretary of State says that he had no intimation of Mr. Ogilvie's first report in March, 1897—and I do not for a moment doubt the statement of my hon. friend in that respect—here was the Minister of Railways, the one who introduced this bill telling the country that he had full information before parliament was prorogued last session, and that was in July, that that information was in the hands of the government.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—Here is an extract taken from the Hansard of the House of Commons—surely there cannot be any dispute about it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I called the hon. gentleman's attention to columns 1013 and 1014 of this year's Hansard:

Mr. McALISTER asked,

On what date or dates did the government, or any officer thereof, first receive William Oglivie's reports, sent from the Yukon District, dated 18th August, 1896; 6th September, 1896; 6th November, 1896; 9th December, 1896; 11th January, 1897, and 23rd January, 1897, respectively.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The report of the 6th September, 1896, was received on the 19th October, 1896. The report of the 18th August, 1896, on the 22nd October, 1896. The report of the 6th November, 1896, on the 16th February, 1897. The report of the 9th December, 1896, on the 27th February, 1897. The report of the 11th January, 1897, on the 16th March, 1897. The report of the 23rd January, 1897, on the 16th of March, 1897.

Carrying out exactly what the hon. gentleman has said.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I was quite aware of all these reports, but as I said in the outset it was not my intention to amplify my points at any great length for the reason I was unwilling to tire the House unreasonably. I have only one or two points to make before I close. The one ground on which this contract could be justified at all was the ground of urgency, and I ask hon. gentlemen if that ground is not entirely swept from under the feet of my hon. friends by the various reports which the government had in its possession, and the members of the government are all presumed to be and should be cognizant with those reports. It is their duty to be so and they cannot plead ignorance of them. With the declaration made by the Minister of Railways before the close of last session, was it not their duty to have taken steps at that time to meet the emergency—to have taken parliament into their confidence then, to have obtained authority necessary to provide for every emergency that might arise in connection with that country? I say it was their clear duty and they failed most lamentably in not discharging that duty at the time.

I need not say anything with regard to the unfair imposition of royalty duties upon the actual miner in such marked contrast to the unfair advantages given to this company. I think that clause in the bill before the House is most unjust. It is not sactioned in any other country where mining industries exist. On the contrary in the mining districts of Alaska just opposite the Klondike, the royalty or whatever they call their tax, imposed by the government there, without, I believe, any rental, is only one per cent. Here rental is imposed on the actual miner and the royalty of 10 per cent besides. It is unnecessary to go into any illustration to show how oppressive this regulation must be to every miner in that country, and what an enormous advantage it gives to the contractors who hold this vast land grant of 3,750,000 acres of the best gold producing lands in the Northwest. In what position will the actual miner be in comparison with them? He will certainly occupy a position of great disadvantage. The fact is, as was very properly stated by Mr. Livernash yesterday, that in course of time the contractors, if this bill should become law, will possess all the gold fields of the Klondike, and every one going in there must submit to any tyranny they wish to exercise to extort all they can out of their enormous monopoly. I am told that if this bill should pass, these gold lands could to-morrow be put on the markets of the world and stocked at $20,000,000. I am told by men whose opinion on such questions are worthy of the highest credence that these contractors would be able to float a company with these enormous privileges and this immense area of gold-bearing land, in the London market for over $20,000,000; some go so far as to say a much larger sum. These men, in addition to all their monopolies and exemptions get this large tract of land, and get it in a way that they will be able to make their selections so as to secure the most valuable gold fields in that country. This is a point upon which I cannot go into details. Some of the hon. gentlemen who heard the lucid explanation of Mr. Livernash yesterday will give them; but it was shown how, by an adroit management of the power vested in them by the 12th clause of the bill, they could locate their claims in such a manner as to have the upper hand, not only of the government, but of every miner that went into that country to follow a precarious industry. If there was no other objection to this extraordinary bill, but the improvident grant of the public domain to such an extent as 3,750,000 acres, and perhaps a much larger extent—because that is based on the assumption that the road will be only 150 miles long, but good authorities say it may be 200 miles long—the bill would be utterly indefensible. What effect will this enormous grant have on the peace, prosperity and progress of that country? When my hon. friend talks of maintaining peace and order in those gold fields as he did yesterday—when he talks of the duty of the government to see that property rights are protected there, I say there could be no greater obstacle to the peace, order and good government of that region than the improvident concessions given in this bill, all bearing on their face the indications of a huge job.

After having given this question a good deal of consideration my own opinion is that for the line from the head of Lynn Inlet inwards would be the most serviceable line to the Klondike for present use and we are less likely to have custom difficulties at the head of Lynn Inlet than at Fort Wrangel. In fact I see by the papers recently that the understanding which was said to have been completed between the Minister of Interior and a member of the Washington Cabinet in regard to allowing the goods of Canada to pass over the United States territory on paying duty to be returned, that that arrangement is being carried out satisfactorily under recent orders from Washington. I think that this arrangement could be depended upon for the present year to get ingress into that country. The question of urgency if it existed at all is now past—there is no danger of starvation this year—there is no great danger of any disaster of that kind overtaking any of these people in that country this winter ; and during the coming season when the Yukon River is open to shipping enough provisions can be sent to Dawson City to feed all who may go to the Klondike in the next five years. At any from this time forward a full supply of provisions and other necessaries can easily be placed in Dawson City a year in advance while the season of navigation lasts. There can be no plea of urgency now that the period of danger is nearly over without any disaster. The plea of urgency existed with respect to the present winter but it exists no longer, and the strongest argument the government had to reply on in connection with this extraordinary bill is swept from under their feet.

For my own part I am in favour of the Edmonton route to the Yukon gold fields—an opinion I have formed from a study of this subject and from reading the able speeches of gentlemen in the other House, and especially after reading the conclusive presentation of the case by Mr. Oliver, a member of that House, I am convinced that for a permanent national line, a line that will foster trade with old Canada and the North-west Territories where trade exists to be fostered, a line that will open up a vast agricultural district, a line that can be built at a very low expense to secure ready, quick and easy communication with the far west at all seasons of the year—where a cheap railway can be constructed for seven or eight thousand dollars a mile, and in the aggregate for a not much larger sum than we are asked to give the Drummond Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway for a superfluous line to connect the Intercolonial Railway with Montreal. For seven or eight million dollars we could get communication with the Yukon district through a fertile country, developing its agricultural resources and opening up fields of settlement, offering room for homesteads to those immigrants which my hon. friend from Toronto is so desirous of seeing come into the country—but I may say to my hon. friend that the immigrants who are attracted by our gold fields are not the best immigrants to settle the vacant lands of Canada. They are indeed of a very different class. But I contend by securing temporary communication by the shortest and least expensive route from the Pacific coast to Dawson City—from the head of Lynn Canal, for the present, then looking at once to the construction of a cheap railway from Edmonton—that the government would have shown it was equal to the emergency it had to deal with. Perhaps it was too much to expect the men who now occupy the treasury benches—we must recollect that these gentlemen are the political heirs of the men who occupied those benches between 1873 to 1878 when the great responsibility of securing connection between the old provinces of Canada and our great North-west and British Columbia was the all absorbing question then agitating this country. My hon. friend the Secretary of State is reported to have said on a public hustings in this city that it would take forty years to build the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I myself heard him state in this House that the whole resources of the British Empire could not build that railway in the time the Canadian Pacific Railway Company undertook to build it, whereas the company took three or four years less than their contract gave them. We all know what the policy of the party was in regard to connecting these old provinces with the great North-west on which the future hopes of this great Dominion are so largely founded. Their policy at that time was to connect this country by the water stretches. Now, I ask gentlemen who know what was afterwards achieved by the Liberal-Conservative party—the party that has done every thing for this Dominion of which we can boast—the party to which I am proud to belong, because it has made this Dominion what it is to-day, which created it, and bound the various parts together and placed it in the honourable position which now makes it the admiration of all our fellow subjects the world over. That party has been guilty of some mistakes, but it is nevertheless the party which has made this country what it is to-day—notwithstanding we were fought inch by inch on the floors of parliament, and on the public platform, and our policy was denounced as ruinous to the country—in spite of all that opposition, our national aims were accomplished. Compare the condition of things to-day with that which would have existed if the policy of the Liberal party had prevailed, if we were dependent on the water stretches of the Lake of the Woods to get communication with our magnificent North-west Territories. It is natural, therefore, that the political views of gentlemen whose policy was so pessimistic in 1873 and 1878, should not be able to take a large national grasp of the present question, and grapple at once with the only true solution of this question—that is a railway from some point in our North-west Territories, connecting the gold mines of the Pacific coast with a splendid agricultural country, with our manufacturing industries, and with our centres of trade and commerce everywhere ; and not a railway that will, in spite of all you can do, hand over the greater part of that trade to foreigners ; for I contend no matter what we do to prevent it, with an outlet on the Pacific coast only, the greater part of the Yukon trade will go to our rivals to the south of us. Hon. gentlemen, I have occupied your time longer than I intended, and I must bring my remarks to a conclusion.

Several hon. MEMBERS—Go on.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I have tried to compress my observations as far as possible. The material is ample to go on, but I do not feel that I am justified in imposing on your patience any further. I am not in the habit of late years of addressing the House frequently, and perhaps I feel more at liberty to take advantage of your indulgence on this occasion on that account.

There is only another subject to which I wish to allude before I resume my seat, but it is one that interests all of us. The subject to which I refer is the right and power of this House to reject a bill of this character, embodying the policy of the government on an important question, and sent to us by the House of Commons with the endorsation of that branch of the legislature. Strange to say, there are persons who contend that we possess no such right or power, but that if we do, we are not at liberty to exercise it. It is true, there have been some notable changes of late in the attitude of certain newspaper writers towards this House, who have adopted, I suppose for the occasion, a more courteous tone in their references to us, which doubtless will be quickly dropped when we incur their displeasure. I think, however, I may safely affirm that neither threats nor coaxing can influence the members of this Senate when called upon to discharge a grave and important public duty. There can be no doubt, hon. gentlemen, both of our right and power to reject this or any similar measure that may be presented to us, and that if we consider it to be unwise, unjust, or above all open to the suspicion or possibility of corruption or wrong-doing, it is our bounden duty to do so. For my own part, whether rightly or wrongly, I look upon the bill before the House as open to all three of the objections I have named, and therefore it is my plain duty to vote against it. The rejection by this body of any bill under such circumstances, far from being contrary to the spirit and meaning of the constitition, I believe to be the clearest duty the constitution imposes on every member of this chamber. The Senate was never created as a co-ordinate branch of parliament simply for the purpose of registering the decrees of another branch, whether good or bad—right, wrong or unpolitic. This was never intended to be the scope and meaning of the powers with which the emphatic language of the soverign legislative authority of the empire clothed this body in the charter of our constitution. This Senate was intended to be an acting, and, if necessary, an over ruling force, subject to well understood restrictions, in the law making functions of the parliament of Canada, with rights, powers and privileges as clearly defined, as indisputable, as unassailable as those of the House of Commons. Otherwise our coming together in this chamber to deliberate on questions of legislation is a delusion, a mockery and a farce. Otherwise the British constitution itself—the wisest system of human government that has ever emanated from the mind of man—and which, in principle, is the model of the constitution of Canada, as declared in preamble of the British North America Act, 1867, must also be, if this caricature of our constitution can be maintained—nothing better than a mockery, a delusion and a farce. The theory—the true theory of the British constitution, and as a corollary the true theory of the constitution of Canada, is that the three co ordinate branches of parliament are independent and untrammelled in their respective spheres, which law, usage and precedent have amply defined. Whenever differences arise between the two houses of parliament, in England—and how often and how bitter have been the collisions, of the Lords and Commons even in the present century—the fabric of the constitution has seldom been in real danger. Perhaps at no period within the last fifty years have the stability and authority of the House of Lords been more assured than they are at the present time. But in Canada, in the opinion of ignorant or violent partisans similar difficulties can only be overcome by the abolition of the Senate—by shattering the constitutional fabric—by destroying the compact of confederation—and revolutionizing our whole system of government—for that is what the abolition of this House would mean. And why is it different in England? Because there, it is well understood, that constitutional usage provides a means of escape in every such emergency—that the constitution possesses, in fact, re-adjusting modes and principles of safety—characteristic of the genius and practical wisdom of the British people as a governing race—modes and principles of safety as applicable to parliamentary institutions in Canada as they are in the mother land. Whenever any serious dead-lock occurs in England between the two branches of the legislature, there is an appeal to the people whose arbitrament in the present day settles every dispute—for in the end it is the will of the people that must prevail. So when serious differences arise between the Commons and Senate of Canada, British usages and principles must be invoked—those differences must be referred to the people at the polls, when the Commons always must, and the Senate always will, conform to the popular verdict. Instead of this body over-riding or disregarding the will of the people in any difference between the two houses of parliament, the constitution, through the action of the Senate, affords a means by which the wishes of the people may be most unmistakably expressed. Thus is paid by this House the highest possible tribute of respect to the electorate as the source of all power, by referring every cause of difference between the two chambers directly and finally to its decision—in other words, by the action of what may be called the safety-valve of the constitution. And it is under such circumstances, we are in some quarters deemed deserving of annihilation as the enemies of government by the people, when in truth and fact we are its real champions and friends. Until the Senate abuses the great trust reposed in it—which it has never yet done—until we show a determination to put at defiance the will of the people clearly expressed on any public question, it is alike the duty and the interest of the electors of the Dominion to stand by this body in the exercise of its undoubted rights, for they all tend in the end to the more complete assertion and vindication of the rights and wishes of the people; and never would the rights and powers we possess have been given to the Senate in our constitutional charter by the most enlighted and liberty-loving parliament in the world, with any other aim or object, than the protection of the rights and liberties of the people. After the people have pronounced their decision, the decree must be final on both sides, and I am quite certain whenever any differences between the two houses are referred to the electorate, the Senate will not hesitate to obey any decision that may have received the impress and authority of the popular will—while, at the same time, this House will not fear to treat with indifference the imbecile threats of a partisan or venal press, as well as the vulgar vapourings of a tricky and corrupt minister, either inside or outside of the House of Commons. When the Senate does its duty fearlessly and honestly, as I am satisfied it will on this important occasion, it may safely put its enemies and assailants at defiance, and rely on popular approval to support its rights, and vindicate its fearless and unflinching exercise of them.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) moved:

That the bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months.

He said: There are more reasons than one for my not giving a silent vote on the question before the House, and I approach it with a deep sense of my responsibility for the opinion I express and the vote I give. The principal part of the Canadian trade with the Yukon is done by the province from which I come, and my wish is to promote that trade and keep our mineral lands for the people of Canada—and the course I am taking to-day will, I am convinced, prove to be the wisest and best for my province, and for the whole of the Dominion.

I will allude briefly to the manner in which the Liberal press of the country has treated this House. Some time—months—before it could possibly be known what the opinions of hon. gentlemen would be,—we were threatened and bullied, and the sword of the executioner held over our heads. Then the Minister of the Interior takes upon himself to threaten this House, and says if we do not follow his opinion—we will be held to a better account. I think the ministers in this House will agree that it was most unwise and impolitic of the Liberal press, and the Minister of the Interior to write, and speak in that strain, and I venture to say that all the bullying—and those threats will not influence the members of the House one way or the other—or make them shrink from their duty. This House is as firmly a part of the constitutional legislative system of the Dominion as the House of Commons is, and the Minister of the Interior cannot touch it.

It is not my intention to blame the government as a whole for this measure—probably the Minister of the Interior, who was charged with negotiating this contract, did the best he could according to the amount of common sense he was able to bring to bear—but in this matter he has displayed a lack of that commodity. It is certainly not my intention to attach any blame to the ministers of the Crown on the floor of this House for the contract—they are part of a system and have to go round with it or smash the machine—but if the private thoughts of these gentlemen were known they would most likely be found in condemnation of this bill and this contract. I sincerely believe that neither of these two ministers would sacrifice the country as the Minister of the Interior has done in this contract. I am willing and free to give praise in this matter where praise is due, and I bestow my praise on the contractors and their solicitor for the clever and astute contract they have made with the Minister of the Interior to whom this matter was intrusted. The contractors walked completely around him, turned him inside out, scooped his brains out and have taken from him every concession it was possible to take, and left nothing for the country but the husks.

The first part of the speech of the hon. Minister of Justice was devoted to the constitutional aspect of this question, and showing that this was a matter entirely for the House of Commons to deal with—and the hon. gentleman would like to have gone as far as to rule—that this House could not constitutionally deal with it—but he did not quite take that jump, but held up on the brink of the precipice. That part of the speech of the hon. Minister of Justice which dwelt so strongly on the necessity for, and the intention to have, an all-Canadian route to the Yukon, with a deep water harbour in our own country. I was much pleased to hear, and that part of the scheme has my entire approval.

Did it occur to the minister that his emphatic assurance that a road would be built from Observatory Inlet, and an appropriation asked for, is the strongest condemnation that could be given to the Stikine-Teslin route? If this is such a splendid route for which we give 4,000,000 acres of mineral land, how comes it that we require another route? If this Stikine road could be worked this summer there would be some force in the argument for having it, but as that is impossible its usefulness cannot be considered. How is this extension to Observatory Inlet to be paid for? There are no more millions of acres of Yukon land to give for it, so it must be a money payment of at least $4,000,000. What will the country say then, when 4,000,000 acres are given away for a useless road and $4,000,000 to substitute a good road for it, whereas one road on the best route from a deep water harbour would be sufficient? The hon. gentleman has spoken of the danger of a rebellion in the Yukon if this road is not built. That is an idle nightmare. We have had great experience with American and foreign miners in British Columbia, and they have always been found most law-abiding, ready and willing to uphold our laws and appreciating, in a high degree, the fairness and impartiality in their administration.

But I will tell the hon. minister what will cause friction—if not rebellion—that is the collection of a 10 per cent royalty, and the granting of this land by which the contractors could surround, or blanket every mine in Klondike, and cut the miners off from wood and from water for their flumes.

I intend dealing with the question on business principles, following the motto "business is business" I take first what the contractors are to give the country, and secondly, I will show what the country is giving the contractors.

1. The contractors propose to make first a sleigh road from the mouth of the Stikine to Teslin Lake—fully 200 miles. Does the government know that under the contract 30 or 40 miles of this sleigh road is in United States territory. What authority have we to make a road there? The sleigh road was to be finished in six weeks from the signing of the contract. That time expired on the 10th of this month; the first part of the contract is broken, and the country has secured $250,000 by forfeiture. This breaking of the contract enables the government to withdraw this bill now without being liable for damages. Which is the best thing the government could do? Survey, and go on with another line from Port Simpson or Alice Arm.

2. We get a narrow gauge railway of 150 miles, the ingress to which is through foreign waters, subject to vexatious and hampering regulations. Besides that, for five months each year the river, which is part of this railway route, is not navigable, or passable by sleighs or wagons. We have reliable information that there are thousands of miners and hundreds of tons of provisions now at the mouth of the Stikine that cannot proceed on account of the condition of the river.

3. The contractors are to provide transport facilities between the terminus on Teslin Lake and Dawson City; but no provision is made for transport from Wrangel to the railway at Telegraph Creek.

4. The contractors pay the government one per cent on gold mined by them, whereas the poor miner has to pay 10 per cent royalty. This is all I believe the country gets. Let us now take a look at what we are giving the contractors.

1. Between 3,750,000 and 4,000,000 acres of the pick of the mineral and timber lands in the extensive Yukon district.

2. We allow bonds to be issued to the extent of $25,000 per mile, for a narrow gauge road, whereas the ordinary 4 x 8 railway has never, as far as I know, been allowed to issue bonds for a higher amount.

3. We allow preferential stock to be issued. We know too well what that means. The small stockholder would be squeezed out.

4. We allow land grant bonds to be issued, and mortgages on the land.

5. The contractors are allowed to build railways and branches in all parts of the Yukon district. The company may construct and operate telephone and telegraph lines.

6. May do all and everything under the sun—that is to say conduct every kind of business in British Columbia and Northwest Territories, and they can expropriate land.

7. We now come to that part of the contract which gives a monopoly, which reads:

> For five years from 1st September, 1898, no line of railway shall be authorized by parliament to be constructed from Lynn Canal or thereabouts, or from any point at or near the international boundary between Canada and Alaska into the Yukon district, and for five years no aid in land or money shall be granted to any person or company other than the contractors.

The Minister of the Interior declared in his speech in the House of Commons that this contract gave no monopoly. What does the Minister of Justice call this clause? It is not an interpretation clause, nor is its scope qualified or lessened by any succeeding clause, but, on the contrary is strengthened by clause 5, following immediately after, which reads:

> The contractors, and the contractors' company shall be entitled to receive in preference to any other person or company during ten years such aid or assistance in land or money as the government may be authorized, and may see fit to grant in aid of a line of railway from the Stikine River to any ocean port in British Columbia.

I call this clause a monopoly clause which ties the hands of the government for ten years to one set of contractors, or to one company—without reference to the lowest bidder—so that under this contract the present contractors would get the work at their own figure.

9. The company fix their own freight and passenger rates for ten years—and we can judge they will be high enough—perhaps a shade below the rates by the longer Yukon River route.

10. The land grant to be free from taxation for ten years—excepting in towns or villages.

11. The mode of selecting the land, which is the most important part of the contract, has been drawn to give the contractors an advantage not contemplated by their friend, the Minister of the Interior, but if contemplated, I will not characterize the transaction, but will leave that to others.

We read, "base lines may be of two kinds." You will mark the word "may," and not "shall," which makes all the difference.

1. In selecting these lands, the company may take as a base line, a line which will correspond with the general course of any lake, river, stream, or water course, to be determined by survey or approximate survey, to the satisfaction of the authorized agent of the Minister of the Interior.

Under this clause of the contract the contractors could take the pick and cream of the whole country, and destroy all prospecting and sap the foundation of all industry and mining in the Yukon. These lines may be run in any direction, and the contractors need not take up any land on the second mode of selection or run lines north, south, east and west. Let us look at the income the government can derive and will derive if they hold this enormous grant for country.

Supposing a mining claim is one acre in extent, the government would receive $10 for a license, and $15 for recording, that is $25 per annum, not for one year only, but for many years.

The contractors may also take as a base line a line commencing at any point located by them and running from such point due north, east, south or west. The land along a base line to be divided into blocks, each block to extend three miles along the base line, and to extend three miles backwards on each side of the base line. On each base line there shall be at least eight of such blocks, but there may be more at the option of the contractor. These blocks to be numbered from one up—the odd numbered blocks to be the property of the contractors; the even numbered shall remain the property of the government.

It may fairly be asked why should the contractors be expected to take up a part of the land grant on base lines less advantageous than another series of base lines. The clauses in the contract relating to the selection of land are permissive and not mandatory, and of course the contractors will make their selection on the lines most favourable to themselves. In all probability the whole selection will be made under the first description of base lines, which gives power to follow lakes, rivers and water courses.

This railway is called an all-Canadian route, but it is not so. The entrance to it is through 30 or 40 miles of United States waters, the navigation of which is supposed to be free to us, although in reality it is not so, but is restricted by vexatious United States regulations. The river from the mouth to Glenora is liable for four months in the year to be impassable for navigation or travel by sleigh or wagon, as it is at the present time—the ice too heavy for steamers and not strong enough for sleighs or wagons. If access to the railway were quite possible all the year, then it would only be a narrow gauge, and would not carry much traffic and could make no connection with a road of the standard gauge. Should this railway be built by September, it would not relieve the glut of passengers and goods this year. No one has given a stronger condemnation to the proposed railway than the premier of Canada, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, for he has promised and declared that another railway must be built to an open harbour in British Columbia. It would be the end of October before the railway could send any supplies into Dawson City, by which time those northern waters will be closing up with ice. The Yukon River will be open in June. There are ten or twelve ocean steames ready to carry supplies to the mouth of that river. There will be thirty or forty light draught steamers this summer on the Yukon to carry miners and supplies from its mouth to Dawson City. Thousands of tons will be sent in this way fully three months earlier than the proposed railway could send a pound in. If this Stikine railway were built to-morrow, the government could not send a policeman or militia man in by it without the consent of the United States authorities. An armed force can as easily be sent in by the Dalton trial, or the Yukon as by the Stikine. Experience teaches that United States miners are most law-abiding when under the British flag and that they highly appreciate British law and order, and have been found ready and willing to uphold it. The fear of revolt against law in the Yukon is a baseless dream. Our country and institutions are as free and open to the foreigner as to the Britisher. Such being the case, wherein would lie the cause for revolt? It is not unlikely, however, but all nationalities, our own citizens as well as others, will kick at the 10 per cent royalty, and the government should at once reduce it to 5 per cent. The land grant is excessive and out of all proportion to the value received. I would not give my approval to 1,000,000 being granted in the gold-bearing district of the Yukon for the proposed narrow gauge. A deep-water harbour, and a real all-Canadian route should be selected, and a road built without delay, and even for such a road I would give 4,000,000 acres. It is asserted that this railway would keep the trade in Canada, where it by right belongs. It would do nothing of the kind; is would be just as open and free to United States commerce as to Canadian, and nothing can prevent United States citizens reaping a share of the trade. Returning miners with their gold would find at Wrangel United States steamers, as well as Canadian, and could take passage as they liked to a United States or a Canadian port. Here is where our steamship owners require to exercise enterprise and smartness—to meet returning miners at the different ports—to keep as much as possible the miners and gold in our own country. I am glad to think that a surveying, or rather a reconnoitering party has been sent to the west to look into the question of routes, and I trust no time or money will be wasted on the Stikine route, but that the party will confine its exploration to the finding of a suitable route to a deep water harbour in our own country.

It being six o'clock the Speaker left the chair.

After Recess.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—When this bill was read a third time in the House of Commons, it was announced throughout the length and breadth of this country in the Conservative press that the Upper Chamber was to throw out the bill. I need not say that I was very sceptical of the soundness of that conclusion. I need not say that I had more confidence in the integrity and fair play of this chamber than to give credence to statements of the kind. I have had some 25 years' experience in the Senate, and I believed that I could appeal with confidence to this chamber if it were shown that the bill before this House had the substantial merits that I claim for it. It was not, however, until I heard the applause that greeted the hon. senator from Brandon and the hon. senator from Richmond—more particularly the hon. senator from Richmond, who is not now in his place—that I then fully appreciated that the verdict of this House had been given in advance before a fair statement of this case had been submitted for their consideration.

Several Hon. MEMBERS—No, No.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hon. gentlemen say No, no: the applause was too marked. It was too evident. Hon. gentlemen may deny and repudiate it. I dare say they may. I am quite accustomed to that, but the applause and approval that greeted the language of those hon. gentlemen convinced me that the decision in this chamber was foregone, and there is no use mincing the matter.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—We may applaud you before you get through.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I hope the hon. gentleman will do so. If the hon gentleman is open to conviction, I have no doubt he will. I say that the fair fame and the character of gentlemen who have formed a part of this cabinet have been maligned, not criticized, and charges have been made against them. One hon. gentleman denounced this as a nefarious transaction, another hon. gentleman called it a job. That language was approved of apparently by this chamber. I have been myself forty years in public life. I was elected first in 1858. I have heard charges of that kind made time and again, and have always been slow to believe them. I have lived long enough to know that the gentlemen who made those charges were glad, in years after, to withdraw their accusations. Those charges ought not to be recklessly thrown across the floor of parliament when attacking the private character of individuals. I say that this contract is as fair and honest a transaction, and one conceived as much in the interests of the people of this country, as any measure that has ever been submitted to parliament. Hon. gentlemen say that the government ought to have acted earlier in this matter, that they ought to have known that it was necessary to prepare for the ingress into that country of a large population, and Mr. Ogilvie's reports have been cited as giving the government warning. Now, I hold in my hand Mr. Ogilvie's report, and I see nothing in it that would warrant the government in spending more than was absolutely necessary for opening the Yukon district by a railway or any other line of communication. It is quite true that Mr. Ogilvie speaks of discoveries made in creeks there, that he speaks of miners having found gold in different places, but there was nothing whatever to warrant any government going into an expenditure simply because there were rumours of gold in that country. Mr. Ogilvie's report, it was said, was made in March of last year. I hold in my hand this report. It was issued, apparently, by the department on the 8th June. It was not thought necessary even to call for it in parliament; it had not at that time created sufficient attraction to be considered worthy of being brought down as a paper; and it was not printed, if my memory is correct, till long after parliament rose last year. Now the opening note, at the introduction here, is the best possible evidence that there was no indication whatever that it was necessary for the government to take any active measures in order to meet what has been an unusual migration into that country. This is dated Ottawa, 8th June, 1897, not more than eight months ago, and not published for, I think, about two months after that:

The following notes on the Yukon district, consisting principally of information furnished by William Ogilvie, Dominion Land Surveyor, and are published in reply to numerous calls from the public for his report. The object is not to induce any one to go to that remote country at the present time; until better means of communication are established, a man undertakes serious risks in going there, unless he has sufficient resources to tide over the long winter. After September, egress from the country is practically impossible until the following June, and a person who has not been successful in locating a paying claim, has to depend for his subsistence upon finding employment. Wages are, at times, abnormally high, but the labour market is very narrow and easily overstocked. It is estimated that, up to the middle of May, 1,500 to 1,600 people had crossed the Taiya Pass this year. Several hundred more will go by steamer up the Yukon. Whether employment will be available for all and for the considerable population already in the district, is somewhat doubtful. It will, therefore, be wise for those who contemplate going to the Yukon district, to give serious consideration to the matter before coming to a decision.

That is the note that accompanies this report, which was, I think, given to the public about the month of July or August, that is the earliest I recollect. It was evidently prepared in the department on the 8th of June last. Now I say, at the time parliament rose there was nothing whatever to warrant the impression that any such discoveries as have since been reported were likely to be made. This gold fever is one that rises very rapidly. The moment a gold mine is discovered it excites the curiosity of a great number of people; and as a rule the reports are exaggerated. That has been the history of discoveries of gold mines; therefore, I say there was nothing whatever to warrant the government in taking any active measures. They were waiting for Mr. Ogilvie's return. Mr. Ogilvie did not return until the month of December. It was very well known that Mr. Ogilvie's letters were four or five months late, and except when navigation by the Yukon was open, access was practically an impossibility.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I understood the hon. gentleman to say that Mr. Ogilvie's report was in the department a long time and was not published—why not?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Mr. Ogilvie's report is made up of small scraps of letters that came in from time to time.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—And you wanted it in full before you published it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Every three or four months Mr. Ogilvie would write a letter but it was not a regular report. It was just made up of his letters to the department from time to time, written at different dates—just a sort of dairy was kept.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Was not a report received in March last year?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will just read what it was:

FORT CUDAHY, Jan. 22, 1897.

A quartz lode showing free gold in paying quantities has been located on one of the creeks, but I cannot yet send particulars. I am confident, from the nature of the gold found in the creeks, that many more of them—and rich too—will be found.

There is nothing extraordinary about that. These reports have been coming in since 1886. Of course they were improving every year. Then on the 23rd of January, that is the next day—and this is the last, the one that is quoted as having arrived on the 16th March—he writes :

I have just heard from a reliable source that the quartz mentioned above is rich, as tested, over one hundred dollars to the ton. The lode appears to run from 3 to 8 feet in thickness and is about 19 miles from the Yukon River. I will likely be called upon to survey it, and will be able to report fully.

Placer prospects continue more and more encouraging and extraordinary. It is beyond doubt that three pans on different claims on Eldorado turned out $204, $212 and $216 ; but it must be borne in mind that there were only three such pans, though there are many running from $10 to $50.

He did not report more frequently, because communication was cut off, and we did not see Mr. Ogilvie here until the month of December, when he came down. If hon. gentlemen will refresh their memories and go back to the days of the Cassiar and Cariboo mining excitement, I think there was $42,000,000 taken out——

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That was from the Cariboo district.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We did not build a railway certainly. We used the Stikine River to get up to the Cassiar mines. Some twenty years ago, when I was Commissioner of Crown Lands in Ontario, there was a mining craze ; Silver Island was turning out large quantities of silver, and the whole of the north shore of Lake Superior was supposed to be a silver mining country. The Ontario government sold large quantities of land, but the boom collapsed and nothing came of it. I remember on one occasion a gentleman from New York, who professed to have discovered silver or copper there, wanted to get 25,000 acres of land. My colleagues were appalled at the idea, but It hought it was better to sell it for $25,000, and I sold it. What became of it ? The land was eventually sold for taxes and reverted to the Crown, like all those mining lands on the north shore of Lake Superior. Any one who is familiar with the history of that country will find that lands have been sold in recent years at from one to three cents per acre, yet all that country was supposed to be valuable mineral land at the time of the boom. That is the history of every mining camp in the world. The uncertainty of its stability is the great trouble in the way of its progress and development, and therefore it would have been madness for the government to have acted on the reports they had last year. Besides no one knew anything about the country. No one had travelled through it except the employees of the Hudson Bay Company, and they had gone in by way of Edmonton. Perhaps an occasional wanderer had gone in by Telegraph Creek. Hon. gentlemen will see that it would have been very imprudent and unstatesmanlike for the government to have acted on rumours of that kind. It was only late in the fall of the year that it became apparent that the country was likely to be a permanent mining region. Then hon. gentlemen condemned at the start the Stikine route. They say it is not a Canadian route ; I deny that most emphatically. It has been a Canadian route at all times. It was a Canadian route to the Cassiar and Cariboo mines, and boats went up and down that way frequently, United States boats passing through Canadian territory, and Canadian boats through United States territory, without a word of objection. The same difficulty existed between the river boats and the ocean boats, and no one questioned the right of either country to tranship ; and the United States government appealed to the Canadian government to establish custom-houses high up on the river where their boats could report, because, before the custom-houses were established on the upper reaches of the Stikine, United States boats were compelled to report at Victoria, and that was represented to the Canadian government as a very serious hardship, and one that we ought in fairness, as good neighbours, to remove, and we did remove, by establishing a custom-house on the United States border. Hon. gentlemen talk as if the Stikine was an unknown river and never utilized ; but there is the fact that, if they choose to go back and study the history of that time, they will be able to appreciate that it has all the advantages of a Canadian route, and is the only Canadian route to that country that will afford at least some degree of facility and rapidity in reaching the Yukon district. Hon. gentlemen say that the Yukon River route is preferable. The route by the Yukon River is over four thousand miles from Victoria, or Vancouver, and the river itself is a tortuous and shallow stream that can only be navigated by very shallow boats, and then there are drifting quicksands in the river that make the navigation absolutely uncertain. Only two companies have, in past years, run boats up that river, the Alaska Trading Company and the American Trading Company. Those two companies have a monopoly of that trade. They use very shallow boats, and hon. gentlemen will remember last year, in sending up supplies in September to the Canadian portion of the Yukon, the boats were stopped on the way and United States miners took possession of them, and that was the cause of the food famine at Dawson, because the miners had taken possession of the supplies on the boats and appropriated them to their own use. Hon. gentlemen read the newspapers, I suppose, and I was rather surprised to-day, and somewhat gratified, to read a despatch from Victoria yesterday, in which it was stated that the routes by Dyea and Skagway had to be abandoned and the people were flocking to Wrangel. It is headed "All Canadian Routes are best; 5,000 people at Wrangel."

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—How are they going? By the sleigh roads?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—By the sleigh roads. Hon. gentlemen smile. Mackenzie & Mann have had a large force at work there. The Stikine is like the St. Lawrence and the Ottawa; there are some times thaws in winter when water is on the ice. That was the case a week or two ago, but notwithstanding all those embarrassments the Stikine is bound to be a preferable route to Dyea and Skagway.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—What report is that?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was in the papers last evening. I cut this out.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Who makes that report?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is headed "Vancouver, British Columbia," and is as follows:—

Despite all the statements made by the Seattle journals.

I hope the Seattle journals had no allies in Ottawa—although they had one yesterday.

Despite all statements to the contrary that are being made by Seattle journals, the all-Canadian route by way of Vancouver and Stikine River to the Klondike is the best after all. The Canadian Pacific Railway sent up north its Yukon agent, Mr. H. B. Carter, to specially look into the matter of the routes and the customs question. Mr. Carter went in via Skagway, made the White Pass in a day on horseback; returned to Skagway the following day, and went on to Dyea and Sheep Camp; then he came back to Vancouver via Wrangel.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is quite true, but those in the rush to Wrangel cannot get up the Stikine.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They drove 54 miles yesterday.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What attracted my eye was "5,000 people at Wrangel."

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Yes, they were there.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It appears now Dyea and Skagway are impassable—they cannot get across. This article proceeds:

Mr. Carter states that Inspector Strickland was well established on the Summit. The Canadian flag is flying on the Summit, and there was twenty-two members of the mounted police there to help the Klondikers and keep order. As to the trails, he stated that Skagway Pass is breaking up, and men are leaving there to go to Wrangel and up the Stikine. As far as Dyea is concerned, the Klondikers are stuck at Sheep Camp.

Major Walsh is still at Lake Bennett. Over five thousand people are at Wrangel. Mr. Carter states that the much advertised wagon road at Skagway is a myth, while the electric tramway is not in operation at Dyea yet, nor likely to be for some time.

Washington, 21st March.—Information has been received by the War Department that the rowdy element of Alaska have seized Bennett's road, leading to and over the White Pass, and have placed the country in a state of terror. Instructions were telegraphed yesterday to General Merriam, commanding the Department of Columbia at Vancouver Barracks, to order the infantry garrisoned at Skagway to take proper steps for the protection of persons and property in the disturbed region, regardless of the expense attending such a movement of troops.

Conception, Chili, 22nd March.—The Canadian Pacific Railway steamer "Athenasian" passed here Saturday for Vancouver, to ply in Wrangel route to Klondike goldfields.

Hon. gentlemen will remember that those routes which are now so glibly talked about, Dyea and Skagway, were unheard of six months ago. I think it was only in the month of August that Dyea and Skagway were first heard of. Gentlemen talk about them as if they were well known routes and the only feasible way of getting into that country. Supposing the government had come down and proposed that we should build a railway connecting with one through the United States territory, what would senators have said? I say through the United States territory because the Americans have got possession of it. Twenty odd years ago we endeavoured to have the line of demarkation between the two sections of the country marked out. They made promises to take some action but have done nothing from that time to this to settle the boundary: they never would come to an agreement. We cannot take that great country by the throat. We cannot take possession of lands that they are already in possession of the United States. It would lead, of course, to a hostile attitude which would be very unfortunate. Hon. gentlemen who read the newspapers know that from time to time we are threatened by Congress that a measure will be adopted to do away with the bonding system. The great railways, the Northern Pacific and the Great Northern, that feel the competition of our lines have strong influence at Washington and are constantly bringing it to bear, which makes it exceedingly unpleasant in dealing with the United States, so that we could not afford to come down here with a measure for reaching the Yukon through United States territory. We should have been condemened most certainly, and would have deserved to be. We would have preferred the Edmonton route if time was not pressing. The 1,600 miles from Edmonton made it impossible to consider.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—One thousand three hundred and forty-two miles as put down by Mr. Ogilvie.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—One thousand six hundred is the distance, I think.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is only 1,000 miles to the Pelly River.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Some time in September last we sent through a detachment of police, with two surveyors and a body of men, in order to test the Edmonton route.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—They were not surveyors; they were graduates of the Kingston Military College, receiving a dollar a day and going there as policemen.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I beg my hon. friend's pardon. I know who the young men are, and their capacity. They were educated at the Military College at Kingston as engineers and were sent out because they were able to take observations. The young men wanted to go to the Yukon, and they were not paid surveyors' wages. The troops left Edmonton on the 15th September.

Hon Mr. LOUGHEED—Will my hon. friend risk his reputation upon these young men being surveyors? I tell him positively they are not; they are simply graduates of the Kingston Military College. They have gone in the capacity of policemen, receiving the same pay as policemen, a dollar a day.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Every graduate of the college is trained in surveying.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am sorry my hon. friend has formed such a low estimate of the qualifications of the graduates of that college.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend will place me in a false position by saying that I am expressing any estimate of the qualifications of the graduates of Kingston Military College. They are prepared there for military purposes. They do not graduate as engineers; they do not graduate as surveyors.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, they do.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No one knows that better than the hon. leader of the House.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Every military man educated in the college of Woolwich, or Sandhurst, is made thoroughly familiar with the principles of engineering and surveying, to be qualified for his duties.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I suppose my hon. friend is referring to Kingston Military College?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Before the expedition left, I myself recommended one of the young men. I had inquired whether the two young men who went with that expedition were capable of taking observations, and was assured that they were capable, having passed through the college at Kingston. However, that is splitting hairs. The main point is that that expedition left on the 5th of September and we do not know where it is. A few days ago I saw a statement by a miner, who had come out that way, made to a Montreal paper, in which he said that he would not wish his worst enemy to be caught in that country. They had to kill their horses. They had been subjected to all sorts of difficulties. I do not wish to decry the Edmonton route——

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—You are doing it as fast as you can.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You have forced me to make this statement. I do not take any stock in all the statements that are made, but, at all events, it is not the easy-going route that some hon. gentlemen would paint it. There is the fact that a detachment left here in September last, and they were not heard of, except that in December they had gone some four or five hundred miles, but nothing has been heard since then. Will any hon. gentleman name a feasible route other than the Stikine that is within British territory?

An hon. MEMBER—Port Simpson.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is a part of the route that we have selected. At Observatory Inlet—which I thought was about 200 miles but an hon. gentleman speaking this afternoon said it was 300 miles further south——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is not so much.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That I think was an extreme opinion. Would not it have been folly and madness if this government had commenced to build a road at Observatory Inlet, which would have taken them at least two years to reach the Stikine River, when they can go up the Stikine River, where navigation is open in the month of May? In two or three days it is a comparatively easy matter to get over the trail through to Teslin Lake. The United States authorities have not questioned our right to navigate the Stikine. Some hon. gentlemen are constantly interjecting statements that we are dependent upon the United States at Fort Wrangel for transhipment. I deny it. I am quite aware that the United States Senate passed a bill that contained a clause, known as number 13, in which they dictated certain terms upon which we were to be allowed to use Fort Wrangel. But the good sense of the House of Representatives has not permitted the bill to pass, and if it did pass, it would be contrary to the treaty which exists between the two countries. We know very well that both of those bodies very often act on influences that, for the moment, affect them, but in their better judgment, they do not carry out those preposals.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—What has become of that bill?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know what has become of it.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Has the United States government ever refused parties entering by the Lynn Canal to cross its territory?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What they did was this. They allowed us to go through by employing one of their officials at six dollars per day and three dollars a day for his expenses. That amounted in many instances to more than the duty—in some cases to sixty or seventy dollars. They did not accommodate by allowing an agent to take large parties, but insisted on each person going being accompanied by a man at a cost of nine dollars a day. In the first place, they insisted upon our entering at Juneau, and it was at our instance that they made Dyea a port of entry. Before that time Dyea had not been heard of, but still the arrangement was subject, of course, to the embarrassment of our having to pay a United States official this very large sum in order to see that a Canadian crossing the United States fringe of land went through into Canadian territory. Of course it was often cheaper to pay at once the United States duty than to submit to this large charge.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Was not the duty repaid at the boundry?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, not at that time.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is now?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Suppose a railway was built from the head of the Lynn Canal, would not that disappear? Would not the United States give us facilities for entering the country?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They might or they might not—that is the difficulty. If we could have got the bonding system on any basis that would be reliable I would at once have hailed it as a satisfactory settlement of the difficulty. The easiest and simplest way to get into that country is to go as far north as possible and cross the U. S. Territory. The Pacific Ocean is open all the year round, and the best way to reach the Yukon country is to go to the highest possible point by sea and get access to the country, and that is the route which would be best in the interest of both countries. If the United States government would come to some permanent arrangement with us, that would be the common sense way to do; but if hon. gentlemen will look back on the history of this section of country they will realize the difficulties we have had from time to time in dealing with the United States. It is not so long ago since we had difficulties in the North-west, and wanted the United States government to allow us to pass our troops through their canal at Sault St. Marie, they refused—they would not permit us. Should we be placed in that humilitating position again, where the bonding system is not subject to a treaty that was going to last for a very considerable period, and where it is likely to be broken up at any time by the caprice of Congress? It would be altogether too insecure, and this House would be the first to condemn us if we spent the money of this country in building a railway through United States territory without having some positive permanent arrangement. Besides, has not the Jubilee year developed that happy sentiment that Canada should be independent of the United States, that we ought to be at least self-reliant enough, when we want railways, to build them through our own territory? We had the opp rtunity there. This link between Stikine and Teslin Lake was a mere link in the line of route. If it had answered for a few years, it would have been unnecessary perhaps to build the line further south. If that country proves what we hope it will prove, it will, of course, be the policy of the government to extend the railway down to an ocean port and British Columbia. This was the condition of things when the Minister of the Interior went out to the coast to meet Mr. Ogilvie on his way down, taking with him Mr. Jennings—he either went before or followed Mr. Sifton—to make a report on the Stikine and Teslin Lake route. Mr. Jennings went there when it was impossible to take any topographical view of the country; it was covered with snow and ice, and he made a very cursory examination of it. He obtained information as to the character of the river, and satisfied himself that navigation with shallow boats was feasible. Mr. Jennings made his report only in the month of January. In the meantime, several influential parties made propositions to the government for the construction of this railway. The first one was made by Mr. Kersey. He offered to build a wagon road and railway. The wagon road was to get $1,000 a mile and the railway $6,000 a mile subsidy on condition that British Columbia assisted. There were some further details—a block of 1,500 acres was to be given him, but the principal point was that a land and money subsidy was expected from British Columbia. Mr. Kersey did not withdraw his proposition until some time in January, when, finding that the government asked him to up put a quarter of a million dollars security, he asked for time to consult with his principals in London. On consulting with them they declined to accept, the whole transaction was too hurried and they would not entertain it. Mr. Kersey was given an extension of time to enable him to hear from his principals and this was his letter withdrawing his offer before the contract was entered into with Mackenzie & Mann:

OTTAWA, 23rd January, 1898.

SIR,—With reference to the offer which I made to you on behalf of my syndicate in early December, and to the conversation which I had the pleasure of having with you on Friday last, in relation to the construction of a wagon road and railway from Glenora to Teslin Lake, I have to advise you, after consultation with London, that we deem it inadvisable to make a further offer to the government, which would, of necessity, involve the guaranteed completion of the line by the 1st of September next, and which offer would have to be based on a land grant, unaccompanied by any cash subsidy.

I have to thank you for so kindly postponing action to enable me to communicate with my friends in England, and have the honour to remain,

Your obedient servant,

(Sgd.) H. MAITLAND KERSEY.

The Honourable
Clifford Sifton,
Minister of the Interior.

The next proposition came from Mr. Allison, who professed to be acting also for a syndicate. However, he declined to build a railway at all from the Stikine, but said his company would build from Skagway or Dyea to a point on Lake Bennett. His proposal was that they were to have a right to charge toll for the use of the wagon road:

That your petitioners should have the right to charge such toll for the use of said wagon road and upon a schedule of tolls as they may hereafter decide.

That your petitioners ask for no assistance or subsidy for the building of said wagon road, but as fast as the said company constructs its railway from the boundary of the North-west Territories along the border of Teslin Lake and up the Hootalinqua River, it shall be entitled to obtain patents of alternate sections of twenty-four miles square of the unconceded lands belonging to the government for each ten miles of road constructed along the valley of the Pelly River, with all the mining and mineral rights and timber thereupon, until the full and final completion of the road to Selkirk; in other words, as the construction of the road from the boundary between British Columbia and the North-west Territories up to Fort Selkirk progresses, the allotment of alternate sections shall be earned along the valley of the Pelly River, the construction of each ten miles of completed railroad entitling the company to alternate sections of twenty-four miles square.

Mr. Allison's proposition was this: he wanted a subsidy of a block of land 24 miles square; that would mean a subsidy per mile of 36,864 acres, that was 11,000 acres per mile more than the Mackenzie & Mann contract calls for, but it was a route that the government would not approve of if everything else had been satisfactory. Then we have heard, and it has been stated here openly, that Hamilton Smith made a proposition. I deny that emphatically. Hamilton Smith made no proposition whatever, directly or indirectly, until after the contract had been let to Mackenzie & Mann.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—He did not have a chance.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He did have a chance. He was here some time in the month of December, I do not recollect the date. He stated that he had, through a friend, communicated with Mr. Sifton. He was afterwards asked who that friend was, and he gave the name of his friend as Sir William Van Horne. Sir William Van Horne was asked whether the statement made by Mr. Hamilton Smith was true, and he emphatically denied it. Mr. Sifton also denied it. Surely if this matter was of sufficient consequence, a matter involving the expenditure of millions, it should be put in writing and submitted to some member of the government. He says, "I made an offer through a friend," but that does not authorize that friend to make a statement. Sir William Van Horne was most positive in his denial when asked whether the statement was true. I need not read the correspondence. I suppose hon. gentlemen have all seen it. It has been all printed and published. I believe the facts were that Sir William met Mr. Smith and travelled with him in his car; they had some conversation, but Mr. Smith did not authorize him, according to Sir William Van Horne's statement, to make any proposal in reference to this matter. I submit that in so important a matter, involving millions, if there was any seriousness about it he would put his offer in writing, or take the trouble to go and see the minister. Sir William's letter reads:

DEAR SIR WILFRID,—In reply to your inquiry of this day I beg to say that I have never communicated to Mr. Smith nor anybody else any proposition from Mr. Hamilton Smith pointing towards the building of a railway to the Yukon district, nor had I any authority from him to make any such proposition.

W. C. VAN HORNE.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The minister admits Sir William told him something about Mr. Hamilton Smith.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No. Mr. Hamilton Smith is a gentleman well known. He might have said "will probably call upon you" or something of that kind, but no reference was made to the contract. Mr. Smith did not call and Mr. Sifton did not see him. There is the pith of the whole thing.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Why did not the government publish to the world that they wanted to build the road?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Who were the contractors that knew anything about this country? There were not as many men as you could count on your fingers who could make a proposal to build the road? The only men were those who had been up there, Kersey and Allison. They were the only men who were capable of making an offer, the only men who knew something about the country. Put yourselves in the place of the government at that time. They knew nothing about this country. No survey or exploration had ever been made. They had only the vaguest information contained in reports.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I do not want him to put half the case and leave the other half. Did not Mr. Hamilton Smith write to the Prime Minister of this country on the 16th February, 1898, about this matter?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That was after the contract was executed. I suppose lots of people would write now; I have no doubt they would.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I think they will have a chance. I hope so.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—On the 16th February Mr. Smith writes concerning the Stikine route and advises the route from Pyramid Harbour. I dare say, in a commercial sense, if we owned that route it would be the best, because it enables one to reach the Pacific Ocean further north, but under the conditions I have just described, and affected as we would be by the bonding system, it would be impossible to consider it. At all events, it was after the government had entered into the Mackenzie & Mann contract. The Government entered into that contract because they believed the firm were good contractors, and they believed it was in the interests of the people of this country to have the road built. We regard it as worth a great deal that access should be given to that country at any rate inside of the year. There were rumours of a famine a short time ago, and there was a certainty that it would be absolutely impossible to get food up the Yukon River for the people in that region. The boats only make two trips a year, and only carry small cargoes—and the Yukon is a river with drifting sandbars, and very few pilots know the route. With all those facts staring us in the face, we felt it was our duty, if we wanted to encourage people to go into that country, to open up a route by which at least for two months of the year 1898, ready access could be had to that country What will be the consequence if the Senate throws out this bill? There will be 50,000 people, who intended to go into that country, that cannot go there; I do not care what route they take they cannot get there. It is a matter of physical impossibility. In view of the absence of food, it is found necessary to stipulate that no one should be permitted to go in there unless he carried a certain quantity of provisions, namely, a ton, but how is he to carry it? He cannot bring a man to help with it all the way, because that man would have to take his ton too, and there is no way of getting it in—no possibility of it.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Are you going to do it by this tramway?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Thousands of people are rushing from Japan, Australia and from various parts of Europe into that country. Will twenty per cent of those people get through to Dawson City? No, they will not. Dyea and Skagway, are both broken down. The rush is now by the Stikine—that condemned route. That is their only recourse now, because the contractors have had a very large force of men on there. It stated that there are thousands of men along the line, men living in tents on the Stikine River, hoping the contractors will open this road through to the Teslin Lake. Now if all those people are going to be stopped, what will be the effect? It will affect very largely the industry and commerce and prosperity of Canada for 1898.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—Will there be a road built there?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Certainly Mackenzie & Mann have a large force, 1,500 men in there now.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—Who is going to pay for the wagon road?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The contractors are going to pay for a sleigh, and they pay a pretty large price for it with labour up to $6 a day. You do not suppose it is going to be upon the basis of the calculation by Mr. Jennings of the cost in Ontario or Quebec.

An hon. MEMBER—Who is going to pay the contractors?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They are going to take their chances.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Is the government gambling away the interests of the people of this country?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We are not gambling away the interests of the people of this country. The rocks and gold are not valuable to the people of the country unless they are separated. The rocks have no value and 99 per cent of that country is absolutely valueless. I venture to say there is not one-half of one per cent of that whole area that is valuable, and the contractors are taking a very great risk. They know it.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Have the government any official information that this sleigh road has been commenced?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask how recently they received it?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I saw a telegram to-day.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The contractors have gone on in good faith, under the belief that the people of Canada, through their representatives, would recognize and appreciate the importance of having a quick communication to that country. It is not a matter of a million or two millions or three millions. The set back we will get, if this project is not carried out, will be much more serious than two or three million dollars. Do hon. gentlemen doubt that fact? Do they not recognize that if the boom bursts now, because of the inability of the people of Canada to cope with what might be called a difficulty, it will recoil upon the people of Canada, and will not every business man in Canada, from one end to the other, regret the action taken by this House? Hon. gentlemen are very solicitous for the miners in that country. Who are the miners? Ninety per cent and more of the miners in that country are foreigners. These are the men we are asked to be so solicitous about. Who are getting the benefit of the gold in that country? If gold is obtained and put in the pockets of the miners, the larger portion of it goes out of this country. Hon. gentlemen know that very well. Will one per cent of the five millions of people in Canada get any direct value out of the Yukon? I say, unhesitatingly, no; not one per cent of the people of Canada will get any benefit whatever directly out of the Yukon district, simply because the people who go there from Canada are a very small fraction of all that are going in. In the next place, they are but an infinitesimal fraction of the whole of the people of Canada. But is not Canada to-day getting the benefit of the Yukon discovery? Is there a town or city in Canada that is not realizing some benefit from it to-day? Is there a woollen mill in Canada, from one end to the other, that is not working day and night to meet the demand? Are not the Canadian factories working overtime? Are not the importations swelling far beyond what they have ever been before?

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Surely you do not want credit for that?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Why are these large importations being made? It is under the belief that there is to be a large immigration into Canada, that the people will want goods suitable for their purposes.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The gold is there.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It has been there thousands of years, but the gold has been of no value to the people of this country in years gone by. The hon. gentleman may say what he likes, the gold is valueless, until it is taken out of the ground. And whether it is taken out by Mackenzie & Mann, or by the gentlemen who so ably addressed the committee of the Senate, makes very little difference so far as the general interest is concerned. In one case the foreign miner will take all the gold he can out of the country; he does not propose to remain there, he means to get out of it as soon as he can, as soon as he has accumulated his pile. I will just call attention to a few facts here which will sustain what I am saying, that every industry—industries that are not aware of it—is to-day receiving the benefit of this boom, owing to the Yukon discoveries. In various localities new industries are being developed. Here is an industry that will be a most valuable one in future—putting up dried vegetables and fruits, an industry in which we are able to compete with the world, an industry which will live long after the Yukon boom has been forgotten, long after all the gold has been taken out. That industry has been created simply because there was a demand for it. Dried foods are necessary, as are other special foods, for people in the Yukon. All those industries referred to have not only been generated, but old industries have been stimulated by the boom. Now, I take it, the importations for the month of February are important. February is generally a very poor month—certainly it is not one of our best months; yet our imports last February were over $10,000,000. In the corresponding month of 1897, which we thought was fairly good, the importation was only $7,710,000. Hon. gentlemen will see the extraordinary rise in that one month. Is not that an indication that there are people importing to meet the occasion? Take up all the other returns, and they point to the degree of prosperty the country is going through owing to this discovery, and the indications are just as plain and clear as the trade report which I have just read. Do hon. gentlemen not know that the transportation companies are all burdened with carrying passengers and freight; that their ordinary trains are divided into two, three, sometimes four sections? They are not able to carry all their passengers in a single train—all rushing to that country, all buying largely of supplies. I saw the other day that the Indians in the country behind Quebec had been kept busy night and day making moccasins and snowshoes. I also saw that at Peterborough an order had been given for three or four hundred canoes. Now I ask you to think how trade has been stimulated by the probable boom, and some hon. gentlemen want simply to snuff that out.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—All that wonderful impetus in trade is quite true, but it has taken place without the Stikine route at all, and if that Stikine route had never been heard of that would have gone on just the same.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The trade has not got there. There are more than 10,000 people at Dyea, Skagway and Wrangel.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There are 12,000.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—How are they to get on? This road will render starvation next winter impossible; sleigh roads will be kept open during the winter. Do you mean to say that communication between Teslin Lake and Telegraph Creek will stop simply because snow and ice would impede the way? Not at all. When people once get in there the passes are over; several companies will be prepared to put on teams of one kind or other. Now, in doing as we did, we acted as any government would do. It was idle to talk about waiting for parliament. Parliament has the right to condemn this bill if it sees fit, if it believes that it is not one conceived in the interests of the country. If you think it is not going to be in the interests of the country, your better judgment will lead you to throw it out, and that is what you ought to do. I do not at all approve of the remarks outside that have been passed on this Senate. It was very improper for the Grit papers to criticise, as they have been doing and it is injurious to the interests of the Grit party. This House is made up of a body of men who have good sound judgment, and when acting apart from influences political, I have no doubt that their judgment will guide them in the direction their conscience prompts them; but I did feel it was a little unfortunate that it should go abroad, as announced, that the bill was to be thrown out. I did think it not very good taste that the correspondent of a San Francisco paper should be brought within the Senate in order that he might denounce the Stikine route and that he might boom a route through United States territory that helps San Francisco and is an advantage to United States transportation. We know very well that there is very great rivalry between San Francisco and Victoria, between Portland and Vancouver and other Pacific points. This gentleman was sent last year to the Yukon to represent a newspaper. He reports for, I understand, two papers, the New York Journal, and the Examiner of San Francisco. There happened to be a miner here yesterday, who, I see, has addressed a letter to the Senate which hon. gentlemen have probably seen. The writer of that letter, Mr. Slavin, is pretty well known. He was a miner in Australia and New Zealand and other parts of the world, and he was appointed a delegate at this same meeting when Mr. Livernash was appointed. He felt it was impossible for him to be at Ottawa at the proper time and declined to act. He tells us that the object of the meeting was to have a change in the regulations, that the government had as he thought, unwisely reduced the length of the miners' claims to 100 feet, which had formerly been 500 feet, and in the opinion of the miners the regulations should be so changed that the claim of 500 feet should be continued. They also represented that the royalty was enormous. Some hon. gentleman has said there was a royalty of one per cent in Alaska. I was under the impression there was not; there was none in California. The highest royalty I have heard of on this continent was two per cent; I think that is the royalty in Nova Scotia and has been the royalty elsewhere. What prompted us to put on the royalty was the fact that there were, in certain districts—Bonanza Creek for instance and on special tributaries—placers where men were said to have picked up $50,000 or $100,000 in a season; and it did seem to us that if a man who, without artificial appliances—simply a pick and spade and sluice-box—could gather in from $50,000 to $100,000 in a few months, if the people of the country got ten per cent of that, it was only reasonable and fair, and the miner was getting very large results for his labour. The circumstances were unusual. Of course, in all these cases the realization of royalties is very uncertain. We may not be able to collect the royalties to the full extent, but we hope to collect considerable. Mr. Slavin says no mention of the proposed railway was made at the meeting where the delegates were appointed. In his letter he says :

> The question of transportation was not discussed and no authority was given any one to make representations to the government in reference to transportation.
>
> I may say, however, without any qualification, that the miners are deeply interested in easier access to the Yukon district by rail, and that they will hail with delight any method by which communication can be opened during the present year, and I do not believe that any serious objection would be urged by the miners to the land subsidy proposed to be given to Mackenzie, Mann & Co.
>
> That the establishment of early communication with the Yukon district is a most important matter in the opinion of the miners in the district, and in my judgment the necessity for the railway would, in the opinion of the miners, fully justify the proposed subsidy to the coutractors. A railway is immediately wanted at any price.
>
> I know Mr. Livernash. He came to Dawson as the representative of the San Francisco Examiner and of the New York Journal, and it was urged as a reason against his selection as a representative delegate that being an American citizen and representing American interests he would be disposed to take an American view on any subject where there was a conflict of interest.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Who is Slavin ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He is a miner.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—And a United States citizen.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The name would indicate that he was from across the ocean. Slavin I think is an Irish name.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—When Mr. Livernash addressed the meeting Mr. Slavin was in the room and had not the courage to open his mouth, and then in this sneaking way he addresses a letter to the Senate.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is a highly unjustifiable and improper statement for the hon. gentleman to make. Mr. Slavin came in with a member of the House and sat at the table, and there was no sneaking about it. I do not wonder that Mr. Slavin, a modest man, did not venture to speak there, because members of the House could hardly get a hearing when they differed from the correspondent of the New York Journal.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Slavin said nothing there, but he sneaks in here behind the backs of the other people with this paper that has been read.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think it was highly improper for that man to go there and oppose the measure.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He says :

> I know Mr. Livernash. He came to Dawson as the representative of the San Francisco Examiner and the New York Journal, and it was urged as a reason against his selection as a representative delegate that, being an American citizen and representing American interests, he would be disposed to take an American view on any object where there was a conflict of interest.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understood the hon. gentleman to say that he came here as the representative of the San Francisco Examiner.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I said he went to Dawson City as a representative of the San Francisco Examiner.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—I was at the meeting which Mr. Livernash addressed, and the gentlemen were asked, I think it was by the hon. member from Halifax, for their credentials. They gave credentials that satisfied us that they represented the people in the Klondike, while Mr. Slavin did not appear to be the representative of anybody but himself.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Mr. Slavin mentioned that he was named as a representative but declined to act.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—The others were Canadians.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They were asked to come to Ottawa to make representations on the question of royalty and the size of the claims. Beyond that they had no power. Now, I will say a few words in reference to the question of the subsidy. Ground has been taken that the subsidy is too large ; in fact it is said that it is a blanket on the whole country, that if this contract goes into effect, mining interests are practically destroyed in this country. I deny that absolutely and emphatically. The percentage that those contractors will take is not more than five per cent of the whole country, and how the remaining 95 per cent can be absolutely annihilated and the miners' interest destroyed, is, of course, a problem that I leave to the hon. gentleman who made the statement to answer. There was, of course, and there always is in those cases, a good deal of difficulty where a land subsidy is given in a country like that. In an agricultural country, it does not apply, but in a country like the Klondike region, there would be a difficulty, naturally, in arranging with the contractors as to how the lands were to be taken. The final arrangement was that blocks of land 24 miles in length by 6 miles wide should be located, where the contractors indicated, provided the land was open to location. They had to take in that series, 46,080 acres. There are only eighty-two blocks of that kind in a series to give them the quantity; they have no alternative. If they found, for instance, a good quartz mine, the line would have to run 24 miles in one direction or another, and in order to get that one good acre, if there was only one good acre, they would have to take 46,000 acres of what might be valueless land.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—We hope they are all good acres.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is too much to expect. Any of us who saw the views at Mr. Ogilvie's lecture will recognize the vast proportion of barren rock. At all events, that is the position of it. Mr. Livernash says that this arrangement gives them a blanket to cover all the mining interests in that country. Now, as a fact, where claims are taken up in what are called gulches or dry river beds, the gold is found within a limit in width of about 300 feet. They would have to take six miles on each side of the centre line in order to get that 300 feet. The general impression is that the value is in the centre of the gulch. If it is a good location, then there is a reserve to the people of this country of at least one-half of the land within that series—that is, the Crown reserves 46,000 acres, and the contractors get 46,000 acres out of the series. That 46,000 reserved to the Crown is open to ordinary miners. They have the advantage of the prospecting done by the contractors, and that would be a very great advantage. It has been announced that they are going to take all the wood on this series. They can do nothing of the kind. They have no right to enter upon the even sections. They get the odd sections on 82 of these series, and the 82 would give them the land grant. To give one an idea of the vast extent of that country, and how futile it is to talk about this land grant absorbing any considerable area, taking it longitudinally, the distance covered in length by this series, including the government reserve and the contractors claim, would be 2,000 miles. Will hon. gentlemen believe that if they take one river alone, the Stewart River, which is said to be one of the very best rivers in that country, they could get the whole claim in that river and its tributaries. Reading from the Klondike official guide of Mr. Ogilvie, I find at page 88 the following description of the Stewart River:

> Stewart River itself is a stream from 100 to 200 yards in width, and it is said about 400 miles in length. Its affluents will aggregate as much more, say 800 miles or in round numbers say 1,000 miles. The smaller streams and gulches will aggregate possibly as much more, say 2,000. Now the Stewart River enjoys the reputation among the old hands in the district of being the best paying dirt in the country. When it was first mined on, many miners took from $30 to $100 a day out of the bars along the river, by ordinary rockers, and since that time prospectors never failed to find what is called a grub stake that is, sufficient to purchase provisions, clothing and other necessaries for one year, on its bars. They are cleaned off from year to year and the wash of the river seems to renew the deposit of gold. Now this gold must come from somewhere, and prospecting never yet revealed from where.

I merely quote that to show hon. gentlemen how little importance can be attached to statements made by gentlemen like Mr. Livernash, who says that giving the subsidy to the contractors will practically annihilate the interests of the free miners. As far as the interests of Canada are concerned, it matters very little who works the mines in that country. For all but a few of our people the advantages will be purely indirect, in the stimulus given to trade. One would like, of course, if more Canadians would go into that country, if there are large benefits to be derived from it, but the chances are that by Mackenzie & Mann going in there, Canada will get a larger proportion out of the areas reserved than if it fell into the hands of ordinary miners, because ninety per cent of those in there now, and likely to go into that country in the future, will be aliens. If the same proportion continues, and we adopt no alien labour law, as we are not likely to do, the people of Canada will have to look to the indirect benefits.

Hon. Sir. MACKENZIE BOWELL—How will that affect the percentage, whether they are foreigners or British subjects?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The percentage is a very uncertain thing. The subject gave us a very great deal of consideration, and we came to the conclusion that the best way for this country to realize anything was by reserving alternate blocks. If it were shown that gold was found on either side of a river, it was pretty good indication that gold would be in the reserved blocks, and those blocks would be put to auction and it is believed that the country would largely benefit by the sale. That principle has been followed most closely in the arrangement with the contractors. I have seen it stated that there was a clever device that the government would not see through, by which if the lines were run at angles on the stream it would enable the contractors to take up the whole bed of the stream. You do not suppose that the Minister of Interior and the government are children to be taken in in that way. The whole principle of this bill is that we are to have alternate blocks. We consider we will be largely benefited by the alternate blocks falling into the hands of the contractors, who, for their own interests, will prospect them and put money into them for their development. A large proportion of them will require considerable capital to work them. I hope in the future it will be found that the quartz mining in that remote country will attract a large amount of capital.

We have not yet decided that we will charge a royalty. It may not be good policy to do so, for royalties have not been charged in quartz mining elsewhere. In California, if I correctly recollect the history of that country, there were no royalties charged, and the benefit California got out of the gold boom was the large amount of money that was spent in the country in taking out the gold. Of course, California had advantages that the Yukon has not. It was a good country to settle in. It was capable of sustaining life, the land was rich and a good fruit country. We know the Yukon district is only good for minerals. No man who goes there proposes to remain any longer than he can accumulate his pile. But it may be that some of these quartz mines will prove just as valuable as the Comstock lode from which Fair and McKay and their colleagues got so many million dollars. Now the State got no particular benefit from them except the expenditure of these men while they were there, and the same results will flow from the development of the mines in British Columbia. I do not propose to go further than to express the hope that hon. gentlemen will give this matter a business consideration—as was so very graphically and fairly set forth by my hon. friend the member from Toronto this afternoon, it is a matter of business with the people of Canada. If you think that it is not in the interests of the people of this country that facilities should be given to get into the Yukon district this year, why of course you will throw out this bill, but I can assure you the effect will be that there will be from 40,000 to 50,000 people that will not be able to get in, and if they did get in, there would be no way of supporting them next winter, because it is simply impossible—and I challenge any hon. gentleman to contradict it—to get food into that country for a very considerable body of men. We know the transportation companies did all they could last year to get food in to the Yukon. We know it has been the problem during this winter to get food in there for the few people that were there, the mounted police and others. Major Walsh had to relieve people from starvation, and the consequence was that, although he had a large quantity of food, he was obliged to buy more, not to meet his own wants, but the wants of people who had rashly gone in, thinking they would find food in the country. It seems impossible to comprehend that there should be want of food in that country, but there is the fact, and it rests entirely with this House to say what is to be done. My hon. friend beside me observes what is to become of the forty or fifty million dollars worth of goods that are lying in stock to sell? If they are not sold it will bring on a collapse, bring on a crisis in Canada which would be extremely unfortunate. Hon. gentlemen cannot point out any alternative that the government could adopt if the bill is thrown out. They are absolutely powerless.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—I can point out about the food supply.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Unless they get down on their marrowbones to the United States and beg some concession from them, they can do nothing; but that has been tried before, and would not work and we must have some respect for the honour and dignity of this country. We have more than once endeavoured to obtain concessions from the United States. I was turning up correspondence the other day where 20 years ago we were endeavouring to induce the United States government to get this boundary settled. All they would consent to do was to make a provisional boundary on the Stikine River. In the Sessional Papers of 1878 you will find the whole correspondence and you will find, what is very gratifying indeed, that the United States asked the Government of Canada to name a custom-house on the Stikine River, on the east side of the boundary, at which their vessels could report, and that nobody called in question the right of either country to the free navigation of the river. It was only when we attempted to bring a prisoner down, and he escaped into U. S. Territory adjoining the river, that they said we only had the use of the river for commercial purposes and not for the purpose of recovering a criminal. They were building a fire and cooking a meal when the prisoner made his escape, and the United States people held that the treaty restricted us and we could not recover the prisoner. With those observations I leave the bill in the hands of the House hoping they will give it the best consideration.

Hon. Mr. DE BOUCHERVILLE—Supposing the wagon road is built from Glenora to Teslin Lake——

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They are building it now.

Hon. Mr. DE BOUCHERVILLE—It is to be built very soon?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, on the assumption that this bill is going through.

Hon. Mr. DE BOUCHERVILLE—Supposing we have the wagon road, what difference would there be in the time of the conveyance of goods from Glenora to Teslin Lake, between the wagon road and the railway?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is a sleigh road built now, for the purpose of aiding the contractors in the construction of the railway and assisting persons to come in, not what you call a road in our acceptance of the term, not a road on which you would drive at the rate of six or eight miles an hour. It is cut through an impervious country that consists of rock and ice and moss, and has other difficulties in the way.

Hon. Mr. DE BOUCHERVILLE—The difference between a wagon road and a railway would not be more than five or six days. With a good wagon road there should not be more difference than that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Do you suppose a wagon road would carry five or six thousand tons? Utterly impossible, it will break it down.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is not a wagon road; it is a road for the winter season.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—As this appears to be a very important question, I do not feel justified in allowing the vote to be taken without making a few observations and giving some reasons for the vote I propose to cast on this question. I realize, hon. gentlemen, the gravity of this House undertaking to defeat a government measure, and it being a government measure makes it, in my mind, important. If it were not a government measure, I should not consider it of very great importance at all. I feel that, if I had any doubt at all of the advisability of passing this bill, I should give the government the benefit of that doubt, and should vote for the bill. But I have given it all the study that I can, and, after thinking the matter over carefully, have come to the conclusion that there is not one redeeming feature in the whole measure.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—And I will be able to justify the course I am taking to the country. We find this bill is for the purpose of confirming a contract that has been made with Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann. This contract was made on the 25th January, 1898, for the building of 150 miles of a tramway.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The contract says a railway.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—You may call it what you like, but I think it is oftener called a tramway.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, a tramway is a street railway.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—This is to be a railway three feet wide between the rails. Down in the little province from which I come—a province about one-third the size of the land grant given to this company—we have a railway of a wider gauge than this, I would not call a railway three feet wide anything but a tramway, but I would call it a trapway, because I think it will be a trap for a great many people when it is built, if it is ever built. I think if they were going to build a railway at all into that district, and if the country is as rich as it is represented to be by the government, they should have contracted for an ordinary four feet eight and a half inches of a railway. If we have the traffic in that direction after this tramway is built, which has been represented by the members of the government, I take it that that little railway would not be able to overtake one-fourth of the traffic that is to pass over it. If there are 250,000 people going in there with their supplies, and all the machinery necessary to carry on mining operations, a three-foot gauge railway cannot possibly begin to carry the supplies and traffic over that road. This contract was entered into on the 25th January last. Now, I would like to know—and it is a mystery to me—why this contract was not entered into at an earlier date. I know we have been told that they had not sufficient information, but I take exception to that statement, and I think I can prove that they had a good deal of information and a very high opinion of that country as early as May last. They had this matter under consideration in the government, and they issued an advertisement to the world in the shape of mining regulations, and such regulations I do not think will be found in any other country in the world.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There were regulations affecting that country years ago. They are not new.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I am speaking of the regulations made on the 21st of May, 1897.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—These particular features of them are new.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They are the regulations in force for years, which they have been changed from time to time.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I am speaking of the regulations made by this government, by the hon. gentleman himself, on the 21st May last, giving to the country the impression that was on the minds of the government of the value of that country. And what were these regulations? Among other things, an entry fee was charged of $15 for a free miner, and an annual fee of $100 for each of the following years. The free miner goes into that country. He goes over that country, up and down perhaps for weeks, months or years, at his own expense, and it is said it costs a man $2,500 a year to live in that country.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He would not be paying the rental if he had not a claim.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I am aware of that. If the hon. gentleman will allow me to make my own speech, I will give him a little attention before I sit down, perhaps. I say they exacted from the free miners in the first place $15 for an entry fee. Before he makes the entry, he goes through that country, spending a great deal of time and a great deal of money, in finding a claim. He finds one. Then he has to pay $15 for his entry for the first year, and after that he pays $100 a year, if he continues to work that claim. Not only that, but he has to pay 10 per cent of a royalty on all the gold he gets, over a certain amount, to the government. Now when any number of men, would sit down and make such regulations as these in reference to the mining industry of any country, they must have come to the conclusion first, before they passed such regulations as these, that it was an immensely rich country, to justify such regulations as that being passed. That is their advertisement to the world. What action do they take then after that to give access to that country? Not a single thing is done until 25th January last. They did not move hand or foot, except while junketting through the country at the country's expense, neglecting the affairs of the government, when they should have been looking after the matter, and giving people of the outlying parts access to that country and giving people that were in there a chance of getting in their supplies. They did nothing till the 25th January, nine days previous to the meeting of this parliament. What was the reason that that contract was entered into just at that time, just before the House met? It is a very important matter to be decided in such a hasty way. We were told that parliament was to have met very early in January this year. It was known there was a great deal of work to be done, and it was stated in the press supporting the hon. gentleman, that parliament would meet in January, not later than the 19th. Parliament was postponed to a later day, and in the meantime this contract was entered into, which was a most objectionable matter. Hon. gentleman will remember that they found fault with their predecessors for acting just in this way on just such an important question as this. They should have avoided it if possible. If they could have put off entering into the contract until the 25th January till parliament met and submitted the question to parliament, it would have been much better.

Then this contract was given to Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann in a secret and private way. There was no necessity for that, so far as I can see. They said time was precious and urgency was their justification for making this contract in this quite—I was going to say clandestine—way. Surely if there was not time to advertise for tenders, there was time at least for them to put a notice in the papers, and let it be known that tenders would be received or offers considered. A good deal has been said about the position of Hamilton Smith, and perhaps the less the government say about that the better for the honour of themselves and of Canada. But they had an intimation given to them, and they do not and cannot deny it, that Mr. Hamilton Smith was prepared to enter into negotiations for the building of that road.

Hon. Mr. POWER—They do deny it.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—They were given to understand that he was prepared to do that by Sir William Van Horne.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, certainly not.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Certainly Mr. Sifton admits it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, he does nothing of the kind.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes, he does.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What a myth.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I will read what Mr. Sifton said :

> I said that an hon. gentleman, who, I now say, was Sir William Van Horne, being in my office one morning, said to me that there was a gentleman named Hamilton Smith who was prepared to call upon me for the purpose of discussing the question of a railway to the Yukon.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Did he call?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That is not what the hon. gentleman said.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I did not say that he called. But the government had the intimation that there was a man of the name of Hamilton Smith who was prepared to enter into negotiations with the government for the building of that railway. What did they do? Did they intimate to Mr. Hamilton Smith that they were prepared to have an interview with him, that they would ask him to call and negotiate a matter of this kind? Nothing of the kind. They entered into a secret bargain with Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, and Hamilton Smith knew nothing about it, and I think the intimation was given to Mr. Hamilton Smith that the government was not prepared just now to enter into negotiations with any one. The reason why we are asked to pass this bill is urgency. We are told first it is for the purpose of maintaining law and order; in the second place, to prevent starvation; in the third place, to secure the trade of that country for the Canadian people. As to the urgency, there is no reason in the world for it. From what I have already stated and what I have already read of the regulations that were passed on the 21st May, urgency is out of the question, because if that was really any excuse whatever, they should have entered into negotiations for the building of that railway months before. Why leave it to the middle of winter to build a railway in that frozen country? It would be contrary to common sense.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We had not the information.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Here was the advertisement on the 21st May that it was the richest country in the world.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Because you will not find such regulations as this in any mining country. Miners are compelled to pay $15 of entry fee and $100 a year afterwards, and in addition to that to pay 10 per cent of their earning to the government for the privilege of taking the gold out of the frozen sand. So the question of urgency should have been considered months and months before the contract was made. And they were not satisfied with having 10 per cent of the royalty, but if the miners got more than $500 a week—and I suppose they took it for granted that all the miners would get more than that—they were to get 20 per cent of a royalty, and this is the evidence of the opinion the gentleman had of that country. They had that opinion on the 21st May last, and yet they did not move hand or foot about the giving of the contract until the 25th January last.

Hon. Mr SCOTT—Those regulations were never enforced. We never got a penny out of that.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—So much the worse, because the government published these regulations to the world. They were an advertisement, and have been the means of bringing people into that country. As far as the second point is concerned, to prevent starvation, if starvation takes place in that district it is owing to the bungling of the present government in reference to this matter, and to no other cause as I heard Mr. Oliver say in making a speech in the House of Commons the other day. He said these people who have gone in there have common sense, and if they find, after they go there, that there is not food to be had, they will do the same as they did in the first place. They happened to go in there and they will then happen to come out and look for something to eat, if they cannot get it any other way. I ought to speak first as to the maintenance of law and order. I do not know that there is a very great deal of danger of trouble arising out in that country. I take it that most of these people who have gone into that country are men of some means, who have made some sacrifices to get there, because I take it no person has gone there without spending $500 to $1,000. They have gone there for the purpose of making money, digging for gold, and they will be as anxious to have law and order maintained as the government is, or as any other civilized people would be. We have not heard of any trouble existing in the country up to the present time. The government on the 21st May gave this advertisement to the world about the richness of that country, telling the people of the world that there was an immense amount of gold to be found there, and they never sent any of the mounted police or any officers into that country until when? Until the middle of winter this year. If the government can send in Major Walsh and his company into that country to maintain peace, law and order in the middle of the winter, surely they will be able to do it after the winter has passed away and summer comes. So I do not think the argument holds good at all that it is necessary to have a railway to send the military forces in there to keep law and order.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—They are sending whisky in there now.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Who is responsible for that? It appears to me that whatever trouble may come—I do not anticipate there will be any—in reference to the Stikine River running through United States territory, the safest thing for Canada to do is to be independent of the United States altogether. I am decidedly in favour, if there is to be a railway built into that country at all, that it should go in directly from Edmonton. Of course, it would cost a good deal more money and take a longer time to build it, but if the bottom falls out of the Yukon gold district in a year or two, that route will be valuable for all time to come by opening up our great western country for agricultural purposes, which is the backbone and mainstay of the country. In my opinion that is the only proper route for a permanent way to get into that country. If Wrangel, which is situated at the entrance of the Stikine River, is a United States port, then the Stikine River must be recognized as being under the control of the United States, and if that is the case, all the merchandise and shipping going up that river will be subject to the navigation laws, the quarantine laws and the customs laws of the United States, and we may find our people harassed and injured to a very great extent. The building of this railway in there looks unreasonable. The Stikine is a very dangerous river, so far as I can learn, it is unsafe for navigation in summer and impassable in winter even with sleighs. By having the railway built from Edmonton into that country, we known the principal part of the supplies for the Yukon will be food, and the food supply, if taken from our own country, must be produced somewhere this side of the Rocky Mountains. If we send our food supply to British Columbia to a shipping port in Vancouver, it will be subject to railway freights and will have to compete then with food supplies from Washington and Oregon. If we provide a route for the people on the Pacific coast, they will have the same advantages as our own people going in there.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—British Columbia does not want the trade.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—British Columbia cannot grow sufficient supplies to feed her own people.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And she does not want this trade?

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Yes, she will want the trade. A good deal of the supplies, mercantile supplies, miners' supplies, and clothing would go from Vancover, Victoria, in by Calgary and Edmonton as well as from Montreal and Toronto.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—From Montreal to Vancouver and back again?

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—They need not come back again. All the distance they would have to come back would be as far as Calgary and then go up by Edmonton. Another feature of this wonderful contract is the monopoly of between four and five millions of acres of the very best mining lands in that country. Not only that, but this company is getting this quantity of land for building a tramway, land of the very best mining sections in the whole of that country, and they are getting it by paying a royalty of only one per cent to the government where the free miner has to pay a royalty of ten per cent. It will have this effect, in my opinion. If I was going in there as a free miner, I would naturally seek for a good mining claim, and after making a search, perhaps taking me weeks, or months, or years before finding a location, what would I do? Would I go to the government and take out a permit to mine that and subject myself to a ten per cent royalty? No, I would do nothing of the kind. I would go to Mackenzie & Mann and say, "I have found a splendid mining district; I have found any amount of gold there. If you will give me a fair show I will tell you where it is and you can make a claim for it." They would give me, in consequence, something better than a government claim with a ten per cent royalty. They are only paying one per cent. Supposing they were to say, "We will let you have that claim for two per cent, or you can have it free," Mackenzie & Mann would scoop it all up and the free miner would have a claim on better terms than the government would offer. The effect will be that the free miners will work in Mackenzie & Mann's interest every one of them, and will sell to Mackenzie & Mann, and the government will get nothing, because the miners can get better terms from the contractors than they can from the department. It is not in the interest of any eastern man to advocate the paying of a large amount of money for the building of roads in that far distant country, but I do say this, rather than have such a gambling transaction as this, it would be far better, in the public interest, to pay these contractors a fair sum for building the road and keep the mining districts there for our own people. It is my intention to vote against this contract. There are a great many supporters of the government, and I dare say some members of the government themselves, would be glad to see this bill thrown out by the Senate. I am satisfied the country will be pleased with our action, and it will relieve the government of the responsibility of this foolish contract that they have entered into, and enable them to enter into another arrangement by which access can be more easily obtained into that country.

Some Hon. MEMBERS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I beg of you not to cheer. Have some respect for the feelings of the members of the government. We know the rebuke the House received when the hon. gentleman from Richmond was applauded.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (43) "An Act respecting the Board of Trade of the City of Toronto."—(Hon. Mr. Cox.)

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Thursday, March 24th, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'Clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

DISMISSAL OF ALFRED E. LENOIR, FISHERY OVERSEER.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. MILLER moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, all correspondence between the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and any person or persons whatsoever, and also, all reports and Orders in Council relating to the dismissal of Alfred E. Lenoir, lately one of the fishery overseers, for the county of Richmond, in the Island of Cape Breton.

He said: I assume there will be no objection to the papers being brought down. I will reserve what remarks I have to make in reference to the subject till they are on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS FROM COMMISSIONER WALSH.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON — Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to again call the attention of the hon. members of the government to the fact that a week ago, on my motion, it was agreed that an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate copies of all letters and reports received by the government, or any department thereof, from Commissioner Walsh on his way to the Yukon district, or since his arrival there. This motion was carried a week ago. I made reference to it yesterday, and we have not yet got the correspondence. I think that we are entitled to it. Parliament has not been fairly treated by the government in regard to the instructions that were given to Major Walsh when he went to the Yukon district as administrator. Since then, while this debate has been going on, we have asked for copies of these reports, and we have not got the official reports made by Major Walsh to the government since his arrival there, or while on his way to that country. Yesterday the hon. Secretary of State read newspaper clippings, inspired very likely, by the agents of transportation companies that had an interest in different routes, with regard to what was occurring just now at Wrangel and Dyea and Skagway and these places. In addition to that, over a week ago Commissioner Walsh gave some interviews to the newspapers, and those statements have been going over the country. Since this is the case, and the government give the House the interviews which appeared in the press as information, clippings from newspapers and press telegrams, which may be altogether the work of interested parties, we should have the reports of their own officer, who is very near the places that are now in our mind in connection with the bill before the House.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend must know that there have been a great many reports moved for, both in the House of Commons and here, and they have been referred by my hon. friend the Secretary of State to the proper department. I understand they are engaged in the preparation of these returns and the report to which my hon. friend refers will no doubt be taken up in its order and at as early a period as possible. I am quite sure that my hon. friend does not suppose that the Department of the Interior has any object in withholding the information which he has sought. I am not aware even if there are any reports of a very recent date from Major Walsh in the department, but if there are, certainly the hon. gentleman will get them at just as early a date as copies can be prepared and brought down to the House.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I would be sorry to think that there is any object or motive in keeping them back, but I submit to the House, in view of the fact that we are discussing this bill and likely soon to come to a vote upon it, that we should have this information that is so germane to the subject, not by and by, but now.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am quite sure that if there is any information the hon. Minister of Justice or myself would have known about it; certainly neither of us has any knowledge of any report from Major Walsh. If there was anything at all important, the Minister of the Interior would have no doubt brought it to council and communicated it to us.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN THE GOVERNMENT AND MACKENZIE & MANN.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Have the papers been brought down which I asked for relating to the correspondence which took place between the government and Mackenzie & Mann anterior to the contract?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think I told my hon. friend, as far as I knew, there was no correspondence. The communications were verbal.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. gentleman did not give me that assurance. He expressed some doubt, but promised to make inquiries, and my hon. friend says now there is no correspondence.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—So far as I know there is not.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will write a note over to the Minister of the Interior and ask if there was. I suppose it would be with him. There is none certainly in my department of any official kind, or of any kind whatever.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then I understand the Secretary of State to inform the House that there have been no reports from Major Walsh who assumes the responsibility of governing that great Yukon district. Is it possible that he is so absolute in the position which the government have made for him that he ignores the government at Ottawa altogether, that he has made no report; not even informed the government of his whereabouts, what he is doing, and what are the great dangers of starvation, of which we have heard so much and often in the country. I can readily understand that, after reading the Order in Council appointing him to the position which he now holds. The government has given him absolute control of the mounted police, and power over every one else in that country; but I cannot conceive it possible that the government would permit any official to remain as long as he has been in that position without reporting what he is doing, and stating what the circumstances are that necessitate his remaining in the place where he is. When last we heard of him he was returning back to civilization and had reached Wrangel, and was on his way to Victoria or back to Ottawa. The public will learn with a very great deal of surprise that a government existing in Ottawa permits an official in the important position that Mr. Walsh now holds, to remain there without ever reporting to them as to what he is doing.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. member from Prince Edward Island asked for any reports recently received. I do not know whether any have been received or not. It is quite likely that from time to time as an opportunity offered—the hon. gentleman knows the mails are not regular in that country, perhaps once in two months or so—that he has communicated by telegrams or written letters to the Minister of the Interior. I have not seen or heard of any.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My inquiry was not for reports or letters received recently, but for anything sent by him since his arrival there.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will inquire of Mr. Sifton.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is another fact which has come to light during this discussion, that is, that hon. gentlemen opposite are governing, not as a responsible body, but each individual minister is carrying on the government of the country, so far as his own department is concerned, without consultation with his colleagues.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is strange, if true, that reports which have been received from that official have not come to the knowledge of the hon. Secretary of State, through whom communications pass or of the Minister of Justice, one of the most important members of government, particularly in connection with a gentleman who was sent there to administer justice. Does Mr. Sifton rule and control the whole of the North-west Territories without the knowledge of the other members of the cabinet? That is the only inference we can draw from the position assumed by the hon. Secretary of State.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend has expressed sentiments that are surprising to me. He was a member of the government for number of years, and during that period he ought to have acquired some familiarity with the principles of responsible government.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—A little.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend knows right well that the law has divided the administrative functions of this country into different branches, and assigned each branch to a minister of the Crown. When a minister of the Crown is appointed, by his letters patent, he assumes the administrative duties of his office. They are not discharged by the Governor in Council, but by the minister in his department, and unless some question of policy arises associated with that department, the minister does not always bring the matter before council. I remember two or three years ago, when I was in the other House, being told that the Department of the Privy Council had been largely increased in its staff because there were so many more matters brought to council then than previously, and when inquiry was made, found that the ministers were afraid to trust themselves, were afraid to assume the responsibility of discharging the duties assigned to them, and they came to council to get the authority of the council for the work that properly belonged to them personally. I believe the ministers of the present administration are capable of administering the duties entrusted to them, and so they do not find it necessary to spend time in council in discussing matters belonging to each individual minister but devote themselves to directing the general policy of the administration with respect to all the important matters of the government.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman is to a certain extent correct, but, as we are living and governing this country under the principle of responsible government, it was the policy of the members of the late government to let their colleagues know of all matters of importance transacted in each of their departments, so that when a question was asked either in the Senate or in the House of Commons, any one representing the government could give an answer to any question asked by a member of either House. Unfortunately, the position taken by the hon. gentleman is this, that each minister governs according to his own good will, and when a question is asked nobody knows anything about it. We have had here in this House one minister answering a question one way, and another answering another way. The same thing has been done in the lower House, so that really you are governing the country by individual ministers and not collectively.

THE YUKON RAILWAY BILL.

The Order of the Day being read,—

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the second reading (Bill 6) "An act to confirm an agreement between Her Majesty and William Mackenzie and Donald D. Mann, and to incorporate the Canadian Yukon Railway Company;" and the motion in amendment of the Hon. Mr. Macdonald (B.C.), that the said bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON said: The subject that is before the Senate at the present moment is what might be called one of our western questions. It affects that great country which has been opened up in the last twenty-five years west of the great lakes, and as a representative from that western country I cannot allow this debate to close without expressing my views and giving the House the benefit of my experience after some years' residence in that western country. I must, first, take exception to a remark made yesterday by the hon. Secretary of State when, in consequence of the applause that the speech of my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Miller) elicited, he said he was under the impression that the defeat of this bill was premeditated on the part of the members of this Senate. So far as I am personally concerned, I must take exception to that. For several years I have occupied an independent position, although a Conservative bred and born, and a Liberal-Conservative still. I thought it necessary to take an independent stand from the party to which I belonged for so many years, because I wished to have a free hand in criticizing what I thought was wrong in that party. I saw, as year after year went by, acts and measures that were not sound in regard to the best principles of legislation. I saw an hon. minister dethroned after thirty or forty years' service in consequence of a dealing in contracts; I saw commissioners appointed to investigate expenditures in connection with the Baie des Chaleurs Railway; I heard rumours of practices that should be denounced by every right thinking man who was interested in the credit and good government of this country, and I heard that machine politics was the cause of it in both of the great political parties, a name, I think, applied by the Liberal party when in opposition. Even to-day we see a committee sitting to ascertain whether there was any corrupt transaction in connection with the Drummond County Railway deal; we learn that $20,000 passed hands, according to the evidence taken before the committee of the other House, the day the contract was signed by the government that was not available before that contract was signed. When I see those things, I feel it is necessary, from my independent standpoint, if I think there is anything objectionable in the contract before us, to take exception to it on the same grounds. I have no better authority than the leaders of the present government who denounced in the most vigorous terms when in opposition anything approaching the character of the present legislation they have now brought down. I can say this further, so far as my knowledge of the Senate is concerned, that there is nothing whatever premeditated in the vote about to take place. My hon. friend from Toronto (Sir Frank Smith) yesterday took the same independent stand that I am taking; he wished to express himself on this question, not as a party man, but according to what he believed to be the interests of this country. We are taking an independent position probably from two different standpoints, in so far as I am opposed to the contract, while he thinks it will result beneficially to the country. However, my hon. friend (Sir Frank Smith) in the stand that he took has justified my action for some time past. That act alone is quite sufficient to show that the defeat of this measure is not premeditated from a party standpoint, but that every member of this Senate is viewing it according as he thinks it is good for the country or bad for the country. Hon. gentlemen the Senate has a perfect right to adopt a general policy in regard to legislation, and to change as the people change, they may lead public opinion or they may follow it without in any sense depriving the people of the power they exercise through their representatives. Now, if the Liberal party has failed to recognize a change in public opinion in regard to legislation through monopolies, the Senate has, and to protect the people from their rapid growth is part of the duty the Senate has to perform to-day. Now, hon. gentlemen, we have seen a great deal about this House in the press. The press has taken a great interest in the Senate. In fact I do not know when the press has taken such an interest in the Senate since I have had the honour of being a member of it. To show how far some portions of the press have gone in endeavouring to influence this honourable body in the decision they may arrive at in regard to the contract that is now before us, I have here an extract from a paper called the Toronto Star, which the Citizen says is the organ of Mr. Mackenzie, one of the contractors. The Star says:

> There is talk here of a revolution to be made in the Senate. It is pretty well understood that not a few members of the Upper Chamber have been sitting for years without the proper qualification which the British North America Act requires of them. In fact, it is asserted that there are those in the Senate who have no business to be there, and some of these are the most bitter and noisy members who are opposed to the administration. There are always men in every assembly who would think nothing of ruining the country if they could but damage their political opponents in doing so. They are ready to scuttle the ship, and take the risk of going to the bottom if they can drown their fellow-passengers. There are many who now declare that the government does not deserve support if it continues to have within the Senate walls persons who are without that qualification which the letter of the law requires.

That is the substance of an article from a paper which is said to be controlled by one of the contractors.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—They are coaxing us now are they not?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Then, again, we have another short article in the Evening Telegram of the city of Toronto, a paper that is not controlled by the contractors, but, I believe, is controlled by the people. It says:

> If the Canadian Senate passes the Yukon deal that aged and venerable body should be transported to the Yukon and settled upon the agricultural lands, which according to the Globe, the government has so wisely decided to reserve out of the grant to the contractors.

It is quite evident to me that between the two, in trying to avoid Scylla we have a chance of being wrecked on Charybdis. If I am one of the noisy members the article refers to, coming from that western country, I do not come down here with a superabundance of wealth, but I have a wife and seven children on our western prairies and I consider them worth a thousand dollars apiece to the country. In fact, I might say the wife is worth the Yukon contract, and therefore I do not consider that I come under the category of disqualification. At the same time, I have been pioneering so long in that country that I have no desire to commence pioneering it over again on the agricultural lands of the Klondike. I find that the fertile land of the province of Manitoba is quite enough Klondike for me, if the hands of monopoly are only kept off it. To the extent that monopoly holds it down, to that extent are we robbed of the products of honest industry and the progress and prosperity of the country is retarded. I can tell the editor of the Toronto Star if he had put in eighteen years' service in the development of a new country for Canada, he would not be so ready to make wealth superior to practical experience in the councils of the nation in dealing with a subject such as we have before us. This abuse of the Senate has been going on for years. Unfortunately, there is a portion of the press of the country that is controlled by monopolistic influences, and if there is one thing a monopoly hates, it is a body which cannot be controlled by them. I believe that this honourable House is in that position, and has wisely been put in that position by the authors of confederation, when they constituted the parliament of this country. There were two ways in which the upper house of this parliament could be constituted; one by making the Senate an elective body, the other, by making it an independent body, imitating as closely as possible that great constitution that has been handed down as a heritage to this country through centuries of time, which has been fought for and won step by step by the heroism and independence of our forefathers in the old country. I say they acted wisely when they imitated as closely as possible the British constitution as it has prevailed in the United Kingdom, anational constitution that is always up to date. There is not a nation that calls itself civilized which governs without the use of a second or co-ordinate body, in the United States the bicameral system has been retained, not only in Congress but in every state of the union. That bicameral system in the United States descended by heritage from the British constitution. When Oliver Cromwell destroyed the parliament two centuries ago and was called upon to reconstitute it, he constituted an upper house. Although he had fought and destroyed the previous parliament yet he found it was necessary to reconstitute it for the good government of the country, and when he did so, as dictator of that country, he created an upper house, because he said if the government was allowed to exist without the restrictive power of an independent upper house, the government might so manage its affairs as to keep itself perpetually in power, and by means of improper influences, exercise the franchise of the people to govern tyrannically, just as much as any of the tyrannical monarchs of ancient times. No better tribute to the advantage of having an independent upper house than that could be cited, the act of a man who fought against the abuses of the age. Those who emigrated to the United States immediately after that revolution came out assisted and aided by the chartered companies of those days, the Massachusetts Company and all the companies who settled the districts in which their commercial interests were located, in the same way as the Hudson's Bay Company was located in our western country. These chartered companies by the British parliament were numerous in the early settlement of this continent. The first thing that the people did, as soon as they got sufficient numbers, was to claim a representation. First the burghers were convened to advise the governor and officers of the company, and they ultimately became the Senate, afterwards the people were accorded representation and they became the house of representatives. In that way the two houses with the republican form of government were created, the people clinging to these chartered rights that were accorded to them by the British parliament, and upon that model was handed down the same form of government in the formation of Congress. The senators of the United States draw their power from the state legislatures which elect them, and the representatives in the lower house from the people, who elect them, and therefore they have two parties competing with one another drawing their power from the same source and claiming the same rights to exercise that power. Their constitution is a relic of the past and has not kept pace with the freedom of the British constitution. It is not so with us. The House of Commons has complete control over the method of taxation of the people, and with that taxation we have nothing whatever to do. The budget, which creates that taxation, is brought to us, and we have no power to change it. We can reject it as a whole, or we can pass it as a whole, but we have no power to amend it. That is the difference in the form of this Senate and its operation, and the formation of the Senate in the neighbouring republic, and I think as time goes by and ages pass over, it will be found that the British constitution, as it is formulated in Canada, will be found to be the best example to follow upon this continent. The day may come when the people of the United States will return for their model to the British constitution, which is the liberty-loving constitution which we can live under with perfect freedom and security. The charge is made that we are appointed here, and therefore, not the representatives of the people, that the people have given their mandate to the Liberal party to govern this country, and whatever the Liberal party say in the House of Commons, this Senate should endorse. The Minister of the Interior resides in that western country. He is not an old man by any means. In fact, I do not think he was born when I first went to that country. However, his claim is that he is the best judge of what that western country requires, and that I, as a senator, and my brother senators who come from that western country, have no right to express an opinion adverse to his if he chooses to pass a law or put a contract before the country in the lower house. Hon. gentlemen I entirely take issue with this. I do not think either his experience, or his knowledge of the country, or his knowledge of the peculiar circumstances under which we are called upon to debate this measure, justifies the position that he assumes. The hon. Minister of the Interior was not elected on this issue, or upon the conception of an enterprise of this kind at all. He did not obtain a seat in this cabinet upon that issue, nor upon any measure such as we are now discussing. He obtained the position as Minister of the Interior on an entirely different state of affairs.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—What was it?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It was on the school question. He first of all took away privileges and rights from a certain portion of our population that they had enjoyed for twenty years, and then, after having succeeded in doing that, and having raised a great muss, then he gave them back again and entered into the cabinet of this country as a reward for having given them back. I do not consider that that is good politics. He may think otherwise. I call it bad statesmanship, but at any rate it is not a justification for him to lay the claim that upon a great measure of this kind, or in fact on the question of the development and government of that western country, he is to be constituted sole arbiter simply because he has dropped into a responsible position as the minister of the Crown who has to deal with our western affairs and by means of the party whip and an appeal to party interests, claim that the solid majority behind this contract is voicing the honest opinion of the people or even of his party. I contend that any member of this Senate who comes here to give his opinion and to take part in the government of this country is more able to give an unprejudiced view, to take a juster position on such a question as this, than that hon. minister who entered into this contract with the two contractors. One of the things that we have to consider when we discuss this question is, what reasons are there why we should take a view adverse to the great majority that passed this measure in the House of Commons? One of the reasons that I certainly think would justify us is the haste with which this contract has been put before this country. Public opinion had no opportunity to express itself, because after all, the members of the House of Commons are merely the representatives of the people. When the Liberal party came into power, a question of this kind was never dreamt of, and the knowledge that there was that inherent wealth in that great western country was not known, and nothing was known about this contract until some five or six days before the meeting of parliament. On the 27th January, I think, the contract was signed and given to the public. Now we have a great country stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The representatives of parliament were on their way to meet here after that contract was signed and made public. They have had no opportunity to ascertain from their friends whether it is a proper measure, whether it is a wise or popular measure, and the very fact that this contract has been so hastily entered into, apparently with the view of committing the government to a measure of this kind without time for deliberation, or feeling the public pulse in regard to its wisdom, is of itself quite sufficient reason to justify the Senate in throwing the bill back upon the government, in order that the government may initiate a new measure or take the sense of the country and ask the people if this is a wise measure. That of itself is quite sufficient justification for the Senate to adopt the motion that the hon. member for Victoria has put before the House, to give this bill the six months' hoist, and pass it over until it is brought before this House again at another session of parliament. That is the only thing that the Senate does by adopting it. The Senate does not say "we are here to withstand the will of the people." We are not here to upset the principles of constitutional government, but we are here for the purpose of throwing back upon the government a measure which the people are not thoroughly acquainted with and have not had time to digest, a measure of this kind that proposes to put that great north-western country into the hands of a monopoly and to take possession of such an enormous grant as is proposed to be given under this contract for such a doubtful work as 150 miles of railway which will be frozen in for seven months of the year. I say that is quite sufficient to justify us in taking time to deliberate upon it, and in the meantime to throw the question back upon the lower house. This contract has been entered into with two contractors named Mackenzie and Mann. They are well known in the country. I have not the pleasure of Mr. Mackenzie's acquaintance, but I know Mr. Mann. I know him to be a first-class contractor and railroad man, and I have seen him at his work. So far as being able to build the road is concerned, he can do it thoroughly well, and in an upright, honest, square manner. I have nothing whatever to say against Mr. Mann in that respect. But it is one thing to ask a man to construct a building or a railway for you and quite another thing to put practically the governing power of a great western region into the hands of a monopoly under a contract with these two gentlemen with a multiplicity of favours to distribute, and the great power of financing given to them under this contract. Now, Mr. Mackenzie is a man whose ambition seems to be stirred up to a very great extent, and it is well for us to know what kind of a man he is and on what lines he moves. We know that from his connection with the Toronto Street Railway Company. We know that he was the purchaser of that street railway and of the London Street Railway; we know also that he is largely interested in the Montreal Street Railway. We will just take the Toronto Street Railway as an example to see on what lines he works. That street railway belonged first of all to my hon. friend from Toronto (Sir Frank Smith) and it represented the work of his life. The hon. gentleman worked his way up and made his money by honest, careful judgment. He turned his attention to giving a good street railway to the people of Toronto under the horse system some years ago. I attribute the sympathy which he expressed yesterday partly to the fact that Mr. Mackenzie became his successor in the ownership of that street railway. He sold out his interest to the city of Toronto and the city of Toronto sold out their interest to Mr. Mackenzie for $1,600,000. Since then, the street railway has been increased in length by about eight miles and has been put entirely under the electric system. Mr. Mackenzie paid the city $1,600,000 for the railway, and bonded the road for $3,000,000 ; that is to say, he issued securities, giving a mortgage on the road to the extent of $3,000,000. Then, after that, he found that the road was profitable.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I beg leave to rise to a question of order. What concern has this House in Mr. Mackenzie's connection with the Toronto Street Railway or any other undertaking except the one to which this bill relates? I do not think it is any business of ours what Mr. Mackenzie has done in those matters, and the time of the House should not be taken up in discussing them.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Some of us know nothing of these matters and some hon. gentlemen appear to know too much about them. If these contractors have managed the electric railway of Toronto well, perhaps they might manage this proposed land grant well. We ought to know all we can, not only about this contract, but about the persons who hold it, whether they are proper persons to possess such a franchise.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—My hon. friend (Mr. Boulton) made an assertion with respect to a paragraph which he said appeared in a paper controlled by Mr. Mackenzie. I happen to know Mr. Mackenzie very well. I very much disagree with Mr. Mackenzie on several matters, particularly in connection with the Toronto Street Railway, but I do not believe that Mr. Mackenzie would be guilty of anything of the kind attributed to him—of putting such a paragraph as the one referred to in a paper. Mr. Mackenzie is not here to answer allegations made against him, and these assertions are unfair and unjust.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—The point of order is not well taken in this case. Mackenzie & Mann have made a contract with the government and I take it that it was perfectly competent for the government to inquire into the character and capabilities of the men with whom they were dealing. We know they did that, or made a pretense of doing it, with reference to Hamilton Smith, and now, when a question comes before the Senate in connection with the contractors, I think the hon. gentleman from Shell River is quite in order in letting us know who these gentlemen are and what position they occupy. He is doing it in a proper way.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I think the point of order is well taken. I have listened with a great deal of patience to this debate throughout and I find that it has been carried on by insinuation and slander.

Some Hon. MEMBERS—Order, order.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I hold——

Some Hon. MEMBERS—Order, order; withdraw, withdraw.

Hon. Mr. Dever—I will not withdraw.

Hon. Mr. POWER—With respect to the question of order, I think the hon. gentleman from York (Mr. Allan) is perfectly right. The hon. gentleman from Shell River (Mr. Boulton) has not undertaken to question the capacity and ability of the contractors. He stated that himself. The history of the past private life of one of the contractors is not in issue in this House at all, and the Senate is very much degenerating and will degenerate still further if the consideration of a great question like this is to be made the occasion for bringing on a discussion on matters of this kind.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The people of this country are dealing with these contractors. I do not think the hon. gentleman from Shell River said anything at all malicious about these people.

Hon. Mr. POWER—He said they were good contractors ; that is the point.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—We should know who they are. How do we know but this bill may pass the Senate? If we knew the character of these men it might influence the votes of members in their favour. I have nothing to say against Mr. Mackenzie or Mr. Mann—I know nothing about them, but I want to know something about them so as to decide how I should vote. The references which the hon. gentleman from Shell River has made to these contractors are perfectly germane to the question.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I rise to explain myself in this way. So far as the newspaper clipping is concerned, I did not say that it was Mr. Mackenzie's, I said that the Ottawa Citizen, from which I clipped it, represented it as being taken from the organ of Mr. Mackenzie. The Toronto street railway, as I have said, is owned by Mr. Mackenzie. Now, this contract before the House gives Mackenzie & Mann a right to go on the market and raise a large amount, possibly as much as forty or fifty millions of dollars, and the power given in the contract is the power to tax the people. What I am endeavouring to show is the methods by which Mr. Mackenzie attained his purpose, so far as the Toronto Street Railway is concerned. I am saying nothing except what I have read in the newspapers, and if I had read an article detailing exactly what I am saying, I am sure no one would have objected to my doing so. This is not a private question. It is what has been published in the newspapers.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I suggest, as one who is inclined to share the hon. gentleman's views, that it would be better to refrain from dealing with the personality of the contractors. I think the House desires to treat this question solely upon its merits or demerits; and I therefore, as a member of this chamber, and one that will be called upon to vote on this contract, should like to have the hon. gentleman deal with this matter as far as possible on the merits of the contract. I would suggest that the hon. gentleman should drop that part of this discussion on which he was entering and deal solely with the contract.

The SPEAKER—If the hon. gentleman is satisfied not to go on, I need not give my ruling. If my ruling is asked for, I must give it. I am in the hands of the House.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I cannot see that I have said anything out of the way. I have to make the best case I can. How can I influence hon. gentlemen's minds that there is something wrong with this contract, if I cannot cite a case to illustrate Mr. Mackenzie's mode of managing a railway?

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—I have been here for a good many years now—42 years attending the sessions of parliament, and I must say that I never knew an hon. gentleman to be called to order in this manner before. It has always been customary, and I believe it is in accordance with the rules of the House to speak of the subject before the chair. Now what is the subject before the chair? It is Mackenzie & Mann and the government of the country. Surely you have to look into details and see if Mackenzie & Mann have anything against them which should prevent us giving our confidence to them and ratifying that contract.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I ask the hon. Speaker for his ruling.

The SPEAKER—It is well known that in the Senate, for a great many years, great latitude has been allowed in discussions, and hon. gentlemen are well aware that on many occasions discussions have ranged a good deal beyond the subject before the House. As I understand, when the hon. gentleman from Shell River (Mr. Boulton) was giving to the House the different stages through which the street railway of Toronto had passed, and the interest Mr. Mackenzie had in that railway, the hon. member for York (Mr. Allan) remarked that the House had nothing to do with the Toronto Street Railway, and the interest Mr. Mackenzie had in that company. In my opinion, the point of order raised by the hon. member from York at this part of the discussion is right. The House has nothing to do with the Toronto Street Railway and the interest Mr. Mackenzie has in that company. I hope the hon. gentleman from Shell River will see himself that the Senate desires the discussion to be limited to matters and arguments germane to the subject now before the House. The hon. gentleman may state any objection he may have against Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann as contractors, but the details and history of the Toronto Street Railway may be strictly objected to as not being germane to the present discussion.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I do not want to make any comment on the decision of the Speaker, but I wish to state this—let the decision be recorded in the Journals of the House, as it is generally. It was not done last year, but I think we departed from the course usually followed, and I want to suggest before it is too late, that this decision, and any decision given by the Speaker, shall be recorded in the Journals of the House.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I bow to the decision of the Speaker, and will only refer to the legislation that created the powers of the street railway company. I had no desire to attack Mr. Mackenzie's character, it was the legislation. What I was trying to point out to this honourable House was the advantage that exists in having the Senate, which, on certain occasions and at certain stages of our national life, is able to check the disposition of the representatives of the people to take a certain line which would lead to disaster. I wanted to cite, as an incident, the method by which the Ontario legislature conducted a portion of its legislation in connection with the street railways of the province. The Ontario legislature gave to the Toronto Street Railway Company the power to issue $3,000,000 bonds, and after that $6,000,000 stock. Now, there was no chamber like this Senate to prevent that legislation from going through. The $6,000,000 stock and the $3,000,000 of bonds amount to $9,000,000, and represented a line of railway which was sold by the city of Toronto for $1,600,000 to the company that now forms the street railway company. Now, the $9,000,000 is the power given the company which has a monopoly of traffic to extract dividends and interest from the public in regard to that company for a value far above the cost of the road.

Hon. Mr. COX—Does the hon. gentleman mean to convey the impression that the Toronto Street Railway only cost $1,600,000—that that is all it cost in actual money?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is the inference to be drawn from the hon. gentleman's remarks.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No, I said that eight miles had been added to the track and it had been converted from a horse to an electric railway, and to the extent of those improvements the cost of the line had been increased. I do not say whether it raised the cost to $2,000,000 or $3,000,000, but we can all estimate for ourselves about what it probably added to the price paid to the city. At any rate the bill authorizing the issue of $6,000,000 stock was passed by the Ontario legislature, and it was issued, and innocent parties purchased those securities though the franchise ceases at the end of 30 years. That is to say, the legislature gave a franchise for only 30 years, and at the end of that time, the line is to be taken possession of by the city of Toronto as the value of the material on hand, which may not probably be $2,000,000; therefore, the holders of those securities were muluct of their capital and their profits to the extent of that depreciation.

Hon. Mr. COX—I think that it is entirely misleading and doing an injury to a very respectable company. The stock of that company is selling to-day at par, or about par. The bonds are selling at a premium of nine or ten per cent, and are absolutely good value for that, while the hon. gentleman is conveying the impression that those securities have been put on the market, and that a confiding public has taken them at a price far beyond their value. The markets in Toronto and Montreal fix the value of the bonds above par, and the road is earning a revenue giving good interest on that. It is unfair for the hon. gentleman to depreciate stock that is valued on the market to-day at a premium.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I am finding fault with the principle of the legislation which authorized that and that same principle is in this contract. So far as that street railway stock is concerned, holders of that stock issued it at ten cents to themselves and then sold it to the public, so that the difference between ten cents and the par value at which it is quoted to the public has gone into the pockets of a few. Legislation does that. It permits a company to use a franchise designed for the convenience and economy of the people to be used as a monopoly to enrich themselves, and to divide up five millions of capital for which there was no value given. That is going on in our western country. It is that principle of legislation against which I am arguing here to-day. That is the effect of class legislation which goes through a single chamber unchecked. I am merely pointing out how the capital of the country passes into the hands of a few people by that means. We have the very best evidence of how public opinion has been affected in Ontario by that kind of legislation. The Hon. Mr. Gibson, a man with all respect very highly, was defeated in Hamilton, because he lent himself to that class of legislation: because in the city of Hamil ton he gave a perpetual franchise to some organization which should be managed for the benefit of the people and not for the benefit of a few. He was turned out by a majority of 800 because he favoured a few at the expense of the public. The same vicious principle is in this contract, and we should oppose it to protect the interest of the people from the power of a monopoly that is growing in our midst and which will submerge the liberties of the people, and make them powerless to protect themselves in those principles of government which the British constitution is especially designed to guard. It is to accomplish that that I take an independent stand and discuss these questions in this way. In addition to what we know of Mr. Mackenzie's operations in Toronto, we know something of him out in our western country. He has the charter for the Port Arthur and Rainy River Railway, with all its franchises and assets. That is a railway which runs from Lake Superior into the interior of our country, and we have hoped, for a great many years, that it might be built and give us competition. In addition to that, one of the contractor's names in this bill controls the Lake Dauphin and Lake Manitoba Railway. That company got 6,400 acres a mile and $40,000 a year from the Dominion government and a guarantee of bonds to the amount of $8,000 a mile from the Manitoba government. They have that charter for 300 miles, which they control in the same way. There is a bill before this House to-day to ask for power, for the Lake Dauphin Railway, which Mr. Mackenzie and Mr. Mann control, to amalgamate with any other company. The object of that bill is amalgamation with the Hudson Bay Railway and get the charter from Hugh Sutherland, whose bill has been before us on several occasions. Mr. Hugh Sutherland's charter has a land grant, and it is the object of Mr. Mackenzie, no doubt, to amalgamate with that company and get possession of that franchise, after making arrangements with Mr. Sutherland, who controlled it before. That is one of the monopolies that we object to out in the west. Mackenzie & Mann, it is popularly supposed, with the Canadian Pacific Railway and Sir William Van Horne are at the back of all these deals and are co-partners with him in the interest of this company. The interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is not to build the Hudson Bay Railway. The interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway is not to extend the Manitoba and North-western Railway. The interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway is to divert the lines of railway just in such a way as will best suit them with regard to their profits, and they do not consider the interests of the people at all. If a monoply, such as this, get hold of the Port Arthur and Rainy River railroad they will not build it; they will stop it until it suits them or they bring it into line with the interests of the Canadian Pacific Railway. They do not want competition between Winnipeg and the North-west, and therefore they tie up the charter. The charter has been tied up for years and the charter of the Great North-west Central is tied up in the same way.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—They built 50 miles of that road.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, but they were tied up after that. Hon. gentlemen can see how these gentlemen, who receive power to raise money in this way, can hold the people down and we understand that they do not give two pence how far the interests of the people are served so long as they manage things to suit themselves. It is that system that I wish to explain in regard to this, because it is very intimately connected with the contract which we have to discuss. I will now go on to discuss the contract. First of all, I would draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Justice to what he stated yesterday with regard to that question of money, and that the Senate had no power to amend, that when it came to be a question of taxation the Senate should not thwart the will of the Lower House. I think that was the gist of his observations. He went on to argue that the land that they were giving under this contract and money were the same thing. I take exception to that, because these lands cannot be put into the Supply Bill. If it was a money bill and the Lower House said we were determined to push this thing through and will make it part of the Supply Bill and whatever it costs we will put it through, then the Senate would have to throw out the Supply Bill entirely, an extreme measure which would not be resorted to. They have no power to amend the Supply Bill, and if this was money they could force it through parliament in that way, but they cannot put these lands into the budget. The lands are a separate consideration and have to come before this House as a bill to assign those lands to those contractors, just the same as any other legislation that comes before us, so that to that extent the hon. Minister of Justice was not presenting it exactly as he should. Although he considered the value of the lands and the money were the same thing, still, when it came to the discussion before this House, they were not the same thing. The question of urgency has been made a very great question in regard to this contract. That was one of the strong reasons urged by the leader of the House when he presented this contract the day before yesterday for our consideration—that people from all parts of the world were flocking into that country. I do not think it is a wise thing for our government to place itself in the same position as those excitable people who are rushing into that Klondike region without mature consideration as to what will be the consequences of their going in. I do not think that we ought in any way to add to the excitement by undue haste. The urgency that is spoken of is evidence of the excitement that the government, or those who are responsible for this contract, were acting under in regard to this matter. I do not think that it is wise for us to add to this excitement, or to give any more facilities to the people who want to get into that country. Let them go into that country on their own responsibility.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And starve on their own responsibility.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—They won't starve. There is no danger of their starving. This railroad will not keep them from starving—what does Mr. Wade, one of the government officials, and Major Walsh's right hand say, what do other correspondents say. During 7 months of the year no horse, dog, reindeer or any other animal can draw into Dawson City more provisions than what is required on the trip. As this railway stops 600 miles of Dawson City I do not see how it is going to keep these people from starving this year. At any rate, the public press has given sufficient warning as to what they are going to suffer, but there is just this fact that with our existing means of communication, they cannot get in there. I do not suppose that more than 10,000 people can get into that Klondike country this year, possibly 12,000, but 12,000 is the outside number. If we build that railway, we might increase that number by 12,000 or 14,000, because they could be taken to the end of that railway with very great facility, and then left to take care of themselves the best way they could. They travel down the streams, and get into the interior of that country, but this contract does not contemplate building that road in sufficient time to bring the people out again from Dawson City. If the contract is to be completed, and the people start on the head waters of navigation, and go down 600 miles to Dawson City, and scatter themselves, they cannot take advantage of that road to get back before the river is frozen up. The government wants them to go in there, and provides no facilities for them getting out. I say the government should assume no responsibility to get them in there and aggravate the position the people are placing themselves in, by the tremendous rush that is proceeding from all quarters. We are not interested in trying to induce people to come in there for the sake of the money that may be received by the transportation companies, or anything of that kind. That is not the business of the government. Their business is to move slowly and surely in the development of our new regions. That country is not going to run away. The gold will not be got out without considerable difficulty, and a considerable amount of labour; therefore there is no danger of its going away. There is no danger, as the hon. Minister of Justice thought, of the country being taken possession of by the United States or anybody else, and our losing the control of that country. It belongs to Canada. Nothing in the world can take it from Canada, and we have to sit down, and deliberately figure out what is the best way to develop that country, and make the most of it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And do nothing.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I did not say do nothing, but I say do it in a different way. One of the strong objections that I have to the passage of this bill as a western man, is the diversion of our North-west lands for its construction. The North-west Territories are to the north of British Columbia, and all the lands in the north-west Territories are under the control of the Dominion government. I have always taken the ground that the Dominion government holds those lands in trust for the people of that western country, and for the development of the country, and they have been used in that way heretofore. The province of British Columbia owns its own lands. The government is taking the lands of the North-west Territories to build 150 miles of road in the province of British Columbia. Why does not the Dominion say to the province of British Columbia: "we will assist in constructing 150 miles of road if you will give the land subsidy necessary to make the road." That is a simple thing for them to do. The British Columbia lands are available. They are undeveloped. They want that communication, but the communication of 150 miles of road through British Columbia, if it stops there, is of no earthly benefit to us, no earthly benefit to the development of those mining regions to the north and therefore it is a benefit to the province of British Columbia. Why cannot the province of British Columbia appropriate its own lands, and leave the lands of the north-west country to develop, and connect the agricultural regions of our North-west Territories with the mining regions? I say it is an unjust action on the part of the government. It is a form of injustice that, if continued, gradually works up a spirit of antagonism, and the people begin to develop new ideas antagonistic to the ideas upon which they are governed, and therefore I say anything that may be done, in justice to the pioneers of that western country, should be considered in a case of that kind and that is the very strong objection that we raise to it from a western standpoint. I can quite understand hon. gentlemen, not having that particular idea in view until I explain it to them, but when I bring that forward I am quite satisfied you will see it is a very strong point in the position we take in opposing this contract. Another point is the question of this being an all-Canadian route. There is only one route that I consider an all-Canadian route, that is the one from Edmonton in the North-west or from Ashcroft. I will allow that that is an all-Canadian route, but this route by way of the Stikine River is not. I do not care how you argue or fix it. The treaty that gives us the right to the navigation of the Stikine only gives us that right for commercial purposes. It gives us no right for military purposes. We can claim the right of navigation of that for commerce, and if the United States act honourably they will not put any obstructions in our way to use it for that purpose, but we cannot claim from them under any treaty the right to send our mounted police or a military force or any other troops through there, and that is one of the most essential points for us. It is necessary for us to preserve law and order in that western country, and we cannot preserve that law and order without the use of our mounted police and military authorities, and if they are stopped because we have no power to force our way through United States waters, that shows that it is not an all-Canadian route in one of the most essential points. The only route that is really a Canadian route is that which goes in from Edmonton.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If this road is extended down to Portland Inlet is it not a Canadian route?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, if it runs from a port in British Columbia, but this contract does not contemplate that. This is dependent entirely upon the navigation of the Stikine and the penetration of the Stikine through United States territory. If this contract did involve the construction of another 200 miles south to a point in British Columbia, then the magnitude of the contract would be very great indeed. It would be seen we were undertaking the construction of four or five hundred miles through a difficult country that did not approach when complete nearer to Dawson City than 600 miles, and would be completely locked up seven months in the year; but we are not concerned in discussing the question of the ports of British Columbia. We are discussing the 150 miles of road, for which an appropriation of 25,000 acres a mile is being made. Now, rapid transportation is one of the features of the development of any country that is necessary for us to consider in a contract of this kind. Rapid transportation cannot be obtained by this 150 miles of road. The only continuous transportation we can obtain is via Edmonton into that western country, or by St. Michael's and the Yukon River. What I mean by continuous is that on the coast route an ocean trip intervenes and lands you at a point where you will have to provide other means, while on the land route the same difficulties do not present themselves to a man and a team who desires to penetrate those mining regions without great cost. With regard to that Edmonton route, I wish to point out that there are ocean routes which are available and always will be available for the coast trade. There is one that is open now by the Yukon River and St. Michael's. That is 5,000 miles long and is the cheapest mode of getting into that country. There is another by Pyramid Harbour and Lynn Canal which will land us on the Upper Yukon. The cost this year for transportation by St. Michael's and the Yukon River is $10 a hundred, being 10 cents a pound. That is $200 a ton for transportation from San Francisco or Vancouver to Dawson City by way of the Yukon River. That makes your bag of flour cost you $10 plus the original cost of it. The route from Edmonton will be an all-rail route when we come to construct it. I wish to inform hon. gentlemen that the Canadian Pacific Railway carries a bag of flour for us from Russell, where I live, to Montreal for fifty cents. That is 1,860 miles. Now hon. gentlemen can see the benefit of an all-rail route from Edmonton. The profits upon the carrying of that bag of flour that 1,800 miles, combined with the other traffic, enabled the Canadian Pacific Railway to earn the enormous dividends of $10,600,000 last year. So that hon. gentlemen see that there is a large profit, and the largest profits which the Canadian Pacific Railway earns are made during the months they are carrying the grain of the country. So it is profitable for a railroad to carry a bag of flour 1,600 miles for fifty cents, while the cheapest rate of transportation at the present moment, over 5,000 miles of water, is $10 for a bag of flour. That will show the great advantage it will be to the trade of this eastern country, and the transportation of this eastern country, to secure, with as little delay as possible, the construction of a road into that country. A great many people say it is going to cost too much. A railway which performs a useful purpose does not cost too much, if it maintains the expenditure upon its running every year. If it maintains the cost of operating that railroad it does not cost too much. The government are making a mistake in my opinion in adopting the principle—and I have opposed it for the last six or seven years—of subsidizing these railroads with land grants and cash subsidies, because our experience in the western countries has been that the subsidies pass into the hands of those who promote the companies, and do not contribute either to the successful operation of the road, or the lowering of the rates to the people who support them, and what I have always urged was that the government should guarantee the bonds of a railway. There is no risk in guaranteeing the bonds to the extent of ten or eleven or twelve thousand dollars per mile, taking the first mortgage bonds as security for the construction, and a railway can be promoted as rapidly as possible under a system of that kind. The Canadian government gave the Canadian Pacific Railway last year eleven thousand dollars per mile to construct the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. If they had guaranteed the bonds of the Canadian Pacific Railway they would have accomplished the same result, and it would not cost the country a penny. They gave eleven thousand dollars a mile, whereas I advocated guaranteeing the bonds for that amount. They put the bonds upon the market and sell them at par, bearing three per cent, and they are taken up by the public, and therefore the cheapest mode of developing new territory that is going to add to the trade and improve the transportation of the country, is to adopt a system of that kind. I wish now to point out one or two things in the contract which I have not heard yet stated. The first clause in the contract provides for the construction of a railway from the navigable waters of the Stikine River in British Columbia to the navigable waters of Teslin Lake and providing for the incorporation of the company. That clause in the Act gives power to the government to extend that road from 150 miles to 200 or 250 miles, and if this Act was passed the government might turn round to the contractors and say: we think that road should start 100 miles nearer the mouth of the Stikine and we have power under this Act to give you 25,000 acres per mile for the construction of that 250 miles. I do not say that under the contract made with Mackenzie & Mann they could force the government to do that, but the government would have power to do that if they chose. I will read the clause in the contract:

The contractors convenant with the government to lay out-construct, equip and fully complete a line of railway with proper terminal facilities from the navigable waters of the Stikine River in British Columbia at or near the mouth of Telegraph Creek, Glenora, or the mouth of Clearwater River, thence running northward to the navigable waters of Teslin Lake a distance of about 150 miles, more or less.

That is the contract, but there is no mention there of 150 miles. Now the clause in the Act which is the governments power to deal with the contractors reads as follows:—

And whereas subject to the approval of parliament, Her Majesty, therein represented by the Minister of Railways and Canals and the Minister of the Interior entered into a contract dated the 25th day of January, 1898, with William Mackenzie and Donald D. Mann, contractors, providing for the construction of a railway from the navigable waters of the Stikine River in British Columbia to the navigable waters of Teslin Lake and providing for the incorporation of a company with power to acquire and perform such contract and with other powers.

The government has power under the Act which the contractors have not under the contract. They are two different things. You must recollect the first part of this bill is the act which authorizes the government to deal with the matter, and the latter part is the contract between Mackenzie & Mann and the government. The government takes power, under the Act, to build that road from the navigable waters of the Stikine, wherever they may consider that river is navigable, and therefore they have the power to say "we will give you 25,000 acres of land per mile on 200 miles of road," the same as has happened in the case of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. The government had power to give $11,000 a mile on 310 miles—that was the estimate—but that Crow's Nest line has been lengthened. I see that in the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's statement it is computed to be 340 miles in length, and therefore the government is giving a $11,000 a mile on that length of road, or $330,000 more than the public supposed was to be granted. I wish to call hon. gentlemen's attention to that weakness in the bill, that we may find it is not 3,750,000 acres of land that we are giving in aid of this enterprise, but that it may be five or five and a half million acres. The next clause in the contract relates to the capital stock. Clause 11 of the contract is the contractor's warrant for 25,000 acres for every mile built:

11. In aid of the construction of said line of railway from Stikine River to Teslin Lake the government shall grant to the company for each mile of said railway twenty-five thousand acres of land to be selected as hereinafter mentioned from the Yukon Provisional District and from that part of the Northwest Territories of Canada lying west of the Mackenzie River and Liard River and north of the 60th parallel of latitude, such land to be and become vested in the contractors upon the said railway being completed and accepted as complete by the government and upon the said land being selected as hereinafter set forth.

Now we come to the question which I consider to be a monopoly. Here is the clause in the bill. Clause 19 gives the company unlimited powers to raise money on the mining properties, that is upon the best terms and conditions they are able to obtain.

19. The directors, under such authority from the shareholders as is mentioned in section 18 hereof, may from time to time issue, in addition to those mentioned in section 17 hereof, bonds, debentures, debenture stock or other securities of the company, secured by mortgage upon the lands or any parts thereof to be granted by the government pursuant to clause eleven and subsequent clauses of the said contract, and upon the company's right therein and thereto, and may sell or pledge them, at the best price and upon the best terms and conditions which they are able to obtain, in order to raise money for the purposes of the company.

Clauses 8 and 17 give the company power to raise $14,000,000 on the railway. It reads:

8. The capital stock of the company shall be ten millions of dollars divided into shares of one hundred dollars each: Provided, however, that if the directors by by-law limit the issue of securities under section seventeen hereof to a sum less than twenty-five thousand dollars per mile for the line of railway between the Stikine River and Teslin Lake, the said capital stock may by such by-law be increased by an amount not greater than the difference between twenty-five thousand per mile of the said line and the sum so limited for the said issue.

9. The directors of the company may, by by-law, create and issue any part of the capital stock as preference stock, giving it such preference and priority, as respects dividends and otherwise, over ordinary stock as is declared by the by-law.

Now that clause gives the company power to issue $10,000,000 on 150 miles of road. Clause 17 gives the company power to issue bonds to the extent of $25,000 a mile on the 150 miles of road. That makes something like $14,000,000 securities issued upon 150 miles of road. Just think of that enormous power of taxation that the company is given. If there was 200 miles of road, the power to issue would be so much greater. That has nothing whatever to do with the land grant, or with any other concessions; it relates purely to the road. That railway is to be bonded and stocked to the extent of something like $95,000 per mile. If they only bonded for $10,000 a mile, the $15,000 a mile which they do not bond it for can be added to the $10,000,000 stock so that practically that brings it up to $14,000,000 securities issued on 150 miles of railroad. That is what I call an enormous power of taxation given in the issuing of those securities.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—No one will take them.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—We have just heard what the hon. gentleman from Peterborough (Mr. Cox) said about the issuing of $6,000,000 of street railway shares, that the public took them, and they stand at par to-day. Although there is $3,000,000 bonds behind them, they are led away by speculation. Somebody has a right to hold those and if we legislate $100,000 a mile security to the railway company, they can use the power of legislation they have in order to extract dividends on that enormous amount of capital. It is in that way that the capital of the country is collected off the industry of the people by monopolies of that kind, and accumulated in a few hands, and it is that position to which I am opposed. Then they again create a portion of that stock as preference stock. That is not a matter of so much importance. Then the 12th and 13th clauses of the Act provide that:

12. The company may charter, purchase, or otherwise acquire, and construct and maintain and operate steamers and other vessels for passengers and freight in connection with its railways and property, and may sell and otherwise dispose thereof; it may also lease, construct, purchase or otherwise acquire, and maintain and operate wharfs, docks, landing places, dockyards, elevators, warehouses and other works for promoting and facilitating traffic upon its lines of railway, and may sell or otherwise dispose thereof.

13. The company may—

(a.) lease, purchase or otherwise acquire and operate mines and minerals and mining rights in British Columbia and the Provisional District of Yukon and the North-west Territories, and may crush, smelt, reduce and amalgamate ores for itself or others;

(b.) with the consent of and subject to the regulation of any municipality affected thereby, construct, or aid in the construction, maintenance and improvement of roads, tramways, docks, piers, wharfs, viaducts, aqueducts, flumes, ditches, quartz mills, ore houses, and other buildings and works necessary or convenient for the purposes of the company;

(c.) erect, use and manage works, machinery and plant for the generation and transmission of electric light, heat or power;

(d.) carry on in British Columbia, the Provisional District of Yukon and the North-west Territories, the business of carriers, forwarders and transportation agents and other business incident thereto, also of wharfingers, shippers and vessel owners, and may purchase and vend merchandise, ores and mineral products;

(e.) for all or any of the purposes above mentioned, purchase lease or otherwise acquire lands, buildings, patent rights, letters patent, and other property real and personal, and mortgage, sell or otherwise dispose thereof.

That is another enormous power given to this company. We give them power to monopolize the commerce, the transportation facilities and the electric lighting. Every municipal power that is separated up here in our eastern country is concentrated in one huge monopoly under this Act. Not a single company can show its nose but it will be overcome and overborne by this enormous power. No one can exercise any individual effort. It all has to bow down and get the permission of this company before it has any chance of success whatever. A company with such enormous powers and capital, with such powers of taxation on the western people of that country, can control in every shape and form the individual efforts of people that come in there to develop the country for Canada. Now we come to the tolls. That clause 24 is framed in a manner which makes it perfectly evident to me that the government are going to fix the tolls at 10 cents per mile for passenger rates, and the same proportionate rates for freight. The reasons I have arrived at that conclusion is that 25 per cent is taken off at the end of four years; 25 per cent at the end of seven years and at the end of 10 years it comes under the regular railway rate. In order to bring it down at the end of ten years to the ordinary rates of the country, it would have to start at ten cents a mile for passenger rates. So that for four years they are going to have those heavy rates for freight and passengers and for six years further high rates are still to prevail, although the mining grant is supposed to construct the railway. The next clause the question of exemption from taxation:

The lands granted to the contractors or to the company under the said contract, shall be free from taxation for ten years from the granting thereof, except unicipal taxation by an incorporated city, town or llage within the provisional district of Yukon.

We had an opinion expressed by the Minister of the Interior that the granting thereof dated from the day on which the patent was issued. Although the lands earned long ago by the Canadian Pacific Railway were granted to the Canadian Pacific Railway 16 or 18 years ago, yet according to the ruling of the Minister of the Interior the exemption from taxation, similar to this, does not commence until those lands have been patented, and they are not patented to-day, so that we do not know whether that exemption from taxation is 10 years from to-day, or 40 or 50 years. In this bill the towns and villages which may spring up there are excepted, but if we want to build a road between two villages, the people who are working there have to build it themselves. The company are not obliged to contribute to it in any shape or form. It is only in the towns and villages an exception is made in this clause. The company has power under the contract. Section 2 of the contract says :

To build and operate the railway above mentioned and an extension thereof northward to Dawson City or thereabouts, and an extension southward to a point in British Columbia to be designated by the government and capable of being made an ocean port, also a line of railway from the waters of Lynn Canal to Fort Selkirk or thereabouts by way of Chilkat Pass, also branch lines of railway from any points on the company's railways to any property owned by the company, also lines of railway from any navigable waters to any property owned by the company ; provided that the power to build said line from Lynn Canal to Fort Selkirk, and said branch lines and said lines from navigable waters shall not be exercised without the consent of the Governor General in Council.

The said Act of incorporation also to give the company full and sufficient powers to build and otherwise acquire and operate docks, wharfs and lines of steam and other vessels in connection with its railways and property, also telegraph and telephone lines, also to carry on mining and smelting operations.

Sections 4, 5 and 22 of the contract contain the monopoly clauses, and are as follows :

4. For five years from the 1st of September, 1898, no line of railway shall be authorized by parliament to be constructed from Lynn Canal or thereabouts, or from any point at or near the international boundary between Canada and Alaska into the Yukon district, and for five years from said date no aid in land or money shall be granted to any person or company other than the contractors and the contractors' company to assist in building any such railway.

5. The contractors and the contractors' company shall be entitled to receive in preference to any other person or company during ten years from the said 1st of September, 1898, such aid or assistance in land or money as the government may be authorized and may see fit to grant in aid of a line of railway from Stikine River to an ocean port in British Columbia, provided that the contractors or the contractors' company are willing to undertake the construction of the same at once and completion thereof within a reasonable time upon receiving notice thereof from the government.

22. The grants of lands selected by the contractors hereunder shall be in fee-simple and shall include all precious metals and all minerals whatever, reserving only the royalties above provided for.

That shows the enormous powers given there. They need not come back to this parliament to get power to build a line of railway. They can stop all other enterprises of any kind. It is a monopoly handed over to them, and no one would dream of coming to this parliament and asking power to build a railway or spend a dollar in promotion of any work as long as this contract is in existence. Hon. gentlemen will recollect how the leaders of the present government for years complained of the monopoly clause in the Canadian Pacific Railway contract, though it was an exceedingly mild one in comparison. The Attorney General of Mr. Greenway's government, the Hon. Jos. Martin, almost raised a rebellion in fighting the Canadian Pacific Railway to get the government railway across their line. They are authorized to build from Lynn Canal, though the government appear to think it treasonable on the part of any member of this House to advocate it. This monopoly is destructive to individual enterprise. Now we come to the land grants. The land grant on the 150 miles will be about 3,780,000 acres. The defence of the government in the House of Commons and in this House that these lands have no named value, and that it is a huge gamble. We have nothing, of course, to go by except the reports we have through private sources and the public reports given for our guidance on that particular point ; but I would just say this, that Mackenzie, Mann & Co. have the power to locate 12,000 acre blocks wherever they like. Wherever they find a nest egg they can put a 12,000 acre block on it. If the grant is increased to 5,000,000 of acres, it is a proportionate increase. The reports which have come to us from every source indicate that the value of the land is enormous. Some people value the amount of gold taken out last year as high as $40,000,000 ; others at $25,000,000, and some at $12,000,000. So far as I am concerned, taking the most conservative view, from my own experience I believe there has been $5,000,000 in gold taken out there last year, and will be ready to put through the pan when the earth is thawed out. When one considers the small number of miners there, not exceeding four thousand people, who have taken out $5,000,000, it shows what an enormously rich country it must be. We see by our returns that our mineral output has increased from $22,000,000 in 1896 to $28,000,000 in 1897. That shows that our mineral wealth is assuming very large proportions, and that the mining industry is increasing rapidly and out of all proportion to the very humble structure our geological interests are cared for in. It is increasing in the Kootenay district, and the mining district in the north is going to create a large trade. Gold has been found in California, in the Kootenay district and all through the Rocky Mountains, and there has been an enormous mining development, and although the difficulties of mining are greater, yet that region of the mountains appears to exceed in richness the southern mineral veins. We are increasing our output of gold and interests up there are going to develop very rapidly indeed. We are asked to blanket the whole of that country by a contract of this kind. We are asked to prevent the free miner from seeking remunerative work. A miner, in order to make his miner's claim, has to sink down through the frozen gravel some twenty or twenty-five feet, and as we heard the other day, some miners have to go sixty feet. Not one of these men will go and record his claim until he makes perfectly sure he has reached bed rock and has a claim worth recording, because there is but one chance in that country to record a claim, and therefore while he is digging this hole in the ground at great labour to himself, this company has the power to come, because that claim is not recorded, ignore the efforts perhaps of a year's work, or perhaps two or three years' work of that miner in search for a claim for himself to work upon. Because his name is not recorded as the owner of that claim the company can take away from him all the fruits of the efforts he has put forth. I will read you an extract here from a paper just to show you what may be expected from quartz mining. A good deal has been said on that subject—that it is not likely to amount to much—that it is only placer mining which will peter out in a few years, and that if we do not take advantage of the boom we are going to throw away a large amount of money. This is a memorial adopted at a mass meeting of the citizens of Juneau to the United States Government for the erection of a mint at Juneau :

A conservative estimate of the present annual bullion output of Juneau from its quartz mines alone is about $3,000,000, produced from approximately 650 stamps. Within twelve months the number of stamps in operation in lands tributary to Juneau will exceed 1,100, and the annual bullion product will exceed $5,000,000. During the last twelve months more than $1,500,000 of gold dust produced from Canadian Northwest Territory has been brought through here, and there is now on hand in Dawson City, approximately $7,500,000, to which will be added from this spring's clean-up an additional $7,500,000. Two companies have constructed fleets of lake and river steamers to operate between the head of the lakes and Five Finger Rapids, on the Yukon River, where tram portage has been established connecting with fleets of river boats running thence to Dawson city, and assurance is given that during six or eight months in the year a round trip can be made from Juneau to Dawson City in less than twenty days. In less than twenty years we believe south-eastern Alaska will be the greatest permanent bullion producer in the world.

I read this in order to show by an official memorial from the people of Juneau what 650 stamps at work in their neighbourhood produced. The annual product will exceed, they anticipate, five millions of dollars when the additional improvements are put in, now the strip of Alaska tributary to Juneau is small though a sea port. That shows the enormous value of the country and that quartz mining is going to play an important part. The hon. Secretary of State said that every one knew it cost ninety cents to produce one dollar's worth of gold. In quartz mining it does, but ten per cent is an exceedingly large percentage of profit. Hon. gentlemen should realize this, that in England the great cotton industry which turns over millions and millions in trade, is all conducted at a profit of two per cent, and such is the enormous capital available there that investors would be only too delighted to get hold of any property such as is mentioned in this contract. On the English market you could raise $20,000,000 three times over ; see the subscriptions that came in for Sir John Lipton's Tea and Supply Company, $125,000,000, ten times more than called for. If that company was to go to England to-morrow and take 100,000 acres of that land grant and locate it this summer after having built ten miles of road, they could float it in the English market for anything between two to four millions of dollars on the drop of the hat. We cannot tell until practical experience has shown us, the amount of gold there is, but such is the belief of capitalists in England in the wealth of certain regions in the Rocky Mountains that have been shown by assays and experienced miners to be there, that they greedily subscribe capital and form companies to operate them, and if they only get four or five per cent on their money they are quite satisfied, provided the securities they get may be considered reasonable. Of course the greater the risk the more they ask. But when the hon. Secretary of State says that ten per cent is the margin, it all depends upon the facilities for conveying food in there, and the facilities for smelting and bringing out the ore. The cost of mining will be reduced immensely if we only take the proper course. The cost depends entirely upon the facilities that are afforded, the amount of wages to be paid and everything else. I have occupied your time as long as it is reasonable in the discussion of this very important question. There are just one or two words I should like to bring before your notice in the shape of a suggestion. I would offer a suggestion to develop that country —and I speak from a certain amount of experience—I have been for thirty years in the western country, I penetrated it before there was any railroad within 400 miles of the city of Winnipeg, and I have been more or less connected with it for 26 years; therefore I have some knowledge of what I am speaking about. We are about to send in a force of about 200 men. I think that is a very wise and proper mode for us to utilize a fine body of men such as we have at our disposal, and I would not send those men there for aggressive purposes. I would not send them in anticipating there would be any trouble. I do not think there will be trouble. Our mounted police are so experienced, so gentle, at the same time forcible in their management of the public, that they are thoroughly respected. When people get into the interior of that country, and have to rely upon themselves they are very amenable to law. They know perfectly that there are difficulties in evading the law and it makes them more amenable than if those difficulties did not present themselves. And I do not anticipate trouble of any kind or description that would necessitate a force being sent in there, unless it is to forcibly get from the miners the ten per cent royalty. You may send a force in there and spend a great deal more in getting the royalty than it would amount to if collected. I would suggest to the government that they should utilize those forces as a pioneer force to go in on the Edmonton route, or at least divide them and send in with them a force of axemen and labourers, and expend half a million in cutting out a pathway right to Dawson City or Fort Selkirk, so that people could go with their teams and have shelter at certain places, and go in unimpeded all through Canadian territory without being blocked up at points like Skagway and Dyea, where they are fleeced of their money, and where they are crowded and herded together, with inadequate facilities of any kind or shape for them. If there was such a road as that cut out, a man could start with a team and drive right through to Dawson City with no more cost to himself than the provisions he would have to use on the way for himself and team. Under the present condition, that is denied to him and denied to any man in the North-west. That is denied to any Canadian, because they have to go right across the continent and fight their way the best they can through all the enormous difficulties that are presented to us day by day, as we read in the daily papers, and I would make that pioneer force work into the country the same way as Lord Wolseley went up to Winnipeg in 1870. It was that pioneer force that helped to open up the country in that day, and if the government adopted that suggestion we would before Christmas get into that country, and when we have that, we can erect our telegraph lines and bring that country into close connection with eastern traffic and trade without any difficulty whatever, and no obstruction from any foreign nation. Such a policy would do more to open up that country than any efforts that could be made under the present contract. That is what I call an all-Canadian route, a route developed upon sound and legitimate lines, not hastily conceived, but gone about step by step. What did the Liberal party suggest when the Conservative party was pushing forward the Canadian Pacific Railway to reach British Columbia? They advocated at that time that the government should not build the railway as a whole, that they should only build it fifty miles a year, and so on. The Hon. Mr. Blake was impelled by his opposition to call it a sea of mountains, as Sir Richard Cartwright and the Secretary of State has described the Yukon to-day a very doubtful asset, in fact a huge gamble. That was their view in that day, and a similar want of confidence is shown by them to-day in the resources of the country, although they are quite willing the contractors should handle them for a huge gamble and trade that right off for 150 miles of a second-hand narrow gauge road. But when the Canadian Pacific Railway was under consideration the Conservative party, under Sir John Macdonald, conceived that this was a great measure to bring British Columbia into unison with this country and to develop that enormous trade between ocean and ocean, which was going to be such a factor in building this country, and it was carried out to a satisfactory conclusion, and the construction of that road has shown his statesmanship. But this is a different thing altogether. This is not going from ocean to ocean. This is the care that we as a government are able to bestow upon the proper development of that country in order that a good trade may be developed, that wealth may be had to the Canadian people by the industry that can be put into that country in the working of those mines. We have a duty to perform at any rate in the discussion of this question. I believe thoroughly that it is our duty to support the motion of the hon. gentleman from British Columbia and throw this bill back upon the House of Commons for further consideration. If there was evidence brought to my notice, or brought to the notice of this House, that it is the will of the people that this contract should be gone into in this way, this House will not hesitate to support it. But if there is any evidence that has been given to us that this bill is not popular in the country, and does not meet with the wishes of the people, we have that evidence before us. We have just had the Ontario elections. We saw there that with all the power of the Dominion and provincial governments working in unity as a Liberal party, shoulder to shoulder, notwithstanding all the powerful influences that could be brought to bear under the operation of the party whip and party machine and everything else, the biggest effort that ever was made by the people to throw off the monopolistic influences that they felt were getting tighter and tighter around them year by year, we see the result of the Ontario elections. It was the people's fight. And it is evidence of that kind that forces me to the conclusion that the people are now thinking whether the question of monoply versus anti-monopoly should not be a question before the country—not a question of whether Liberal or Conservative, but whether the country is to be handed over to a series of monopolies of which the Canadian Pacific Railway is head and front as we have had knowledge of in our western country. We know perfectly well that that western country is developed purely on the lines and according to the ideas of managers of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I as a representative in this honourable House come down here and find that I am perfectly powerless. Their control over the organs of public opinion is a public menace. The object of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is to commit the government to its public expenditure on the coast route that will shut off all competition from the east, whereas a line from Edmonton gives the competition of all the prairie lines to reach it. I can present petition after petition, but my opinion or my views or the views of any hon. gentleman that comes down from the west are nothing as against the influence that can be exercised by the managers of these powerful corporations where their interests are at stake. I think the time has come when it is wise for us to consider whether we should not check, as far as lies in our power, a continuance of that system which has manifested itself in the contract we have been discussing. I repeat the former suggestion I made, and that is either hand all the mining claims over to the individual effort of the miners, or reserve half, and form a company that will mine for the government upon a basis of half the profits, as a revenue to aid in the development of that country, but do not throw the unknown resources of that mining region into the lap of these contractors and their friends.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I desire to say a few words before I record the vote which I propose to give when the discussion closes. This, I feel, is one of the most important questions that has ever been presented for our consideration in this House. I recognize more forcibly than I have in other cases the very serious responsibility which rests upon the Senate in considering a question of this nature. It is a government measure. It has passed the popular House by a considerable majority, and it comes to us now to either by our approval pass it into legislation, or by our disapproval defeat the proposition which is placed before us. I feel that the position of every hon. gentleman in this House imposes very grave responsibilities, that the extent of the responsibility which rests upon us is greater than in the other House. Gentlemen occupying seats in the other House are elected to represent the different constituencies in the country. They are elected upon particular issues and they are expected generally to support or oppose the policy of the government in that House and to a certain extent the responsibility for the measures which they are called upon to consider will be thrown by the individual member upon the government which at the time is administering the public affairs of the country. We stand in a different position here. We do not represent any particular constituences, but I feel that we are responsible to the whole people of Canada. In considering a question of this kind, it is our duty to consider, not whether it is a measure which has been presented to us by the government or by any private member, but to consider the measure purely on it merits as it may affect the commercial interests or the social well-being or the political honour of the people of this country. I feel personally, too, at somewhat of a disadvantage in forming a judgment upon a question of this character. I come from a section of this Dominion, the furthest possible removed from the portion of the Dominion which the provisions of this bill affect. I have felt it my duty, therefore, when this measure has been presented for our consideration, to give it more than an ordinary amount of careful study and consideration, in order that I might be able to properly discharge the duty which devolves upon me when I come to pass my vote upon this measure, and I desire now merely to state as briefly as I can to the House the reasons which have influenced me in coming to the decision at which I have arrived. In the first place I desire to say a word with regard to the general character of the route which has been chosen. This feature of the case has been already discussed at great length, and probably almost everything has been stated that can be said both in favour of and against this particular route. I would simply, therefore, direct the attention of the House to this feature of this part of the question ; that is the admission which is made by every person, I believe, who has spoken on the subject, both in the other House and in this House, that this is not the best commercial route that could have been chosen. The Minister of Railways in his opening remarks in the other House, admitted the fact that it was not chosen for its commercial advantages. He went further and stated that the contractors, Mackenzie & Mann, desired to build a railway from the Pacific coast to the Yukon territory by an entirely different route, and that the government compelled them to adopt this route, for considerations which to them appeared to be sufficient. The same statement, although not quite so strongly made, was made by the leader of the Senate when introducing the bill the other day. Now, while we all admit this fact, I think, perhaps, many who have spoken on that question do not attach the importance to the relative commercial advantages of those different routes which they should attach to them, and in order to draw particular attention to that fact I would invite the House to consider some features of those two routes. So far as the ocean voyage is concerned, either from a port in British Columbia, or from a port in the United States, on the Pacific coast, either Wrangel or the head of Lynn Canal, there are no difficulties to be met. When passengers or freight are landed at Wrangel in the one case, they have then river navigation of 150 miles before they reach the southern terminus of the proposed railway. That river navigation is up the Stikine. The Stikine River, from all the information we can gather from the reports placed before the House, is a comparatively small mountain stream. It is shallow, it has a swift current, the velocity in certain places and at certain times in the year being as high as 8 miles an hour. There are also some obstructions in the course of the river. It is claimed by some that that navigation is not very safe, but I think we may say this in regard to it, that it is tedious, it must be difficult, and must necessarily be expensive, and it may not be entirely free from danger. After this stage is passed, the travel of passengers, or the transportation of merchandise, is to be by the proposed railway. So far as the railway transport is concerned, there is no comparative advantage by either line, but at the northern terminus of this proposed railway, passengers and freight are landed at a place called Teslin Lake, and from there they have again a river navigation. The distance from there to Dawson City is 600 miles or upwards, and for that 600 miles the traffic, whether passenger or freight, has to be carried in the same class of small river steamers that are to be used on the Stikine River. This part of the journey therefore must, as the Stikine River portion, be tedious, difficult and expensive. The advantages of the other route are that when the ocean steamer arrives at the seaport on the Pacific coast in Lynn Canal, the passengers and freight are transferred directly to the railway and carried to its terminus ; they are then landed at a point on the Lewes, or Yukon River below the Five Finger Rapids. They have there river navigation with a depth of water at all times of the year of at least five feet, so that steamers can pass from Dawson City to the terminus of the railway in either direction at all times rapidly and without any excessive charge for the transportation of passengers or freight. The two most difficult portions of the travel by the proposed Stikine route are the 150 miles of river navigation on the Stikine and the difference in distance from the terminus of the railway to Dawson City, which is at least between 300 and 400 miles. Now, in my opinion, and I think it must be apparent to any one who has had experience with regard to the cost of travel or freight transportation, that these differences must seriously increase the cost of travel and freight traffic by the Stikine route over what it would be if the other route had been adopted—that the commercial advantages, are very decidedly in favour of the northern route. But there is another important difference between these two routes : the one is open only 5 months of the year, while the other can be used during all the year. This is an advantage which, from a commercial point of view, leaves no comparison between the utility of the two routes. I think it is fairly admitted that this route has not been chosen on account of commercial advantages which it possesses, and we feel obliged to look for other reasons before we are justified in adopting it. Let us for a moment, then, examine the reasons which have been given by those who favour this route why it is preferred over the other. In the first place, it has been contended that this route has been adopted because it is an all-Canadian route. I need not say very much upon that point, for it has been already pointed out, and I think now is generally admitted, that the route that is presented in this bill for our acceptance is not all-Canadian.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, it is.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I do not think the proposal in the bill is to establish an all-Canadian route, and I will tell the hon. gentleman why.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Parties are travelling up the Stikine River now and have no difficulties with the United States customs authorities.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I fancy that persons who are travelling that way now have no trouble with the United States customs authorities, and I understand that parties going by Skagway have no difficulty with the United States customs.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—They may have had on both routes ; we cannot hear from them.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I am also right in asserting that parties go in by way of the Yukon River and have no difficulties with the customs. The same difficulty, whether they are more or less, that exist at Dyea we must have in the transhipment of goods at Wrangel.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, not at all.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I must differ from the hon. gentleman. I am expressing my opinions and they must be received for what they are worth.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—But the others are facts.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—What facts does the hon. gentleman refer to ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no proposition to exact customs duties on the Stikine route ; on the other route there is always the necessity of paying duty or giving a bond, or being accompanied by a customs official. There is no similarity between them at all.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Perhaps the hon. gentleman cannot see the similarity, but I confess they appear to me to be precisely similar, because provided there is a necessity to tranship at Wrangel——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Wherever there is a right to navigate a river by treaty, as an incident to that right is the mooring to the bank, shipping and transhipping. That has been held over and over again, and been conceded.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But it must be under an arrangement with the customs authorities.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—We have a right to kill seals in the Pacific Ocean, but it took seven or eight years to get the United States to concede it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—For years we have been navigating the Stikine.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I am not disputing that point at all. I am only saying that if we tranship goods at Wrangel, in my humble opinion that transhipment has to be made under such rules and regulations as the United States customs may prescribe.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They are mere police regulations : no duty can be exacted.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—No duties are exacted at Dyea or Skagway.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—If there are, there is a rebate at the other end.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is a matter of forbearance ; the other is a matter of right. In one case we have the right, and in the other we have not.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—We have a right, under treaty, to navigate the Stikine River but that does not give us a right to tranship goods at Wrangel.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Oh, yes, it does.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I must differ from my hon. friend on that point, and I am confirmed in that opinion from reading the speech delivered by the hon. Minister of the Interior in the other House. I was struck with the explanation which he gave in referring to this point, that in case regulations were made with regard to transhipment at Wrangel, which would be vexatious or interfere with our traffic, one way of obviating it would be by making the transhipment at Port Simpson. I can quite understand that that is one way of getting clear of this difficulty but that method of meeting it is subject to this objection, that it increases the difficulties and expense attendant upon the transport of passengers and freight by a route which is already difficult and expensive. Then the hon. gentlemen who are representing the government in this House have told us that they propose to extend this line to a seaport in British Columbia, the object of which, if I understand it, is to make it an all-Canadian route, which it is not at the present time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The object is to reach an ocean port.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—But if this is an all-Canadian route, and there is an open port at Wrangel where we can tranship our goods without interference by the United States authorities, I do not see what better off we would be by going to British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—One would be an all-the-year route and the other would be limited to six months.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—That is a new feature of the case. The object, then, of extending this line to a seaport in British Columbia is to get a port which will be open all the year round and not to get an all-Canadian route.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Both. The hon. gentleman is not quite fair. The ocean port would be in Canadian territory.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—But the object, if I understand the hon. Secretary of State, is to get a route which will be open all the year round.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—To a British port all the year round.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—And not to overcome any difficulties which may occur at Wrangel ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is silly.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I regret that my views do not accord precisely with those of the hon. gentlemen who have interrupted me, and that I have so far misunderstood the arguments both in this chamber and in the other chamber as to have formed the impression which I have with regard to our rights at Wrangel. It appears to me these hon. gentlemen are presenting it now in an entirely new and different light. We have this statement made with regard to the proposed extension to an open seaport in British Columbia, that the government have that under consideration, and that they propose to ask parliament, before this session closes, for a sum of money to at least open a wagon road on that route, the object of which I certainly understood to be that we would have an entirely independent Canadian route into that territory.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—For the whole year.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Does the hon. gentleman mean to tell me that the object of building that road is to have a route which will be open all the year—that the government are going to build a wagon road from a seaport in British Columbia to Telegraph Creek which will be open all the year, and a wagon road or any other kind of a road from Teslin Lake to Dawson all the year?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Is my hon. friend referring to what I said?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I was just now referring to what the hon. Secretary of State said.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think I made this as plain as possible, that the ultimate object was to continue the railway south to a port on the Pacific Ocean in British territory. I mentioned the fact that it was a prelude to a railway—I suppose you have to cut the road through before you can build the railway. My hon. friend does not want to understand this matter.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I do want to understand what object the government had in building the wagon road.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I told the House, I do not know whether my hon. friend was here or not—that we had the right to use the navigation of the Stikine for commercial purposes; that so far as commerce was concerned that was, in effect, an all-Canadian route, but that if difficulties arose and it became necessary to send troops into the country the United States government might not permit them to go through, and would have the same right to object to them going through that they would have to object to our sending either troops or commercial products by way of Dyea and Skagway—that if it were necessary to send troops there we could land them at Observatory Inlet or Portland Inlet, and they could march to Telegraph Creek in order to take the railway there—and that was the reason.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I have a note here of that feature of the hon. gentleman's address, and I intended to refer to it later on; but I was at this stage of my remarks, addressing myself to the commercial merits of these different routes, and not to the political reasons which the hon. gentleman gave us for adopting what he calls an all-Canadian route. Now, I certainly understood—but I may be mistaken in that—that the object of extending this line to a seaport in British Columbia was to secure an all-Canadian route, and the only remark I intended to make on that branch of the subject at the present time was this, that in my opinion one of the most serious objections to the proposition before us is that it absolutely makes no provision for the extension of this line of railway to a seaport in British Columbia. Now, we may be told that it does, but I desire to direct the attention of the House to this, that the provision in the contract is in section No. 2, that these contractors are incorporated

> With all necessary powers to build and operate the railway above mentioned, and an extension thereof northward to Dawson City or thereabouts, and an extension southward to a point in British Columbia to be designated by the government and capable of being made an ocean port.

And in section 5:

> The contractors and the contractors' company shall be entitled to receive in preference to any other person or company during ten years from the said 1st September, 1898, such aid or assistance in land or money as the government may be authorized and may see fit to grant in aid of a line of railway from the Stikine River to an ocean port in British Columbia, provided that the contractors or contractors' company are willing to undertake the construction of the same at once and completion thereof within a reasonable time upon receiving notice thereof from the government.

The observation I make with regard to those provisions in the contract is that while it clothes this company with power to construct this section of the line, it places upon them no obligations whatever to do so. But that is not the only serious objection to this part of the contract. It places it practically beyond the possibility of securing any other company or set of contractors to build that portion of the line. Mackenzie & Mann own the line from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake. It would be practically out of the question to expect any other company, or set of contractors, to build the connecting line between that line and an ocean port in British Columbia and undertake to operate the road. It must be clear to the common sense of any one that knows anything about operating railways in this country that those lines, if they ever are constructed, must be owned and operated, to be operated to any advantage whatever, by the same company and the same corporation. If the government under this contract decided that in one, two or three years' hence this connecting line must be built for giving an all-Canadian route into that country, they are obliged to go to Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann and no others. They can ask them what terms they will build it on, and they have to accept those terms or they cannot get it built at all. That is the position of the government under that contract—and I believe that is one of the most objectionable features of the contract as it stands before us to-day. There is another reason which has been given by those who have spoken in support of this measure why this road should be built, and that was in order to secure to Canada, as far as possible, the trade of that Yukon country. I admit that is a laudable and worthy object, and I would support the government in any reasonable scheme which would have that end in view. I have therefore listened with the greatest attention to see explained by some one the reasons why they expect this road, if constructed, will give Canadian merchants or manufacturers or producers any advantage whatever over their United States competitors in securing the trade of that country—and I must admit that I have listened in vain. There can be no difference in the transport of passengers or freight across the ocean from any Pacific port to the terminus of this railway or to Port Wrangel. When passengers or freight arrive there it will not be asked by the railway company whether the goods are United States or Canadian; there would be no discrimination as far as the rates are concerned. The only advantage the Canadian will have will be that the United States goods, when they reach the Canadian boundary, will have to pay the Canadian duty, whatever that may be. But if the United States and Canadian goods go in by Skagway or Dyea, the same things precisely prevail. United States goods, when they reach the Canadian boundary, must pay the Canadian duty, while the Canadian goods go in free. The same is true, so far as the transport of merchandise is concerned, for it does not apply to passenger traffic at all. The only advantage by any of these routes is that Canadian goods have the advantage over United States goods by the amount of the Canadian duty which is imposed when they cross the boundary—and they have that advantage as much by one route as by another. The building of this road gives them no additional advantage, so far as I can see, in the competition for the trade of that country. But more than that, if it is effected at all, in my opinion it tends to lessen the advantage which the Canadian merchants or manufacturers would otherwise possess. When the cost of transportation is very small compared with the original cost of the class of merchandise transported, the amount of duty is an important factor in deciding where those goods shall be procured. Therefore, the cheaper you make the cost of transportation the more important a factor the amount of duty becomes in settling between two contending parties who shall be successful for the competition of the trade of any particular country. The advantage of the other routes which have been proposed is that the cost of transportation will be considerably reduced, and therefore the question of duty will be a more important factor in settling where the goods will be purchased or whether the goods that are consumed in that country will be of Canadian or United States origin. On the other hand, if you adopt a route which, as I say, is tedious and must of necessity be expensive, when the cost of transportation is one or two, or three or four, or perhaps five times the original cost of the class of goods which are transported, the matter of duty is a mere insignificant factor in determining whether those goods shall be secured; therefore this route, by increasing the cost of transportation, if it has any effect whatever so far as competition is concerned, certainly acts to the disadvantage of the Canadian as opposed to his United States competitor.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend has been assuming throughout that Canadian goods should not be subject to duty at Dyea or Skagway, or wherever the starting point would be in United States territory, and I would ask him this question: If that was the only route into the Yukon country, whether the United States government would allow Canadian goods to be sent through that border strip of territory without paying duty to the United States.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—In bond?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What right have you to claim bonding privileges at all? It is a matter of arrangement—I ask my hon. friend whether he thinks the United States government would allow our goods to go through in bond and without payment of duty.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—If the hon, gentleman wants my opinion, I frankly tell him I think they would.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What object would they have?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I can hardly conceive it possible that a civilized nation such as the United States of America is, would refuse the Canadian people the bonding privilege over that narrow strip of territory.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—Have you ever heard that suggested over the state of Maine?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Yes, and a bill was introduced into the Senate to take away our bonding privileges at Port Wrangel; that bill passed the Senate, but my hon. friend, the Secretary of State, told us the other day that he had heard nothing of it since—and I doubt if we shall hear anything more of it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—You put yourself absolutely in their power.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—That is another point. I am simply answering the hon. gentleman's question, and in my opinion they would not deny us the bonding privilege in that country. They have not done it so far. The Hon. Mr. Sifton in the House of Commons the other day stated that he had made satisfactory arrangements for the bonding privilege over United States territory from Dyea and Skagway, and I have read in the papers atdifferent times since that that Canadian goods are being taken in that way, and there is no trouble whatever; and that on United States goods, as they reach the Canadian boundary, the duties are collected and there is no trouble whatever.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—If I may be permitted to interrupt my hon. friend, I would just say this that the United States people are just as anxious to get their goods into the territory of Alaska along the 141st meridian, and would be very thankful indeed to exchange the bonding privilege of thirty miles in their territory for the five hundred miles of Canadian territory.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Yes, I think that is a forcible point. That is one means we would have in our hands of making a favourable arrangement with them in case any trouble arose. I do not think the trouble will arise, and I think the hon. leader of the House will admit that unless the United States people, by Act of Congress, actually take away from Canadian goods the bonding privileges through that narrow strip of country on the Pacific coast, no trouble would arise, and I would go further on that point and express my own opinion, that if the United States Congress should go so far as to prevent Canadian traders taking their goods and merchandise through that narrow strip of country without paying duty, it would be an act of legislation for which I do not believe there is a precedent in the history of any civilized country.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes, there is.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—It would certainly be so hostile to the interests of Canada that it would justify the government, and I believe they would receive the unanimous support of every member of both chambers of this parliament as well as the whole people of this country, in enacting retaliatory legislation which would deprive United States citizens of the right to trade in that country, or United States goods of finding a market there. I certainly would endorse any legislation which would go that length if our United States neighbours should go to the extreme length of enacting legislation which would deprive us of the bonding privilege on that coast.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—You would make the road useless to both.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I do not quite understand that. The hon. gentleman spoke of the necessity of getting mounted police in there. Those, he said, were political reasons which justified the construction of this road which in comparison with other roads, had not the greatest commercial advantages, and I am willing to admit to the hon. gentleman that, so far as that part of his argument was concerned, I felt there was a great deal of force in it. I entirely sympathize with the hon. gentleman in his desire to have an entirely independent route to that country, in case any complication should arise, by which our mounted police or military and their supplies, both in food and ammunition, could be got in without being dependent upon our neighbours. But, remember, that is only necessary as a means of communication to fall back upon in case complications do arise. The hon. gentleman himself admitted that while two nations remain in the same friendly terms in which the United States and Canada are to-day that food and supplies for the mounted police or for the military in that country could be sent in, for it would not be inquired who was going to eat this food or for what purpose they were to be used when they got in. So far as building a wagon road, either to an ocean port in British Columbia, or, as I understand my hon. friend from Shell River, in from the other side of the mountains, by which in case of emergency or mounted police, or a military force to support them, could be taken in there and ample supplies of ammunition to enable them to discharge the duties which devolve upon them. I would entirely favour such a proposition whenever it is presented to us. But it must be remembered in connection with that—and I would like to particularly call the attention of hon. gentlemen to this point in connection with that feature of the subject—that even after this road is built it can only be used for that purpose for five months in the year, and I assume that the government will, under these conditions, knowing that the mounted police after they are in there will for seven months of the year be shut out from communication with the outside world—take the precaution this summer, and every summer until permanent railway communication is established, of having an ample force of mounted police in there to preserve order and to maintain government, and will see that there is an abundant supply of food, ammunition and whatever else is required for at least twelve months in advance.

At six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Before the Speaker left the Chair at 6 o'clock, I had been offering some observations to the House with regard to the character of the route which had been chosen for building the railway, that is now under consideration, and I had endeavoured to point out what was admitted on all sides that this route was not chosen on account of any commercial advantages which it possessed. I had also endeavoured to point out that, while it was claimed to be an all-Canadian route, it was not really so, and that the proposition which had been urged upon the House, that the contract which we are now considering provided for the extension of this road to a port in British Columbia, failed to provide any means for that extension except upon such terms as the present contractors might dictate. I had also pointed out that, while this contract might have been justified for political reasons, the reasons which have been given by the leader of the House of a political character were not sufficient, in my opinion, to justify the House in adopting the contract laid before them. I do not intend to occupy the time of the House any longer by observations on the character or the merits of these different railway routes. I wish merely, in addition to what I have said to refer to the price which it is proposed to pay for the construction of this line. The contract provides that the contractors shall collect from the gold-producing regions of the Yukon 25,000 acres per mile for the length of line which they are called upon to construct, which will amount probably to 3,750,000 acres, or probably in all 4,000,000 acres. The opinions which have already been expressed with regard to the value of these lands differ very widely indeed. I admit that the value of these lands cannot at the present time be accurately stated, and those who have addressed the House in support of this contract have dwelt upon this feature in regard to the lands. Indeed, this has been termed in the other House, and I believe, too, in this House, a sort of gambling transaction, so great is the uncertainty with regard to the value of the land which it is proposed to give the contractors as a reward for the construction of this railway. I admit there is something of that character in this transaction, but, if I look at the subject rightly, from my own point of view, at all events, it does appear to me that one party to the game holds all the winning cards. We can only form our judgment of the value of this concession from such information as we have regarding the condition of things in that remote region. The very best authority is the report of Mr. Ogilvie, a government surveyor, who has spent months and years in travelling through that country. If we can believe the reports which he has sent to us, there are at least many millions of gold already in sight in that country, and the prospect for the discovery of many millions more are very good indeed. This opinion is confirmed by so high an authority as Dr. Dawson. In addition to this, every letter that comes and every report that reaches us from those who are already on the ground, tells very much the same story, and in my opinion the discoveries which up to the present time have been made, place it beyond doubt that the Klondike is really the richest gold producing country that is known upon the face of the globe, and is likely to become the greatest gold producing country upon the face of the globe to-day. If this conjecture is correct, I feel that we are perfectly right in assuming that it will be absolutely impossible for any man, or number of men, to select out of that whole country four million acres of land, making the selection with ordinary judgment and discretion, as no doubt these men will without getting tens or hundreds and perhaps many hundreds of acres of land any one acre of which would be worth more than the whole cost of the construction of this line. My hon. friend seems to look incredulous; it is, of course, my own way of looking at it, and I give my own views on the subject whatever they may be worth. It has been remarked in this connection, by different speakers, that the cost of discovering the gold mines, if they exist in that country, workable gold mines, I mean, will probably be on the whole more than the gold that is taken out of them will be worth. I am inclined, in a general way, to admit the correctness of that statement. The experience we have had so far in that line will show that if you count all the money that has been expended in prospecting and exploring, and in the work of development of the different gold fields of the world, the total would amount to probably as much, or more than the amount of gold that has ultimately been taken out. While that is so, we have also this fact, which is quite as well established, that in all these rich gold producing countries many have made immense fortunes. We would be led to infer, from the general tone and the general line of argument which has been used by many gentlemen speaking upon this feature of the case, that these contractors, Mackenzie & Mann, will spend money in exploring that country in hunting for gold mines and in the work of development, and they will probably be required to spend as much in that way as they will ultimately receive from the mines which they discover. I do not think we are justified in assuming that that is the line of action that they will adopt. I understand they are capable business men, and will select these lands with the greatest care. I have no doubt they will select the very best experts which they can obtain, and I have no doubt too that they may spend money in exploring, and in the work of development, and they may enter into mining operations if they find that it would be profitable for them to do so; but I desire humbly to suggest that they will have other means of making large profits out of this transaction besides engaging in the work of gold mining. I find that this contract provides that they will be authorized, when this company is formed, to issue stock to the amount of $10,000,000, that they will have the power of issuing bonds to the amount of $25,000 a mile which will amount to nearly, if not quite, $4,000,000 more, that they have the further right of mortgaging their land grant which they receive to any amount which they may think proper. I do not think there is any candid business man listening to my voice to-day who will question the fact, in the present condition of public feeling in this country and the old country, that if this contract becomes law, if this company is organized and if the securities are placed upon the money market either of the United States or Great Britain, they will not fail to realize a sum which would amount to two or three, or perhaps four or five times the amount of money which it is admitted they would be obliged to expend in order to construct this line. I would desire to humbly suggest that there is another possible way of realizing large profits on these lands which are conceded to them in this contract. So far as my reading upon such subjects has given me any opinion in regard to it, I have been led to conclude that gold discoveries in the main are accidental, that while explorers and gold hunters may travel over these auriferous regions for weeks and months, and perhaps years, without finding anything which they can work with a paying product, some man accidentally stumbles upon the clue which leads to the discovery of the richest and most profitable mines. I can readily understand how a shrewd business man, who has carefully selected four million acres of land in a large, rich gold producing country could afford to allow those lands to lie idle for one year or two years, or three or four or five years, We know it now to a certainty that in the present year thousands and tens of thousands of explorers will go into that country. We have every reason to believe that for two, or three, or four or five years to come a still greater number will go into the Yukon. Those men will travel over that country in every direction, and, in my opinion, it is hardly possible to conceive that upon 4,000,000 acres of land, selected over that country in almost every direction, nobody will stumble upon a rich gold producing mine. If that happens, what will be the result—if that find is on one of these 4,000,000 acres of land, the discoverer of course will be well rewarded for his trouble. The next process is to form a company to sell a small amount of stock, a few thousand dollars, in order to provide capital to carry on the work of development. If the mine proves to be useless, the public that buy that small amount of stock, lose the money they invest and the original owner loses nothing. If the mine proves to be a workable mine, one which will pay large profits, the whole capital of that stock, which may amount to hundreds of thousands of dollars, and in some cases to millions of dollars, is readily sold upon the market, and the original owners of the land own the greater part and receive the returns for the greater part of it. When we consider the probability of what may be realized not only in one way but in a number of ways, by any person or any company of men who own such an enormous tract of country in a rich gold-producing district, it is hardly possible to conceive that it will not yield them at least many millions of dollars in return, and the possibilities of the returns which may be received are indeed something fabulous. In view of these facts, I, for my own part, have come to the conclusion that it is a most unwise policy for this country to transfer to any men, or company of men, so large an area of mineral lands in what is known, or at all events believed to be, one of the richest gold producing countries in the world, and especially when the consideration for which it is given is only to build a short line or railway at a cost of some three or four million dollars. There is one other feature of this contract, and one other consideration bearing on the terms of the contract made with Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, to which it appears to me but little attention has been devoted. The hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Miller) in his admirable address the other day made reference to this point, and evidently appreciated the very great importance of it; but it has appeared to me that the government, in entering into this contract, have allowed it almost entirely to escape their attention. The point to which I refer is the earning power of this railway, or of any railway constructed from the Pacific coast to the Yukon region which has, as this one will have under the terms of this contract, a practical monoply of the passenger and freight traffic between these two different points. It is difficult of course to make a very accurate estimate of what the earnings of this railway may be, but we have at our command some data from which we are enabled to form at least a tolerably approximate estimate of what the earning of such a road must be. The hon. leader of the House, in introducing this bill, told us that a moderate estimate of the number of people who would go into the Yukon district during the present year would be 100,000.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I said within twelve months.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Say within twelve months it would be 100,000. The vice-president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, in conversation a day or two ago, estimated it 50 per cent more—he thought the number would reach 150,000. I have no means of judging, and accept the opinions of such high authorities as these with regard to the number of persons that are likely to travel in that direction. It is hardly possible, even if that country should prove not to be so rich as it promises to be at the present time, that this enormous travel will not continue for at least two, or three, or four, probably five years from the present time. If we admit those facts, I think we are well within the limits if we estimate the annual number of passengers which would travel over a railway in that region at 50,000. I think, too, we are well within the bounds of reason if we estimate the traffic which would be carried over the railway at 50,000 tons. I estimate the charge, a fair passenger charge, for carrying a passenger over a railway in that section of the country, at $20. I know that many have estimated it at very much more.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What do you estimate it at as things are now? What does it cost a passenger now to get in?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I have seen it stated, but I do not just remember. I think it is one hundred or one hundred and fifty dollars, I could not tell the hon. gentleman just how much. At all events, I have been partly guided in making that estimate by this fact. The contract made with Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann in the bill before us provides that the rate shall be fixed by the Governor in Council, that after four years they shall be reduced 25 per cent, that after three years more they shall be reduced another 25 per cent, and then at the end of ten years they will come within the provision of the Railway Act. Now, if we start with less than $20 at the outset, certainly at the end of ten years we would have pretty cheap railway travel in that section of the country. If I am correct in this estimate, I would say that with regard to freight, I have placed the estimate at $25 a ton which I think is well within the mark—I have seen it estimated at much larger than that amount.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—A dollar a pound at present.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Yes, at present; that is, $2,000 a ton. I am estimating it at $25 a ton, which would be a very great reduction. I am possibly below the estimate. I wish to be very moderate in my statement. If I am correct in the estimates which I am making here, the gross earnings of that line of railway in one year will amount to $2,250,000. Now, in regard to the operating expenses, if we allow the same rate for operating that railway for train mileage that it costs to operate the Grand Trunk Railway, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Intercolonial Railway, and such railways as those, the cost per train mile would range from seventy to eighty-five cents per mile. Upon that basis, and allowing the cost of operating this railway to be one dollar per ton mile, the operating expenses for a year would amount to about $135,000. I could give the House the details of that calculation if they wish, but I do not care to take up the time. But, even supposing it is double that, make it a quarter of a million, there is still a couple of million of dollars profit in the operation of the road.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What does my hon. friend count the loss that Canadian commerce sustains by the continuance of things as they are now?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I have not gone into that calculation.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It seems to me that is a necessary part of the consideration of this question.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I shall allow my hon. friend to take up that branch of the subject, I have not taken it up, as it is not in the line of the argument I am making at the present time. I am not discussing the loss to Canadian trade. I am looking at this transaction from the point of view of the company that shall own and operate it. One can almost read the countenance of my hon. friend from Chatham (Hon. Mr. Snowball), as to his opinion when these figures are presented to him; he is inclined to treat them with derision, I am not surprised that statements such as I have just made to the House should strike the mind of any one at first sight as almost absurd and ridiculous. But a little reflection will perhaps lead us to a different conclusion. I would like to point out to the House, in this connection, that the advantages and the conditions under which that railway will be operated are entirely exceptional; that such conditions have never been known in the history of this country. I do not believe that such conditions exist in any country in the world at the present time. Just think for a moment of some of the exceptional conditions under which that railway will be operated. Every passenger that passes over that railway goes from one end to the other and pays the full transportation charge for the whole distance. Think what carrying 50,000 passengers means. It means the whole population of a city like Ottawa. Remember that every other railway in Canada has a large proportion of travel which is suburban in its character, persons going short distances; but on this railway there will be no suburban travel; there will be no pic-nics or Sunday school excursions—nothing of that kind at all. Every man who passes over that road goes from one end to the other, and pays the full amount of the transportation charge. Then, taken into consideration the lessening of the operating expenses. There are no way stations to build or no station-masters to pay. Every ton of freight is loaded in the cars at one end of the line and emptied out at the other.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—But there can only be one train on the line at a time.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Not by any means. You might send one train after another at every hour in the day. I suppose the train could turn around. You would have a turn table.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—You must have way stations to let the trains pass.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—You must have sidings or crossings to allow the trains to pass. What I mean to say is, there is no way traffic, and we all know that a very large portion of the expenses—I think my hon. friend has had enough railway experience to know that—of a railway are the maintenance, the comforts they have to provide for the passengers, and the agents that have to be there to sell the tickets. It is true they will be obliged to erect telegraph poles, and have a few persons stationed along the line, but the cost of that will be infinitesimal compared with the enormous expense which every other railway in the country has to provide for in the matter of way stations. Now, I say the exceptional conditions are these, that while the receipts from traffic are excessively high, while this traffic is carried under conditions which exists in regard to no other railway at the present time, while the operating expenses are in many respects at least reduced to the minimum, and if we carefully consider these exceptional conditions, I think we will have no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that these startling statements which I made to the House a few minutes ago are not at all unreasonable. I have heard of only one instance in the world where a similar condition of things existed, and the results in that case were precisely similar to the results which I claim will follow if this railway is built and becomes a highway for travel and commerce into that region, and that is the case which has already been referred to in the course of this debate—the railway which was built in western Australia at the time of the discovery of the celebrated Coolgardie gold mine. The government of Australia took the matter in hand at that time. They contracted with Messrs. Wilkie Bros. for the construction of that road. They paid them a subsidy of $2,500 a mile, and gave them a certain length of time, after the road was completed, to take the profits of the operation of the road before they handed it over to the government. They operated, according to the statement which appeared in the Citizen the other day, for about nine months, and in that nine months the profits of the railway were so enormous that it paid the entire cost of construction, and left the contractors a handsome profit in addition.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—Did they pay $2,500 or £2,500?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—$2,500 a mile—£500, and the railway cost about $12,500 a mile. The profits from operating the road the first nine months paid a cost of $12,000 for the construction of that road, and I do not know how much additional profit to the contractors besides. Whatever may be the facts with regard to that statement—and I believe it to be entirely true—I find by turning to the railway statistics of the colony of western Australia that the government system of that colony, which up to 1896 had not been able out of its own receipts to pay anything near its operating expenses, from the time this railway was handed over to them it has yielded a large revenue to the government of the colony. This is the only case that I can find where the conditions were anything similar to the conditions which will exist in that remote part of this Dominion, and I feel safe in predicting that the result in that case will be the same.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Are the rates the same as on the Intercolonial?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I do not understand that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My. hon. friend is speaking of Australia. There the whole peop.e were interested in one railway, but here there will be only one section. The hon. gentleman knows how it works on the Intercolonial.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I do not see what that has to do with the line of argument. I was speaking of the profits of railways under these conditions where they had exceptional traffic of this character. I do not know what the Intercolonial has to do with it. I will say this to the hon. gentleman, that every passenger that travels over that railway, if it is constructed, as every passenger that travelled over the Australian railway when it was in operation, will pass from one end to the other and pay twenty dollars a piece, while the average receipts for passengers on the Intercolonial railway are only sixty-six cents per head. This results from the fact that so large a proportion of the passenger traffic upon roads like the Intercolonial is of a suburban character, pic-nic excursions and that sort of thing, and it reduces the average rate per passenger to a very small amount. In the case of the Intercolonial it is sixty-six cents; in the case of the Grand Trunk, ninety-eight and a half; in the case of the Prince Edward Island Railway, it was only fifty cents; in the case of the Canada Atlantic, it was $1.29, and others about the same proportion. This only shows in a still more marked manner the extraordinary contrast between the condition of things with ordinary railways of the country and a railway operating under the exceptional circumstances under which a railway must be operated in that district after it is built. There is just one other observation in that connection that I wish to make. I opened my remarks by pointing out that this railway did not itself possess natural commercial advantages, that it was not the best route, from a commercial point of view, but I must point out in that connection that the government aim—and I presume they will successfully accomplish what they are aiming at—to make it the only commercial route by giving the contractors an entire monopoly of railway construction in that section, for we all know that the contract under which this railway is to be built prevents the construction of any competing line from the Pacific coast to the Yukon district for the next five years, and the leader of the House himself, in his opening address, said it would be impossible to build a competing line from the direction of Edmonton and have it in operation within five years, so that if this bill passes and this contract is entered into, whether it possesses natural commercial advantages or not, the freight traffic and the passenger traffic will be compelled, by the provisions of this bill, to pass over this line if it goes by railway at all. I do not intend to detain the House longer upon that subject. I pointed out, to the best of my ability, what appear to me to be great and serious objections to the adoption of the proposition presented for our consideration. I merely wish to to say this in conclusion, that in my opinion, if it is necessary to have a railway constructed from the Pacific coast to the Yukon country, the negotiations for the construction of a railway either by this or any other route should proceed on the basis of making the traffic of the railway pay for its construction. I say this because the conditions there are, as I have pointed out, of an entirely exceptional character. It is not for me to suggest to the government any particular line of action. I presume if I do it will not have very much weight in their deliberations on the subject, but I may venture to say that if it can be shown that it is wise to construct a railway at all upon this line (and the longest has been selected) the government might have safely provided the funds for the construction of that line, relying on the enormous traffic which it must receive within the next 2 or 3 or 5 years to reimburse them for the outlay necessary for the cost of construction.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—There are other ways in which it can be done. As I said in the remarks that I addressed to the House last session, I am not in favour of the government constructing or owning railways if they can possibly avoid it. I think it is much better to place them under control of private companies, and if the government hold that view, as I do, it would appear to me a wise and prudent course—as well as a safe course—to adopt with this or any company, to advance the money necessary for the construction of a railway, or guarantee the bonds of the company to give them money or credit and rely upon the earnings of the road to reimburse the public treasury. In my opnion, there would be very little risk, almost no risk at all, in a transaction of that kind, but if the government feel, as they do feel, that the public of this country would not justify them in taking a dollar from the public treasury to secure the construction of a work of this kind, I venture here to express the opinion that there is still another way in which this can be accomplished without appropriating anything from the public treasury, and that would be by chartering the company, for which my hon. friend from Calgary has a bill now before the House, or by contracting with Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, if they chose, for the construction of a line of railway which they stipulate in this very bill that they shall have the right to construct, that is if it is ever constructed, on the very best commercial route which that company can select, anywhere from the head of Lynn Canal inward to a point on the Lewes or Yukon River.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Is my hon. friend in favour of subsidizing a road from the head of Lynn Canal?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—No.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I understood him to say so now.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—No; I did not say anything of the kind. I said that, in my opinion, there was a method of securing a road over a route in that locality, if the hon. gentlemen are willing to let it be known that any company who will construct that road will be secured from the construction of any competing line for five years, as this bill secures the present contractors, so that they will have, on the very best commercial route that they can select between the Pacific coast and the Yukon country, an absolute monopoly of the travel and traffic of that country for five years at least; and, if the government will, at the same time, as they take the same course they are providing in this bill, guarantee to the company that constructs that line that they will allow them reasonably high charges for the carriage of passengers or transportation of freight, I venture to say here to-day that they will find not only one, but half a dozen companies that will be willing to undertake the construction and operation of such a line as that without one dollar of subsidy. These are suggestions which have occurred to my own mind. I merely mention them in order that this House and the country may know the point of view from which I regard this transaction, and if these suggestions should be of any value to the government in their future deliberations on the subject I shall be only too glad to know it. I do not intend to detain the House any further on this subject. I thank hon. gentlemen very much for the careful attention with which they have listened to my observations. I would say, in closing, that it is with regret I am about to record the vote that I am giving in this instance. I should have preferred to vote for this proposition if I could have conscientiously done so. I desire to say, also, that I do not wish to obstruct railway construction in that country if done on reasonable terms, that I do not wish to place any obstacles in the way of the government in providing reasonable facilities of ingress and egress for those who desire to go there in search of gold, or for any other object. I shall, in any proposition which may be submitted to the House which appears to me at all reasonable, be glad to give the government my support, and it is only because this proposition contains a great many features of so objectionable a character, from my point of view, that I feel compelled, in this instance, to cast my vote in favour of the amendment which has been moved by my hon. friend from Victoria.

Hon. Mr. KING—It was my privilege at an early period of this session to make a few remarks to this House on the address in reply to the speech from the Throne. In that speech I took occasion to dwell, at considerable length, on the question which is before us now. The only apology which I have to offer to the Senate to-night for so soon again trespassing upon the time of hon. gentlemen is, that while I had the honour of occupying a seat in the House of Commons my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Wood), who has just taken his seat, also sat in that House, and he very often paid me the compliment of replying to speeches that I delivered in that chamber. To-night I propose to return the compliment, and to be as brief as possible in doing so. I do not propose to waste time in discussing the subject further than is necessary in replying to some statements made by the hon. member from Westmoreland. That hon. gentleman comes from my own province, and I have to say to-night, as I think is well known to all, that when he rises to discuss any public measure, he, at all events, has the faculty of convincing those who listen to him that he is sincere and honest in what he says. I am not to-night going to charge him with want of sincerity, but I do say, and I do believe, that the hon. gentleman is not as firmly convinced to-night that in the attitude he has taken on this particular question, he is standing on as good ground as he has heretofore stood in considering questions in the interest of this country. The hon. gentleman started out by condemning the route adopted by the government for this railway in the Yukon territory. First of all, he tells us that the Stikine is a shallow river; that it is not suitable for navigation; that there are impediments or obstructions to navigation in that river; that it is unsafe and dangerous. That may be all very true, but I claim to-night in discussing this particular question, however, it may be on other occasions, we all stand pretty nearly on an equality—the most that the majority of us know about this Yukon country is what we have gathered from reports, official and otherwise, which have come into our hands quite recently. I fancy that the hon. gentleman's means of getting information on this subject do not surpass mine. And in forming my conclusion, I am forced to accept the best authority available. I may be wrong in the statement which I am about to make, but if I am wrong I am subject to correction. I have been informed, within a very short time, since coming into this House to-day, that at the present time the gentlemen who control the great trans-continental highway of this country are engaged in constructing steamers to ply on the Stikine River for the purpose of transportation in connection with ocean boats plying between Vancouver and Wrangel. Then, I think I have another proof which will be accepted by this House. I have here before me a copy of the correspondence between the government and some gentlemen representing capitalists in this country and elsewhere, who made certain propositions to the government of Canada with regard to the construction of the road and opening up a means of ingress and egress to that country. First of all, I refer to an extract from a letter written to the Hon. Clifford Sifton, signed by J. Wesley Allison, in which that gentleman says, after referring to a road which he proposes to build by Skagway and Dyea and Lake Bennett:

> That your petitioners propose to immediately construct a wagon road from Glenora to the foot of Teslin Lake and to provide boats and barges for the navigation of Teslin Lake and the Hootalinqua, Lewes and Yukon Rivers, which your petitioners state is the only means of developing the country during the year 1898, and until such time as supplies for the construction of heavier works can be introduced into that country.

I am supposing that the gentleman who wrote that letter knew something of the navigation of the Stikine River and the route to which he referred. Further on I find, in a letter addressed to the Minister of the Interior by Maitland Kersey, representing a syndicate, making an offer for the construction of a railway from a point at or near Glenora on the Stikine River to a point at the head of Teslin Lake, an approximate distance of 150 miles in which that gentleman says:

> It is understood that the Government of Canada and the Government of British Columbia desire to develop at the earliest possible moment a British Columbia route between some point on the Pacific Coast and the territory known as the Yukon.
>
> It is believed that the earliest available route on the above lines is by means of the Stikine River from a point at or near Glenora to a point at the head of Teslin Lake, a distance of approximately 150 miles.
>
> With regard to the development of the waterways north of Teslin Lake, the proposal of the syndicate is to provide means of communication for the whole of the section of country from Teslin Lake to Fort Selkirk and Dawson City by means of the Hootalinqua and Lewes Rivers.
>
> It is proposed to provide all necessary means of water transportation by steamboats owned and sailing under the British flag on the rivers above mentioned, to provide trading posts, stores with miners' outfits, goods and supplies.
>
> In pursuance of its intentions, the syndicate has already secured wharf sites, timber and grazing lands at the head of Teslin Lake, and is at the present moment constructing steamboats, barges, small boats, a sawmill and other buildings on the spot, placing themselves, it is believed, in the position of being the only parties who, some two months before the navigation of the Yukon is open, will be capable of carrying passengers and stores into the Yukon territory by direct means of water transportation.
>
> As I advised you yesterday, we have a fleet of boats building on the coast, including two steamers and numerous small boats on Teslin Lake itself, the engines and boilers for these boats and a sawmill being sent in over the snow, and I have further a full equipment of men, sleighs, etc., under an experienced man who knows the trail, waiting in Victoria at the present moment for news to come of the taking of the ice on the Stikine River in order that they may proceed to open up the trail.

Now, if I am not very much mistaken, this is the route which is suggested by these gentlemen, and on which they are to-day, at a fearful cost, constructing steamers on Lake Teslin for the purpose of navigating that lake and Hootalinqua River. These men certainly know what they are doing, and yet we have hon. gentlemen standing up in parliament and telling us what they know about that route, that it is not navigable. I think I am safe in saying we had better accept the opinion of gentlemen who are investing their hard cash out there in preference to newspaper reports or reports put in circulation by people who have never been on the ground.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Those parties never saw that route.

Hon. Mr. KING—I have not read the whole correspondence; the hon. gentleman has it before him. I do not know how it is possible that they should be engaged in transporting material over the snow roads into Teslin Lake and building steamboats in that country without ever having seen the route.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—They say they went to Victoria to wait for the river to freeze.

Hon. Mr. KING—Hon. gentlemen in discussing this question usually discuss it from a Dawson City standpoint. Now, I am sure it would be out of place for me to call attention to the fact that Dawson City is at the extreme western end of the Yukon territory, about as near as it is possible to place it without being over the boundary line in the United States, yet it is a fact that, in discussing means for getting into that country, hon. gentlemen are continually talking about the best way of getting to Dawson City. Do hon. gentlemen not know that the Yukon territory extends from the northern boundary of British Columbia to Dawson City and even to the Arctic regions? I do not know at the present time that any great gold discoveries have been made in any district except in the vicinity of the Klondike and Dawson City. I was suprised the other day in listening to testimony given in a committee room in this House, to find that so far as is known at present the rich finds are confined to an area in that country of some 25 miles by 40. Now, hon. gentlemen, I have this to say with regard to the opening of that country, that unless profitable mines are to be discovered between the boundary of British Columbia following down the streams which this route takes to Dawson City—I say unless something is to be found on the rivers which converge at or near Fort Selkirk, or at the mouth of the Lewes River, I doubt very much whether the government will be warranted in making very large expenditures in developing that country at all. It may be said, however, that there are sufficiently good indications in that country to warrant the government in proceeding to make a large expenditure for the purpose of opening up that country. I must confess some six or eight weeks ago I was somewhat of that opinion myself. The longer I live, and the more I study the subject and the more information I get upon it, the more am I convinced that the government of Canada adopted a correct course in not attempting to expend a large amount of money for the purpose of constructing a railway into that country, I would not insult this honourable House by quoting from a book which I propose to quote to-night, if it were not a fact that the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Miller), who addressed this House on the subject so ably and so eloquently, took the liberty of quoting from it in the course of his speech. I am not going to weary this House with Prof. Ogilvie's reports of that country, but I ask the House to listen to a few extracts from this book. This is by Mr. Livernash, the correspondent of the New York Times, and the correspondent of the San Francisco Examiner. What does he say about that country? On page eleven you will find that Mr. Livernash, who is corroborated in his statement by the other gentlemen, Mr. Wills and Mr. Landreville, says this:

To be frank at the outset, scarcely anything is known of the vast region wherein Circle City and Dawson sit shivering. When anybody tells the boundaries of a so-called mineral belt there, it is safe to assume that he is guessing. Men have not been moving about in that savage realm long enough to know much definitely concerning the extent or value of the mineral deposits. The best that can be done is to lay before you more or less disconnected bits of information, springing, as a rule, from insufficient exploration, and to write in a big, bold hand across nearly all the map of the frozen northland this honest word: "Unknown." Consider how immense and well-nigh inaccessible Alaska and the Yukon district are, and that until last year only a few hundred miners were scattered in that great solitude.

And further on page 12:

In the Yukon district the precious metal has been found on Forty-mile creek, on the Chandindu River, on Moose-Hide Creek, on Deadwood Creek, on the Klondike River, on Dion Creek, on Bryant Creek, on Montana Creek, on Insley Creek, on the Indian River, on Sixty-mile Creek, on the Stewart River, on the Pelly River, on the Little Salmon River, on the Big Salmon River, on the Lewes River, on the Hootalinqua River, on the Liard River, on the Frances River, and on the Finlayson River. This last looks formidable; it does not follow, however, that these localities are much known, nor does it follow that the finding of gold in them should lead a government to presume richness or even value.

That is the testimony of Mr. Livernash. Then on page 34 Mr. Livernash says:

With regard to the extent of gold deposits it is very easy to fall into an exaggeration of the wealth of the Klondike. We know from experience the difficulty of gaining reliable information concerning the actual yield, and the probable extent of the unmined gold of the northern placers. One's first impressions are likely to be very wide of the truth, so prone are miners to talk loosely of their earnings and so loud is the clatter made by a few generously circulating gold-sacks in a small camp with few avenues for the expenditure of wealth. We can, therefore, readily understand how, without any intention, to put into his statements a bit of glitter that should not be there. Mr. Ogilvie went much astray in his early reports to the Minister of the Interior; and it is quite in keeping with the superior character of the gentleman that scarcely any of the matter contained in them has been reproduced in his recent work. Unfortunately for the Klondike, however, public opinion in the Dominion rests largely on those early reports, so far as relates to the wealth of claims.

I dare say hon. gentlemen have read this book. Is it worth while reading the whole book over?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is the best part of your speech.

Hon. Mr. KING—Then there is some sworn testimony. John McGillivray, in a solemn declaration, says:

There has been located in the Yukon district more than 3,000 claims—more than 250 miles of creeks; and a very small portion of the territory located—not more than fifty miles—is generally believed to be workable with profit by present methods and with present values, and by "generally believed," I mean generally believed by the miners of experience with whom I have spoken in this regard.

And Alex. Macdonald says:

So far as known to me, and I am familiar with said creeks, there are not on Bonanza, Eldorado and Hunker Creeks combined, more than twelve claims which have yielded an average of $35 per cubic yard of the dirt handled during the summer season of last past. This is on a basis of working a cut thirty feet wide, taking the very richest of the pay-streak. The pay-streak is narrow, and runs to colours or no colours before the rims are reached, even where the bottom from base to base of hill is less than 300 feet wide.

Prospects and "winter work" indicate that there are on said three creeks about thirty other claims which will yield an average of $35 per cubic yard of the dirt handled in a summer cut thirty feet wide in the richest portion of the deposit.

So far as known to me, after careful inquiry and prolonged travel and inspections, there are about 200 claims in said district which, in the absence of royalty, can be worked under existing conditions and yield expenses but nothing beyond with certainty, and which could be worked so as to yield fair profit with modification of burdensome conditions as to cost of supplies and absence of modern methods of mining.

There are other extracts, but I will not weary the House reading them. They are in the same strain, and in place of leading me to suppose that there is any positive certainty of making rich discoveries in that Yukon territory over and above what is known to exist within a radius of 50 or 60 miles from Dawson City, the country has no guarantee that gold is likely to be abundant as my hon. friend gave us to understand he believed it would be. One would suppose from the way hon. gentlemen have been discussing the Mackenzie & Mann contract, that they knew all that was in that country, that they themselves were perfectly cognizant of the fact that gold was to be found in abundance on the creeks up there. I think I am right in stating that probably neither one of these gentlemen was ever in that country. They have no more information than is before hon. gentlemen to-night, and I must conclude, therefore, that in undertaking the contract which is called for by this bill before the House to-night, they are simply taking their chances. I trust it may turn out to the advantages of Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, but to say that the government should speculate upon the chances of that country producing gold, I do not think the country would warrant it in taking such a course. That deep interest is being manifested by the people of Ontario and Quebec in that great north-western country, even from Montreal to the Pacific coast including Vancouver, I have no doubt; but let me tell this honourable House that there is a section of this Dominion of Canada which is not likely to receive very great benefits from the opening of that country, I care not how it turns out—at any rate not in the sense in which people in this part and the other parts of Canada are looking to that country. It is true that the people of the maritime provinces—and I do not speak of them farther than those I have had the honour of representing in times past—have an interest in the future of this country, and it is true that if Canada prospers directly it must lead to their prosperty, but they have not the same direct interest that the people further west have. They have an interest this far, in the fact that the government of this country have been able to find a portion of that great North-west which is able to take care of itself without imposing further burdens on the people of these older provinces. Again let me say that I think it is a mistaken notion on the part of any hon. gentleman, with the knowledge that we have of that country, to make up his mind that a very large population is going in to that country to remain there permanently—I mean to remain there any considerable length of time. We have had some experience in gold mining in this country before I have not had any personal experience, but I do know I am addressing hon. gentlemen to-night who understand the question to which I am referring better than I do myself. I refer to the excitement which took possession of this country from 1863 to 1868, with regard to the discovery in the Cariboo regions in British Columbia. I know that the local government of that province went to a large expense in constructing a wagon road into that district, and I dare say it was a proper expenditure on the part of that government, but I may fairly claim to-night that the discovery of gold in the Cariboo district was not such as to warrant this government, judging by the experience of that country in the past, in making large expenditures for the purpose of opening up the mining industry at this time. I believe in five years the business of placer mining died out in that district, and for years very little has been done in the way of placer mining in the Cariboo district. I had two brothers who spent five or six years of life in that country, and I know that is the history they gave me of it, that the people came out in 1867 and 1868, and have not gone back since, except to develop the quartz mines in that country. Then, again we are told in this Yukon country there are immense quartz deposits and that the government of Canada are very likely to derive large benefits from them. I would again call attention to Mr. Livernash's book. He is a good authority in this matter. With regard to quartz mining in that country, what does he say? On page 55, after refering to the cheap cost of mining in that country, he says:

> Until more is known of the Yukon country it will not be safe to say much as to auriferous quartz. Scarcely any prospecting for gold-bearing quartz has been done there, and there are not in the region more than a few miners who are qualified to prospect for such ore. It is true that quartz is scattered abundantly throughout those portions of the Yukon district which have been explored and along the Yukon River for a long distance after it enters Alaska; but this may or may not be significant; for, after all quartz is the commonest rock in the universe. However, in the Klondike and Indian divisions, along the Forty-mile, and in some other districts the quartz is elbowed by slaty rocks suggestive of precious metal, and the developments in Cordilleran belt are especially the quartz mining in British Columbia and along the Alaskan coast, are of a character inviting careful prospecting of the Yukon region. We do not mean to speak discouragingly of the outlook, but to place out testimony in opposition to the rumours which have represented much as known, whereas next to nothing is known.

So much with regard to the information which is in our possession up to the present time with regard to quartz mining in that country, Going back again to the route, let me say that I was never more surprised in my life in listening to the hon. gentleman from Westmoreland than I was at the attitude taken by that gentleman to-night with regard to the location of this railway into the Yukon territory. Why, hon. gentlemen is it not a fact—does not every hon. gentleman in this House to-night, within the sound of my voice, know that ever since confederation the policy, not of the Conservative party but the policy of all Canada, is to construct railways over Canadian territory in such a way as to make ourselves independent of our neighbours to the south of us.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. KING—Is it not a fact that Canada expended $40,000,000 to construct a railway via the north shore of New Brunswick in order to keep away from the United States frontier. Is it not a fact that our great transcontinental highway is carried away north of Lake Superior? And if the opinions had prevailed which have been put forward by the hon. gentlemen on the Conservative side, notably the hon. gentleman from Westmoreland, that road would have gone south of Lake Superior. But one of the strongest arguments used at that time was that we wanted to be independent of our neighbours to the south, and therefore we would incur the very heavy cost of carrying it round the north shore of Lake Superior, and we discovered, before it was finally completed, from a military standpoint at least the wisdom of constructing the road by that route, because it is a well known fact—and I am not going to charge anybody with having caused the rebellion in the North-west—we found it very convenient at the time of the rebellion to have a road round the north shore of Lake Superior, although not fully completed, for the purpose of transporting troops and munitions of war to quell that rebellion. Do we not know that prior to that, in the history of the country, when a rebellion took place in Manitoba we were refused permission to take troops through the Sault St. Marie Canal. Do we not know that Canada to-day has pursued the same course that she has been pursuing all along, at an expense of some million dollars—I do not know the amount but it is not small—on the construction of the Sault St. Marie Canal? I dare say if to-morrow Canada wanted to use the Sault St. Marie Canal for the passage of troops, the United States would concede it. And why? Because we are independent of them. And that is the policy which this country should follow in the construction of railways. I say the course laid down since confederation is the right and proper one for Canada to pursue in the future, and if to-day we are to have 50,000 or 100,000 men in that Yukon district, by all means give us the nearest approach by a Canadian route. I know that some hon. gentlemen say this is not a Canadian route. They say that we have no guarantee that we are going to be allowed to use that river. I say in the year following the Jubilee no greater insult was ever offered to Her Majesty, Queen Victoria, than to tell her in this House that the treaty rights secured to Canada by Her Majesty's government are going to be taken away from us by the Americans to the south of us without resistance on our part. I have more faith in Great Britain than that. I believe that the power that a few years ago made a demonstration such as no nation had ever before made upon the ocean, in regard to the fleet for the purpose of standing up for the rights of a few of her citizens in that far off country, Venezuela, will be at our back to secure our rights on the Stikine, which rights were secured to us by treaty, not between Canada and the United States, but between Great Britain and the United States. If you want to be independent of the United States provide your own means of ingress and egress in that country. If you want the means of carrying troops and munitions of war to that country, provide your own route and pay for it. I have not a doubt that if we secured the route to the Yukon on Canadian territory we will never be deprived of the bonding system from Dyea across American territory. I am quite satisfied that the feeling which exists regarding that country will be so strong as to compel the Washington authorities to make an attempt to deprive us of the bonding privileges in that strip of territory. I for one do not want the government to place us in the humiliating position we would be in if the scheme proposed by the hon. gentleman who has preceded me were adopted and I am surprised at any members belonging to the Conservative party stooping—no I will not say stooping—but so far forgetting the history and record of their party in this country as to advocate any such scheme. The hon. senator from Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) devoted some considerable time in his closing remarks to informing this House that the road that these contractors are authorized and empowered to construct in that country is going to be one that will pay immense profits. But the hon. gentleman must know—I am sure he would not disguise the fact—that there are other companies to-day who are in possession of charters and who have a perfect right to go on and construct roads into that Yukon country across United States and Canadian territory. There is nothing to prevent any company in Canada or the United States or Great Britain, from investing capital in a road across from Dyea to the Lewes River, or Hootalinqua, a distance of 225 miles and the hon. gentleman would have us believe there were millions in it for these contractors. Does the hon. gentleman suppose that if there are millions in it, that the gentlemen who are so anxious to get to that country are not possessed of business tact and knowledge to induce them to adopt that route, and if the advantages are as great as he points out to-night, there is more money, according to his showing, in a road from Lynn Canal into Lewes or Yukon than than there is in the other road. Does anybody pretend to say we are going to be tied up for all time to this one road from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake? I do not believe a word of it.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—If my hon. friend will allow me, there are, it is true, two charters to two different companies from the head of Lynn Canal, not to a point on the Yukon River below Five Finger Rapids, but to some point below Lake Bennett, one the British Yukon Company and the other the Yukon Company. One of the roads goes over the White Pass, and the other by the Taku Inlet, and so far as surveys have been made on that route, I believe they are both impracticable.

Hon. Mr. KING—I am surprised at these gentlemen coming and asking for charters which are impracticable.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—And so far as the advantages of the routes go, they would have very little advantage over the route proposed.

Hon. Mr. KING—Let me tell the hon. gentleman that if his predictions are true with regard to the paying qualities of the 150 miles of road between Glenora and Teslin Lake in the near future, he need not have any doubt that before a year expires, so soon as it will be demonstrated to the capitalists of this country, we will have the route established which we are all anxious to have, the route from Edmonton to the Yukon, the route which I approve of above all others, the route which I would give my vote for to-night, if it were practicable. But we must not lose sight of the fact that the Yukon country is not situated like some other countries. The Yukon is right alongside of Alaska. The hon. gentleman from Westmoreland says we should be satisfied with a waggon road. The hon. gentleman from Shell River says. Open up a trail from Edmonton to Peace River by the troops and then on to that country. That is not what we want. We want some other means of getting in to the Yukon. We have no guarantee that we are going to have law and order maintained in that country, unless provision is made by which the miners and the aliens who are there are convinced of the fact that we have a way of sending troops and police into that country. Show these men—aliens nine-tenths of them or seventy-five per cent of them—that the people of this country are prepared, by opening up a way for the transportation of troops into that region, to nip in the bud any disturbance there may be in the country and then you have accomplished all. You can keep the peace. But hon. gentlemen if you attempt to govern that country without a ready means of going into it, the moment the population of that country discovers that you are at their mercy, that moment will they take advantage of the government of this country. And then I venture to say that this chamber would resound with harangues, each an hour long, if the government were not to attempt to get means of access to that country at the earliest possible moment.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Can troops go in by the Stikine River now?

Hon. Mr. KING—I do not know; I am not a lawyer. I have not heard anybody say that civilians could not go in by the Stikine River, nor do I think the gentleman who moved the six months' hoist will dare to rise in his place and say that under the treaty between Great Britain and the United States, civilians will be prevented from going up the Stikine River. I do not think that he will dare to rise from his seat and say that food for troops will be prevented from going in by that route.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD—I say troops cannot go in.

Hon. Mr. KING—The government provides that they shall start at an ocean port, and go through the 200 miles up to the end of the road at Glenora, and we will not be so far off that road at all. Then, hon. gentlemen, reference has been made to the Yukon navigation. I know we have by treaty the same rights on the Yukon River that we have on the Stikine, but do you forget that for a thousand miles, at all events, it passes through foreign territory?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Fifteen hundred miles.

Hon. Mr. KING—And do hon. gentlemen forget where the outlet of that river is? We may have faith to believe that, so far as our American neighbours are concerned, we are safe; there is a good feeling, and I am glad of it, existing between Great Britain and the United States and long may that feeling continue, but do you know this, that in approaching the Yukon River you are treading closely upon Russian territory?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—With the Behring Sea between.

Hon. Mr. KING—And you have not a British port nearer to the mouth of the Yukon than Port Simpson, and you are at the mercy, in case of difficulty, of one or two powers. That is a point worth considering. This has just occurred to me since I got on my feet, but still I think that that point is well taken. We have had trouble enough in Behring Sea before with Russia and the United States, and we might have trouble in Behring Sea again, and for my part, I approve of a policy, hon. gentlemen, which, first of all, will make Canada independent of every other nation, which will keep Canada for the Canadians. I was going to remark, "How have the mighty fallen?" For the eighteen years I have been in politics, I have heard the cry from the mouths of the Conservative party, "Canada for the Canadians." It has been the watchword of the party, the cry to which, I believe, they owed their eighteen years' possession of power, and to-day they are prepared, as a party, to abandon that cry and say, "Canada for the Americans." Why, sir, I would not be surprised if this vote were taken to-night in this chamber that, at the telegraph offices in San Francisco and Seattle, there are gentlemen waiting for a despatch from Mr. Livernash, to say that the Senate of Canada had decided upon a United States route in preference to an all-Canadian route. I have taken up more time than I intended, and I thank you for the great attention that you have given me. I hope I have not said anything which will tend to grate on the feelings of any hon. member. When I do speak, I believe in saying what I mean; and, when anyone replies, I am willing to accord him the same privilege.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—It is only from a sense of duty that I rise to-night at this very late hour to offer a few remarks to this House upon the question which has been very long before the parliament and this country. I am only a farmer, but I will venture to say the task I have undertaken now, of saying anything new on the question now before this House, would tax the ingenuity of the greatest lawyer in Canada. This question has been argued from every possible standpoint, not only in the other House, but already in the Senate and in these newspapers. So much has been said that almost every ragamuffin on the street could dance to the tune of the Klondike railway bill. I am not in the habit of speaking in this House. I have been content, on most subjects, to give a silent vote. I do not trespass on the indulgenge of hon. members very frequently, but, coming as I do from that western portion of Canada, that is, perhaps, more interested in this bill than any other portion of the Dominion, I feel I can justly claim the indulgence of this House for a few minutes. A great deal of advice has been tendered to this hon. Senate. We have been directed and told how we should vote upon this question, and have also been told what consequences would follow if we did not happen to vote in a certain direction. I may say, so far as I am concerned, I have not been approached by any man, by word deed or insinuation, no one as asked me to vote against this bill, nor as any one interested in the bill asked me to vote for it. I say it with considerable pride, I have not been lobbied—as I have heard some hon. gentleman say there has been lobbying going on—I come here knowing the responsibility that rests upon me as a senator of the Dominion of Canada. When I took a seat in this chamber I made up my mind that I occupied a different position to that which I had occupied in the other House where I served a couple of sessions. In coming here, strong as my political proclivities might be on some questions, I have always determined to do my duty honourably, fairly, and justly in the interest of the country that I am here to represent. On every question that has come before this House I have given a fair and impartial vote. I have voted against the Conservative party, strong as I was in favour of their general policy, and I have made a record that very few reform members can equal in this House. When I come here and a government bill is introduced into this House I make up my mind to give a fair and impartial vote upon it.

That is my duty to myself and to the people I represent, and I would be unworthy of my position in this House if I did otherwise. I put off all my inclinations and vote for the bill on its merits. My hon. friend here (Sir Frank Smith) yesterday put very great emphasis on the fact that a majority of 39 hon. members in the other House had voted for this bill, and it would be a very great wrong and great responsibility for us to undertake to thwart the vote of those hon. gentlemen. If we are here merely to ratify the decisions of the majority in the lower House, then the sooner we are abolished and sent to our homes the better. We are here to vote regardless of how they vote in the other House, to vote conscientiously as an impartial tribunal. Judging by what many of their papers say, it would seem that they think the country is owned by them. But this is the people's country, and we have upon us the greatest responsibility that falls upon any men to vote in a fair and impartial and honourable manner, and so long as I have my judgment and health and strength and senses I shall endeavour to do it in that way, regardless of all threats, fear or other influence. My hon. friend spoke about the influence the majority of 39 had on him. He has already forgotten acts that happened not very long ago. I quite understand that some men's memories fail them once in a while. I remember a few years ago a Combine Bill passed the other House. The hon. gentleman then had not the same respect for the majority that he has on this occasion. He voted in opposition to the wish of the popular branch, as it is sometimes called, and supported a measure that was not in the interests of the country. Every one knows there is nothing so unpopular as these monopolies or combines established in this country. Now, my hon. friend from King's, Prince Edward Island, last night made a statement which I endorse, but he did not qualify it to the full extent that I desire to qualify it. He said that he was prepared to give the benefit of doubt to the government, a sentiment which I endorse to the very letter. I should be justified in taking the word of the government, because it is well known that the government has chances and opportunities of acquiring information that no private member possesses, but I regret to say that it is a very difficult task for a private member to get information from any of the departments. It is regarded as a sin involving beheading for any civil servant to furnish information from any of the departments. If I ask a civil servant for information he will tell me to move an address for papers. I come to the Senate and do that, and then have to wait for weeks for the return—a return which could be brought down in an hour and a-half if the government would take the trouble to supply it. I have begged and coaxed and done everything within the power of a private member to get that information, and yet for six weeks I have been waiting for it and have not got it yet. How then can we be expected to vote for a measure concerning which the government refuse to give us information? I could go home and defend my conduct before the people of the Northwest, if they took me to task for voting in a certain way, by saying that the government told me that so and so was the case, and that I acted upon their statement. But in order to do that I must have implicit confidence in the men who tell me, on their honour, that such and such is the case. But I must look at the record of a man before I give him my confidence. If he is in the habit of deceiving me and failing to carry out his pledges, I have no right to attach any importance to his word. Therefore, I say, I am not at liberty to take the assertion of the hon. gentleman opposite when he said, in the early part of the session, "If you only knew what we know you would vote for this bill—if you poor ignorant creatures only knew what we know you would give us your support." Here, to-night, the hon. gentleman has been reading extracts from papers and letters that he got two or three days ago; had they been given to the House long ago we might have been in a position to cast an intelligent vote on this measure. When the hon. member tells us that if we knew what he knows we should vote for this bill, what right have I to accept his assurance? He is one of the few men in the government that the country regards as an upright and honest man, but to my mind he is like the man who has a reputation for early rising—he can sleep till noon. My desire would be to take the word of the government and vote for the measure, but what right have I to place any reliance in the statements of men who have violated all their pledges. Look at their programme when in opposition—their prohibition policy—how they have humbugged the country on that question. They preached prohibition and yet they have been granting permits for the sale of liquor in the Yukon until every second house in the Klondike is a rum shop. I am told that whiskey is as free as water in that region, and sometimes freer. We know what their pledges were on trade questions: have they carried them out? I challenge them to mention one pledge that they made in opposition which they have redeemed in office, yet they say to us "if you knew what we know you would vote for this bill." I want some better ground for supporting a measure which, on the farce of it, is objectionable. I am opposed to one feature of this bill which has not yet been referred to, I am not going to speak about the Stikine route, I know nothing about it, and I venture to say that nine-tenths of those who have spoken on the subject know as little as I do. If I had not been opposed to the bill before this debate began, the speech of my hon. friend from New Brunswick (Mr. King) would have convinced me, so would the speech of the hon. Secretary of State, and, above all, the speech of the hon. senator from Toronto, (Sir Frank Smith). I can hardly contain the convictions that have been forced upon me by these gentlemen. They have failed to advance one solitary argument in favour of this measure—and the government in giving this company so much land and spending so much money.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no money involved.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—No money involved, when you are maintaining Commissioner Walsh and purchasing 13,000 lbs. of beef at a dollar a pound?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That was for the starving miners. Mr. Walsh had abundant provisions for himself.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—How does the hon. gentleman know that the beef was bought for starving miners?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The reports that came through were that persons coming out from Dawson relied on the police to feed them as they went by. Major Walsh had ample provisions for more than six months ahead.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Why do you not bring down those reports?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I see them in the newspapers. I get them just the way the hon. gentleman gets them.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Only the other day the hon. member, in replying to a remark from me based on some newspaper talk, told us that he did not waste time in reading the newspapers. As a business man I regret to say that this government contains no business men. It is a government of lawyers. Now, I give a lawyer all the credit he is entitled to, but a lawyer is not the greatest man in Canada. I am prepared to award to these gentlemen all they are entitled to, but when you have a government composed, as the present one is, of a large number of lawyers, who are the most unreasonable and inexperienced men in the country to do business with, and the last men you would trust to carry through a commercial and financial transaction—because a lawyer wants the whole thing himself—you might expect just such a measure as this. I am opposed to the bill on the ground that there is no precedent for such legislation in the history of the world. It differs from any charter ever asked for in parliament to my knowledge. It is chartering a company which may build a line from the tropics to the Artic circle. It is what you might expect from a government who know nothing about the subject. The Minister's own argument in defence of the bill is that they do not know the first thing about it. The Secretary of State says that the country north of Glenora is no good, and that Yankee fellow the other day said that there was only 80,000 acres of land in the Yukon country on which gold has been discovered yet. Here, without any knowledge of the country, with undue haste, without calling for tenders contrary to every precedent—contrary to the principle which hon. gentlemen opposite advocated in opposition about letting contracts—they give a contract to Mackenzie & Mann to build a railway beginning nowhere and ending nowhere, and which leaves us at the mercy of the United States if we wish to take armed forces into that country.

The railway terminates 300 miles from Dawson on a river difficult of navigation during the short season when it is open, as we learn from the newspapers, and that is the only way we can get information about that country. I say they are humbugging us and humbugging the country. I am opposed to this railway being built at all. I do not think it should be built at the present time, even by the Edmonton route. No country ever undertook to build a road without knowing the first thing of the character of the country through which it was to pass and the difficulties to be encountered. The book published by that Yankee, from which the hon. gentleman quotes, does not give a very flattering description of that region. He speaks of the frost being several feet deep in the ground, and he describes the difficulty of striking pay dirt. These are facts which are not denied. The government themselves have very little to say in favour of that distant country, and they speak of Mackenzie and Mann as though they were philanthropists going in there to build a great railway for which they are to get practically nothing. The country is yet undeveloped; in course of time it may be more populous, but that time has not yet arrived, and it is premature to undertake the construction of a railway under the circumstances. When a member of the government said in the other House that it was a huge gamble he described it correctly. I was surprised to hear hon. gentlemen opposite say that this company would make its money out of the poor confiding Englishmen who would advance money for the construction of the road. Such a policy is enough to ruin the financial standing of the country. Nine-tenths of the people in the Klondike region are aliens, and if a railway is wanted for their accommodation there are three projects ready to be promoted without giving a monopoly to this company. There are thousands of settlers in our north-west who have been waiting for years for railway facilities which the government have not felt themselves in a position to furnish, yet we are asked to subsidize a company to build a road into the Klondike where very few people live and where most of those who are there are aliens. There in the North-west Territories the settlers are hanging on by the eyelids in the hope that the government would see that a railway was built to that country, but you cannot get it. They know that it is a magnificent country and a country which will produce millions upon millions of bushels of wheat, and afford traffic for a railway. There is a chance for us to spend money in the development of the country, where we have hundreds and thousands of good honest settlers, and not ninety per cent aliens. There they are with their wives and families suffering with privations of pioneer life. It would make you heart bleed if you went to that country and saw those people suffering as I have, and I have raised my voice in the House in advocacy of the policy of making the government complete the lines of railway, but there is no effort to have them completed. They look with a coldness equal to an iceberg upon the hardships and privations of these people, while away in the Klondike they want to build a railroad and charge the country with it for the benefit of a small population most of whom are aliens. They say it does not cost anything, but that is a blind. They are advertising to the world that this railway is to be built, and if men go there it will be because of the false advertisements which attracts them. It was a violation of every principle of responsible government to seal a contract and act as the government did, and there was no justification whatever for it. They have sent their agent, Mr. Ogilvie, across to the old country where he is lecturing, and he is booming the company with a view of making the stock sell better, so that they will raise lots of money. No wonder it is called a gamble. It is worse than a gamble, because fraud added to a gamble makes the gamble still worse. I think it is a complete fraud upon the honesty, integrity and faith of the country, because, while every citizen should have faith in the government, and when the government announce to the world that they are doing something which they are not doing, I say it is worse than a crime—it is a trick, an insult, and an injury to the credit and intelligence of the people of Canada. I suppose the word trick is hardly parliamentary, I will say an act.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Oh, the expression is mild.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I challenge any member of the governmnet to contradict one word I have said about the violation of the promises they made when in opposition. I have heard the Prime Minister—whom I have always spoken of in the highest terms—denounce the national policy, and the big member for Guysborough says it is not a national policy, it is a national poultice, drawing the money out of the people's pockets, and ever since that memorable expression, they have styled him the big poultice. The people believed him and thought he was telling the truth. But if they were to appeal to that western country to-day, they would find a different feeling altogether. They may humbug them while they are in power, but the day of resurrection is coming and the judgment is upon them, and the word will be to them, "Depart, I know ye not." I am opposed to this railway. Hon. gentlemen have heard this matter fully discussed. Common sense is the gauge that guides a man in the successful performance of any kind of work. In proportion as he has common sense, he will be successful, and I say that the common sense of any man will tell him that it is a most preposterous, outrageous and unjustifiable thing to undertake to build a railway, starting at the interior of a country where it will cost a man his life and fortune to get to one end of it, or cost his life and fortune to get from there to the other end of it. I am not going into the details of it, because I have no desire to repeat arguments which have been advanced so many times. We have the Northwest Central Railway going through one of the finest countries in the world. It is projected 50 miles and it goes by the very door of the member of East Assinaboia in the other House, and that railway is not being pushed forward. Hundreds of honest, loyal Canadians are living there in the hope that it will be built, but the government is not granting aid. I venture to say there are ten times as many people living on those railroads, Canadians with their wives and families and with all their machinery to work, as there are in the Klondike, but the government does not know them, and does not care a snap about them. When my hon. friend speaks about these miners going back into Assiniboia and Western Canada to farm, it shows the very vague and imperfect idea he has both of the character of the miners and the character of the country. The hon. gentleman told us that the other day in describing the way to get into this Yukon country, and he thought if it was a great argument in support of his side of the question. But he did not do it fairly. I tell him in unmistakable language that he did not do it fairly, because he started at Winnipeg, and told you that it was 1,000 miles from Winnipeg to Calgary. He might as well start at South Africa and he would have made the distance a little longer. He might as well have started at Halifax and gone three times round Prince Edward Island and he would have had the distance a little longer. Winnipeg has no more to do with it than the man in the moon. If he had started at Calgary and told you that you had to pay for the heavy haul on the Rocky Mountains and then round up to the Klondike, putting that as one route and comparing it with the Edmonton route it would have been an honest comparison, but he could not start at Calgary, because his disposition was to mislead the people and he had to start at Winnipeg and say it was a thousand miles, while it was less than nine hundred. At the present time I am not in favour of a railway. I say it is premature, and I will stake my reputation, as a man of common sense, as a man living in the country, as a man who knows something of what he is talking about, that if you cannot complete it all the way, it is premature. I say this tramway is a humbug and a piece of bosh. It is not worthy of the name, and I am surprised hon. gentlemen would think about calling it a railway. It is only a narrow gauge road, and will be no use when it is built. What I would propose would be to build a wagon road for the time being, starting at Edmonton. The road is partly built, and we have long water stretches along that line which would make it easy of construction, and render it easy to get into that country. We would then have an all-Canadian route, and we would not be troubled with all these perplexing questions that may lead to trouble between United States and Great Britain by some rash man violating the law or doing something wrong. They may incur that disadvantage and misfortune to the empire. In this way they would have no difficulty of that kind whatever. I hold in my hand a map on which I can show you the proper route. I have made a few notes as to the distances because they are difficult to remember, and I will mention them :—

—	Miles.	Miles.	Miles.
Wagon road now in use Edmonton to Peace River	260
Steam navigation on Peace River to Fort St. John		140
Wagon road St. John to Forks of Nelson			150
Steam navigation down Nelson and up Liard to foot of rapids		135
Wagon road around rapids on Liard			35
Steam navigation on Liard through Rockey mountain to foot of Brulé portage		40
Wagon road foot of Brulé portage to head of Cramberry portage			15
Navigation head of Cramberry portage to Frances Lake		175
Wagon road Francis Lake to Pelly River			50
Totals	260	490	250
Grand total	1000 Miles.

And when that is reached you are at the head of all routes.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—How many transhipments ?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Two or three. You can take your load off the wagon and put it on the boat. I would advocate the opening up of a good wagon road by which people could go in there. My hon. friend from Shell River (Mr. Boulton), said that if he had a letter of credit from the Hudson's Bay Company, he could go in there in six weeks. If a wagon road were built in there, you would have the means of transportation and after the country is developed if the circumstances of the case warranted it, the government could build a proper road. I was the representative of the territories at the World's Fair, and I can tell hon. gentlemen that we had the finest of wheat exhibited there which was grown upon the Peace River, some five or six hundred milees north of Edmonton. There is good forage there for horses, and there are many advantages near the head waters of those rivers. It is said the sources of those rivers abound with gold, and that the gold is not all in the Klondike region. I saw a letter in the press the other day, written at Prince Albert, stating that there were large quantities of gold found on these rivers, in fact all the line I am speaking of gold is found. By means of the wagon road you would develop that country, you would open up an agricultural country, where, if the miner was dissatisfied or had made his pile, he could locate on a farm. That would be possible on this route but not on the other route. It is said that ninety per cent of these men who go to the Yukon will be aliens. They are coming to the country to take the wealth away, and all the country receives from them is what they pay for supplies ; but the men, as a rule, who come by the Pacific routes buy United States goods at San Francisco, Seattle and Washington, and different points along the line. All the provisions they require are supplied by the United States already. We may possibly, on our side of the mountains, compete with these men in our produce—beef, pork, mutton, eggs and butter—that miners require in order to supply them with food. But by this Stikine route all supplies would have to be hauled across the Rocky Mountains and up that difficult road to get into the Klondike, and no wonder it costs ten dollars a hundred to obtain it up there. We cannot compete for that trade. We cannot compete for the supplies that are going into that country, because the Americans have the advantage of us in their better means of transportation. They are nearer the waterway. Hon. gentlemen heard Mr. Thompson tell the committee on the Ottawa Canal the other day about the contrast between the railways and waterways as to the cost of carrying goods. That gentleman was a Yankee, but a fair man, and gave a good illustration of the difference between the two ways of transporting freight. I say it is a mistaken idea for any government to undertake to say that high and extravagant rates will pay for the building of a railroad. Nothing will retard the progress and development of any country like excessive charges of transportation in and out of that country. I live at Wolseley, 300 miles west of Winnipeg, on the Canadian Pacific Railway. If the government of Canada would give me the whole municipality of Wolseley and give me no railroad, I would not take it. It would not be worth a ha'penny ; and if the railroad were built and no settlers there, the railroad would not be worth a ha'penny, and I say it is proper and right for the government to subsidize a railroad into such a country in order to get it built. Then, it is right again to see that the freight rates are not exhorbitant, or extravagant, or burdensome on the people who are in that country. It is a mistaken policy to allow heavy charges for freight, and if you desire to make a country prosperous you must make transportation as low as possible, thus encouraging the men to go in there. He will have some heart to go to work and develop the country But as to this Yukon district, not one man in 10,000 in Canada, I was going to say, who will go into that country will make more than he will take in if extravagant charges are allowed on transportatiun. There was an argument the other day about rich gentlemen going into that country. We do not want any rich silk-gloved men in that country. We want the workingman. I say the policy of the government, if they are going to build a railway there, for the first five or six years after that railway is opened should be to allow only the lowest rates to be charged, even if the government have to give a premium to the railway company to take supplies in for the people into that country. Then in a few years the increased business consequent upon so many people going into the country will ten times over pay the loss in the first place. That is a sound and honest and businesslike principle. If you undertake to handicap any businesslike principle. If you undertake to handicap any business on the start, you kill it. You could not build a factory or an industry if you worked on the financial basis, that the company had to pay up the dividends, pay for the work and pay everything out of the profits on the start. When the government build a railway into that country, I would like not only to see them give them a proper subsidy but to see the government have some officer to see that it shall be properly built and to fix the rate. What do you find in the contract? I remember when the Canadian Pacific Railway was built Sir Wilfrid Laurier said that if the government had taken the advice of Mr. Blake they would have had a fixed rate upon that railway above which the company could not have gone, and then they would have had a living rate. And what has happened in this case? They do not profit by the experience of their predecessors. I do not blame a man for making a blunder at first, but when he sees other people blundering and observes the effect of it, he should be able to avoid that blunder himself. The hon. gentleman made that statement in my hearing, but in the face of that the government have gone on and given these men just such a monopoly they have everlastingly been finding fault with the Conservatives for giving. They give a monopoly for five years, and give them an extravagant rate for it, because in five years there will be 25 per cent taken off, and in another five years there will be another 25 per cent taken off which will make 50 per cent of a reduction. I think, therefore, that the rate in the first place must be too high. The rate should be reasonable at the start and the government should, if necessary, pay a bonus to the company, until the country is settled enough, to make the operation of the line profitable. It is not good policy to undertake to build a railroad and expect the poor man going into that country to have the last dollar extorted from him in order to pay for its construction, while the customs derives a revenue from him. It is a policy which will cause great injury to the development of the country.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—Will the hon. gentleman tell us where the government are to get the money?

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—The hon. gentleman ought to be able to solve that question himself. He has solved more difficult problems in his life. One of the great arguments in supporting this measure is that the road will afford a market for our people, but if that is the most important object, the Edmonton route would serve the purposes of Canada better. It would afford a market for the settlers in the North-west as well as for the manufacturers in eastern Canada, so that the benefits of the work would be distributed over the whole Dominion; but building it from the Stikine would give the bulk of the traffic to the United States, and Canada will be the poorer by the amount of gold taken out of the country. I am going to vote against the bill. I am not lacking in courage in some directions, but I would not have the courage to go back and face an indignant people if I voted for this measure. Since it was made public, I have received many letters from people in the North-west, not one of them in favour of the bill. If the government could read the writing on the wall, they would see that their fate would be sealed by the passage of this bill, and the Senate will do them the best possible service by throwing it out. When the time comes when a railroad will be required, something will be known of the best route by which to build it. There is room for two lines into that country, one through the great mineral district north of Kootenay, and the other through the prairie country. Throughout this whole affair the government have shown undue haste. It is simply an outrage on the public to dispose of dredging licenses as they have been disposed of. No wonder the ministers call this a huge gamble—they have sold dredging licenses to speculators so that if a poor man goes into that country and happens to locate a claim on a paying sand bar, he will find the heirs of Mercier, or some other clique, seeking possession of it. In the eyes of the people of Canada to-day the government stand condemned; they have spun the rope that will be placed in the executioners hands at the next election. Their days are numbered. As the judge metes out the days of mercy to a condemned criminal, so the days of this government are numbered by the number of days between now and the next election. By not fulfilling their promises to the electors on the tariff they have woven one strand in the rope; the Drummond County deal is the second strand, and this Yukon transaction is the third strand, and I tell you they have woven a rope so strong for their own execution that it will not break.

Hon. Mr. FISET moved the adjournment of the Debate.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to ask the leader of the House when he expects this debate will close? I ask the question in order that members may govern themselves accordingly.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am unable to say how long the debate will last. I understand a number of members desire to speak yet. The hon. gentleman knows the progress we are making, and I am satisfied that the debate cannot come to an end before Tuesday next. My hon. friend ought to know more about the matter than I do, but that is my impression from what I see and can learn.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If I could have my way the vote would be taken to-morrow night, but I am not better acquainted with the feelings of members supporting the government than the hon. gentleman himself is. How long he or his friends might desire to occupy the time of the Senate is, of course, better known to him than it can possibly be to me. This I can say, those who will vote for the amendment are ready whenever the leader of the House is inclined to call for a division to cast their votes.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—Is it proper for a member to pair?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I understand that my hon. friend is ill and would like to leave; certainly he can pair.

Hon. Sir FRANK SMITH—I mean for the vote. I do not want to shirk the vote, and, if necessary, I will come back if I am able to get here.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If a member wishes to leave for any reason, and can get a pair, it is considered the same as if he had remained to cast his vote. My hon. friend, I understand, has arranged a pair with Mr. Ferguson.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—There is no doubt about the right of a member to pair. We had an illustration when the vote on the Drummond Railway Bill was taken last year. An hon. gentleman opposite came across the floor to me and asked if I would pair with him, and I did so.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Friday, 25th March, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'Clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT.

FIRST REPORT ADOPTED.

Hon. Sir JOHN CARLING, from the Joint Committee on Printing of Parliament, presented the first report and moved its adoption.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not rise for the purpose of opposing the motion of the hon. chairman of the committee, but the uniform practice with these reports is that we have waited till the House of Commons has adopted them. I think there is some recommendation with reference to an expenditure and we should await the action of the other House on the report.

The motion was agreed to.

THE SONGHEE INDIAN RESERVE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLEMAN moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, copies of all correspondence between Mr. J. A. J. McKenna, the representative of the Department of the Interior, and any member of the British Columbia government in respect to the proposed removal of the Indians from the Songhee Reserve in the city of Victoria, British Columbia.

He said:—I do not think the motion requires any remarks on my part further than, for the information of the House, I might say that the Songhee Indian reserve is situated in the centre of the city of Victoria, that communication has been held between the local and federal governments with reference to removing those Indians out of the city. The people of the city of Victoria are very anxious that they should be removed, but for some reason or other, negotiations thus far have not met with success, and we in British Columbia would like to know whether it is due to the grasping policy of this government, or the policy of the government in British Columbia. It is a scandal and a disgrace to have an Indian reserve of over 100 acres on which there are 100 Indians situated almost in the centre of a city like Victoria.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I am very glad the hon. gentleman has brought this matter before the House. We have been struggling with this matter of the Songhee reserve for the last 20 years and have failed so far to accomplish anything. It seems the Indians have rights which cannot be controlled without their consent, but the hon. gentleman is a new broom and I wish him all success in the matter and hope that he will stick to it till it comes to something.

The motion was agreed to.

CONTRACT OF TIGNISH BREAKWATER.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE inquired—

1. Is the work on a contract assigned to J. H. Myrick & Co. on Tignish breakwater being proceeded with.
2. Has an inspector for this work been appointed.
3. If not, why not.

He said:—I may say that I have it from a very reliable source that work under this contract has been commenced and proceeded with to a very considerable extent already, and up to the present time there is no inspector looking after the work. As it is a work exposed to the action of the sea, it is of the utmost importance that it should be proceeded with at once.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I may say, in reply to the hon. member, as to his first question, that the contract with J. H. Myrick & Co. was returned duly signed to the department on the 8th instant, and preparations are being made by them to proceed with the work. To the second question I may say that no inspector has yet been appointed; to the third, that the inspector is generally appointed by the department when the actual work on the ground has been commenced.

DISMISSALS OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES.

RETURNS LAID ON THE TABLE.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT laid on the table of the House returns in connection with dismissals.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is not the whole of the returns called for?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is one more to come. This is the return from the Post Office Department.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—God help the poor officials.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You can understand the cost of making up the return.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is sometimes necessary, in order to expose the iniquities of the government, to get returns printed, even if they do cost something.

THE YUKON RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The Order of the Day being read,—

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the second reading (Bill 6) an Act to confirm an agreement between Her Majesty and William Mackenzie and Donald D. Mann, and to incorporate the Canadian Yukon Railway Company; and the motion in amendment of the Honourable Mr. Macdonald (B.C.), that the said bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months.—(Hon. Mr. Fiset.)

Hon. Mr. DEVER said: I find that the hon. gentleman from Rimouski moved the adjournment of the debate, not for himself, but for another member, and as that hon. gentleman is not disposed to speak to-day, I wish to say a few words on the subject before the House. In doing so, I intend, as preliminary to what I have to say on the main question, to address myself to some of those who have preceded me. First I shall address myself to the hon. member from Shell River (Mr. Boulton) I apologize to that hon. gentleman if I in any way interjected anything that was offensive to him. I have always found him a man who was entitled to respect in this House, a gentleman who is anxious to perform his duty as a senator, who is an agreeable speaker, and always ready to present public questions before this House in a manner attractive and becoming to one on whom we look as a man of refinement and education. Saying this for the hon. gentleman, and much more that I would wish to say, I must beg his pardon and tell him that when he comes to the philosophy of finance, unfortunately his propositions never satisfy my views. I may be wrong, and I dare say it is my fault, but at all events some of his propositions last night did not meet my approbation when he seemed to argue that, because gentlemen sought a charter from the government to go on with a work they had no right to have power to issue bonds for more than the work might be worth. Now, the view I take of a charter of that description, especially in the case of Mr. Mackenzie which he instanced, the Toronto Tramway Company, I could not perceive why they should not have a right to issue bonds for any amount on the security of their charter. That did not compel applicants to give their price. Their bonds were like greenbacks, liable to fluctuation, and fluctuating until they reached a level of what was a bona fide gold basis. Therefore, I cannot conceive what injustice or wrong-doing any gentleman might be guilty of in issuing promises to pay for certain amounts when it was optional for parties to purchase or decline to purchase as they thought proper.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The hon. gentleman should realize that the power to issue stocks and bonds is the power to tax the people.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—No doubt of that, but the people need not be taxed—they need not own the bonds. We have no right to restrict a commodity which is merchandise in the market, especially we who claim to be free traders. At all events, that is the view I take of it, and I trust in taking this view I may not be considered anxious to be at issue with the hon. gentleman; but I thought it my duty to interrupt him to explain the view I took of his philosophy in finance. The next friend, to whom I shall offer a few remarks, is my honoured friend from the woolly west (Mr. Perley). We all know that the hon. gentleman is blessed with great physical force and mental power, and when he gets his angry passions up he feels irresistible. I have pride in him for many reasons. I have pride in him especially because he was a New Brunswick boy. We have all read of the great Buffalo Bill. I have myself stood at the street corners in silent wonder at the evolutions of that wonderful performer. We have read about it in the papers and the youngsters were all anxious to see the show; but may I tell you hon. gentleman, I was more pleased and I think better satisfied at that grand performance which was put on our boards last night by the hon. gentleman from Wolseley than I ever was before. Coming down to the financial part of that hon. gentleman's statement, that he could build wagon roads into the Yukon country 1,000 miles long, and two extensive railways, wholly independent of the railway that is under discussion, I may say he lacked one important particular, and that was how he could raise the money for these great undertakings. His imagination was grand, he could conceive a road here, a road there, and a wagon road 1,000 miles in length yonder —but there is no bank account forthcoming; and he refused to endorse the only road that is adopted by the government of Canada, who are charged with the affairs of this country, and in a position to say that it is the only road that can be built in that vast region by a land grant. My friend from the woolly west may have been satisfied with his own argument; for my part I was not; still I admire and look upon him as my friend, and am always glad to claim him as a New Brunswicker. My next reference will be to my colleague, from New Brunswick also, from Westmoreland (Mr. Wood). I do not wish to name that hon. gentleman, but I cannot allow his very graceful and very smooth and very eloquent speech to go unnoticed. Of course hon. gentlemen who speak fluently are very apt to make mistakes, and I thought, notwithstanding his religious accent, his religious style, his profession of great honour and honesty, that he was by no means disposed, if he could help it, to oppose the government measure. Of course, he is shrewd and he rolled up those expresive eyes of his and looked to the moon, to the stars, and to the great Apollo himself, and cried that he was full of sorrow that he could not give his consent to the government proposition. I felt this, that nevertheless the hon. gentleman's speech was somewhat condemned, as the prophesies of Cassandra were condemned. It lacked one thing: I was unable to receive it as true, therefore there was that difference between that hon. gentleman and myself. He was most anxious also to build railways for the government. He could build two railways; he knew that were better routes than that laid out by the government; but he also failed to tell us how we could build them. Are we prepared to go into the money markets of the world and borrow some thirty or forty millions of dollars to sink in the great Yukon country?

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—On 150 miles of a tramway.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—My hon. friend says 150 miles; that is the roadway that is supposed to be built by a land grant. I have reference to the road mentioned by my hon. friend from New Brunswick. There are other routes which are known to be expensive ones. They are known to be roads that could not be constructed without a deal of public money, perhaps amounting to 30 or 40 millions of dollars. We have had some experience, hon. gentlemen, in the past of borrowing money in other countries. They borrowed money to build the Intercolonial; that railway cost some 45 or 50 million. It has been in operation for several years and yet, notwithstanding the vast amount of money sunk in that great public work, to-day it is as far off from producing a profit as it was one year after it was constructed. I hold that those hon. gentlemen are just as anxious as I am that no such folly shall be practised by other governments.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Will the hon. gentleman excuse me for interrupting? I wish to ask whether it was the intention in the construction of the Intercolonial Railway, that it should be a paying railroad.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I think so.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—It was built as the connecting link between the upper and lower provinces.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Is that a reason why it should not pay?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I am aware that it was one of the conditions of confederation, but, I do not think, the matter of payment ever was considered, because it was thought that the internal trade of Canada would be of such a nature and so large in its proportions that it would be utterly impossible that a great work of that kind should not pay, at least, some small dividend. That is the answer.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—It would pay if we charged high enough rates.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I do not think the hon. gentleman from the wild and woolly west should be so unjust as to think that the three small maritime provinces should be the sole supporters of that great work when, unfortunately, it has been too true that we have been the contributors, and we expect to be the contributors, but we do not expect by any means to allow any government that may come into power in the future to borrow more money merely to build public works that are very speculative, when there is no surety that they will pay anything approaching the interest on the cost of construction. I will address myself now to the main part of what I am about to say on the bill. I have listened with a great deal of anxiety to hear arguments advanced by hon. gentlemen who oppose this measure. I waited with some patience until I had heard several speeches, but I think I do not say too much when I say that I really did not hear any facts that would go to show that they were desirous of repudiating the efforts of the government of Canada to build a temporary, or almost temporary road for immediate purposes into the Yukon country. It is true I heard insinuating remarks, and I looked for some proofs to confirm the said insinuations, but instead of getting proofs, I found I was answered, as others were answered, by more insinuations. Hon. gentlemen dealing in insinuations should be prepared to offer some manly evidence that these insinuations are based upon some foundation that honest men could receive as a shadow of proof, at all events, of the misconduct of those persons who had been assailed, but such insinuations, I assure hon. gentlemen, have not the slightest weight with me. I know well the power of insinuation. I know unfortunately, sometimes most noble men and fair women are ruined by insinuation. But the parties who deal in such arguments we characterize as cowards.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is a good word.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I belong as you are all aware, to one of the lower provinces, and on behalf of that province I do not feel disposed to encourage the borrowing of money to build a railway to the Yukon district. I therefore give credit to the government for their success in securing this road without calling for another loan to be squandered as under former governments, amongst shouters and speculators whose continual cry was "give us more subsidies, else we will turn you out of office." I also think, hon. gentlemen, that it does not reflect great credit on gentlemen to impute double dealing to the premier of Canada. Our sovereign and her advisers did all they could to pay him honour a few months ago. Surely if our sovereign, thought him worthy of her gracious attention, it should intimidate those who are disposed to throw out insinuations against him. Such slanders—I cannot call them anything else—I am sorry to say, sound very base to me. Besides, if Sir Wilfrid Laurier is the dangerous tricky man he has been held up to be in this debate, the other gentlemen in the cabinet are no better. They must be rascals also, else they would not sit with him in the cabinet. So that hon. gentlemen will see that these insinuations are thrown out against a body of gentlemen the first in our country, and if the first gentlemen in our country are not allowed to pass without treachery and dishonesty being imputed to them I wonder what will become of the common crowd. But I do not believe these insinuations, neither does the country believe them, nor has the country any confidence in the men who make them. The country is with the present government, and the more unscrupulous men try to stab them, the more the country will be at the government's back. I do not wish to impute motives, but few can help seeing there is petty spite in this matter. We have a good government, we have a wise government, we have a great government.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—And Sir Wilfrid Laurier is to be congratulated on bringing around him such strong men, so that the people in each part of the Dominion can feel that they are represented by able and trusted men in the cabinet. It has been stated by one hon. gentleman very positively that there was no respectable paper that he knew of in this country supporting the government or the men who were about to support the government on this government measure. I do not know whether the paper is in the Conservative or in the Liberal interest, but in reading its articles, I find that it is very Conservative in my opinion. I have taken it up and read with pleasure many of its articles, and have always found, according to my limited means of knowledge, that it dealt with questions on a reasonable and logical basis; therefore I would take the liberty of reading you a short article on this very important point of what the Senate should do, under the circumstances.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Is it the Globe?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—No, the Montreal Witness.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—It is a very conservative paper.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I suppose it is. It comes to my room and I read it and I believe it is Conservative.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Very strongly so.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—There is a certain class of people who would not consider any paper that would speak against their baby a Conservative paper.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Was the Witness sworn?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—I do not propose to put him on oath because I consider him a gentleman.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—When I see the Star cited as an independent paper, I think the hon. gentleman is quite justified in citing the Witness as an independent paper.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—The article reads:

THE SENATE FACE TO FACE WITH SUCH A CHOICE.

BELIEF THAT THEY WILL NOT REJECT THE YUKON BILL.

Now that the Yukon railway bill has been sent to the Senate, the daily question on the streets is what chance has it there? The answer is that its chances have vastly improved within the past few weeks, and those in a position to know are saying that the bill will pass the Senate. That body has a rare chance of showing that they are something more than the mere henchmen of party leaders, the donkey engine to the political machine which is operated in the House of Commons. By rising superior to the position in which they are placed by common repute the Senate will do more to justify its own existence than anything they have done in the past twenty years. If they act so as to confirm the popular impression that the majority of that independent chamber are mere partisans bound to embarrass the government of the day when it is Liberal and not to embarrass the government when it is Conservative, then they will do much to strengthen the cry for reform. From another point of view, however, the Senate may be expected to adopt the bill. The government says it will not be responsible for what may happen in the Yukon territory, for the perservation of law and order and for the proper administration of the government of Canada—if its policy is checked by the rejection of this bill in the Senate. The government goes still further and says that the retention of that territory within the area of British domain as involved in the question, and that without this means of communication they will not be responsible for the temporary and violent destruction of British authority in the district, and the setting up of mob law in place of the Queen's government. Sir Charles Tupper, in his speech in the House anticipated a revolt among the miners and a refusal to pay the royalty. In fact, he said that we could not put in soldiers enough to collect the royalty. Well, whether the royalty is good, bad or indifferent, once the government of Canada says it is to be collected it must be collected at whatever cost, for no government and particutarly no British government can allow it laws to be set at defiance in remote territories. Respect for British law is one of the colonizing forces in the girdle of dependencies which Britannia has buckled round the globe, and in this case, with the eyes of the world on the gold fields of the Klondike, it is imperative that the traditional respect for British rule shall not be destroyed. In the face of this it is difficult to see how the Senate can assume the responsibility of crippling the executive of the country in its Yukon policy. The people have placed the government of the country in the hands of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his colleagues. The Senate has no right to take that government out of their hands. And that is practically what they would do if they defeate the bill. Mixed up with the question there is a boundary dispute, and the British flag has been hoisted at the summit of the mountain range where the government contends a proper interpretation of the treaty fixes the boundary between the territory of Alaska and the British possessions. By this Stickine route, including, as it does, an all-rail connection with an ocean port in British Columbia, support could be introduced into that country behind the summit to back up the force of mounted police who circle round that flag and thus bid defiance to any one on the coast side of the range, whether mob or not, who attempted to tear it down. The Senate of Canada dare not reject a bill, one consequence of which rejection might be the humiliation of the British flag and the chagrin of the British people all over the world.

Hon. gentlemen, I agree with those expressions. I hope this Senate will take them into account, and I now address my brother senators and say to them that those who avoid voting on this question by staying away are as guilty as though they voted against the bill. Let every man stand to his guns, that we may know who are the traitors. There is now just one other matter I want to place before the Senate. Another speech was delivered by an hon. gentleman, whom I do not see in his place at present, the Hon. Mr. Kirchhoffer. No doubt this speech has gone to the country, and I believe it made a very wrong impression. I feel it is my duty to do the best I can to present the matter to the Senate in its true light, not in the light which that hon. gentleman wished to present it for the purpose of influencing the vote of this House. It has been said by this hon. gentleman for the purpose of influencing this Senate in its vote on this question, that the Senate had gained credit in the country some time ago by throwing out the Harvey-Salisbury Railway Bill. This statement is not wholly correct, as I will show; there is no parallel between the two bills. It is true the Senate threw out the Harvey-Salisbury Railway Bill, but it was because it was a mere personal and sectional matter in the interest of Halifax as against St. John.

It was not a general bill, it was a sectional bill. It was most unjust to St. John, who was entitled to get the benefit of its geographical position, of being the winter port of Canada, some 275 miles nearer open sea all the year round than Halifax is. Why, then, should a bill that was merely sectional, that was merely supported by a section of the government, by a very small section of the people against another section equally important, why should such a bill be compared to this great measure that the government have unanimously called upon the House of Commons and upon this Senate to adopt as a measure of expediency. There is no parallel. But I will go further; the Senate was asked to waste some two and a half million dollars at that time by that measure to save a distance of about twenty-three miles, and leave St. John out in the cold. It was well known, too, that only part of the government was in favour of that outlay, the other part being against it, giving the Senate the wink behind yonder curtain, to throw it out. Where is the similarity? What is there in that precedent that should influence the vote of this Senate with reference to the Yukon Bill? I can see, and I think any hon. gentleman who investigates this matter will see no parallel whatever. But what is our position on this Yukon Bill? Why, that the whole government beseech us to stand by the country in time of danger, to prevent a mob from pulling down our flag in the Yukon region and trampling it in the dirt before the government could defend it from such disgrace. Hon. gentlemen you may help to do this thing, but I shall vote for the bill. I thank you, hon. gentlemen, for hearing me with such patience, and I trust you will believe that I have not done anything but my duty, and that when I am called upon to perform a duty, no personal consideration can induce me to shrink from doing what I believe to be right.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—I have listened attentively to the eloquent and very interesting speeches which have been made on this question and I must say that I agree with the hon. gentlemen in saying that I am fully in accord with them when they say that the question now before us is one of the most important we have dealt with in Canada. We knew for several years, that gold existed in the Yukon district, but the wonderful discoveries which have been made during the last 12 months have created an excitement, not only in Canada, but throughout the whole world and if one-half of the expectation that we have of that vast country is realized, there is no question that Canada has at the present moment the best and the richest gold fields ever discovered. It is true that the mining industry is only in its infancy in that district. The only portion of the Yukon country which is partially explored lies between the Indian River and the Klondike River; a few affluents of these rivers have been explored and partially worked. Among those the Bonanza and Eldorado Creeks have given proofs that prior to the discovery of this Klondike country, nowhere in the whole world was gold to be found in such large quantities. We have no reasons to doubt that the other portions of the country lying between the Indian River and the Klondike River will prove to be as rich as those portions which have been explored up to the present time. The evidence we have warrants us in believing that this Yukon country will become one of the best mining countries in the world, and consequently a vast trade will develop there, and it devolves upon the government of the day to see that that trade is kept as much as possible for Canadians. When I first saw in the public press that the government had taken steps to secure for Canada the immense trade which will be developed there, and had succeeded in making an agreement with two gentlemen to build an all-Canadian road which would not cost a single cent to the country, I said at once, "I have always been against the Liberal party, but if this statement is true, it will be the duty of every member of the House of Commons and every senator to support the government in passing that measure." But, hon. gentlemen, it was not long before we learned that that contract, which seemed when announced to the public in an after dinner speech, was not so good, not so advantageous to Canada as it had been at first described. I fully agree with those who say that it is the duty of every member of the House, in considering a question of this kind, to forget party divisions and party lines. Our duty is to examine the bill before us, and if we are convinced that this bill is in the best interests of the country, I have no doubt that every hon. member of the House will, without hesitation, vote for its passage. I am sure of one thing, that before recording his vote every hon. member of the House will consult his conscience and record his vote according to his own conscience in what he believes to be the best interest of Canada. We have to examine, before giving that vote, the agreement entered into between Mackenzie & Mann and the government, to see if it is for the best advantage of Canada. The only available routes to reach Dawson City, which seems to be at the present moment the objective point of all the miners who try to reach that Yukon country, are via Edmonton, the Stikine River, Skagway, Dyea, the Dalton trail and St. Michael's. In the Yukon country, as elsewhere, trade will find its natural channel, and that channel will be the least expensive and quickest. In fact we have, at the present moment, experience in Canada of what I am stating here. We have two important railway corporations; one, the Canadian Pacific Railway, has its agents throughout the whole Dominion try ing to have all intending mining settlers in the Yukon travel by its line. When they succeed, we are sure that the man travelling by the Canadian Pacific Railway will reach Vancouver or Victoria, and consequently will buy his provisions and outfit in this country. On the other hand we have the Grand Trunk Railway, another inportant railway corporation of Canada. What are they doing? They have also agents throughout the whole Dominion who are trying to have all the passengers travel by their road, and if they succeed their passengers will travel either by the Union Pacific Railway to San Francisco, or by the Northern Pacific Railway to Portland, Oregon, or to Seattle. These men on arriving at the Pacific coast will have to buy their outfits, their provisions and all they require in the United States. Why is that? The Grand Trunk Railway Company is a Canadian corporation as the Canadian Pacific Railway is, but their interest is to have all the traffic they can on their own line, and they do not care if what they are doing is detrimental to Canada or not. They will try and do what they can to have their line of railway pay. So all the exertions of the Grand Trunk Railway to secure passengers to the Yukon are detrimental to Canada, because it is to their interests to take them out of the country. On the other hand, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are working in favour of Canada. Why? Because their railway is through the whole Dominion, and in working for Canada they are promoting their own interest, I may say that as long as the Dominion of Canada has no road leading to the Yukon district on the north-east side of the Rockies, it will be impossible to compete with the United States. Let us adopt one route or the other. As long as those routes start from the Pacific coast, it will be impossible for Canada to compete against the United States trade which can be developed there. We know very well that in Oregon, in California, in Washington State they have fine agricultural lands. They can raise wheat and all the foods that the miners require. Bacon, ham, beans and flour are produced there in abundance, and can be sold, if not cheaper, at least as cheap as they can be sold on this side of the line. The government may make all the regulations they wish, but it will be impossible to prevent the people of the United States from securing the great bulk of the trade which will be developed in the Yukon district before it is possible to build an all-Canadian road, which means a road from the only place to control the trade of that district, a road from Edmonton to Dawson City. Before the Telegraph Creek and Teslin Lake road can be built the only routes into that country are by Dyea, Skagway and St. Michael. That by St. Michael's being a water route, will always, in summer time, be the best route and the one which will be cheapest for the transportation of goods. Goods loaded on ocean steamers from San Francisco, from Portland, Seattle, Victoria or Vancouver can be unloaded and transhipped on river steamers at St. Michael's and then carried straight to Dawson City. We all know, from the information we have, that the Yukon is a river fairly navigable, so I say that, do what we may, it will be impossible to divert the trade in the summer time from the route by St. Michael's to any other. Next to St. Michael, in winter time for example, the most advantageous route at the present moment and the one that always will be until we discover new passes which are for the present unknown, is the Skagway route by Chilkoot Pass. It will always be the shortest and most advantageous route, because supposing that railway is built from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake, and that miners in winter would go up the Stikine River and Telegraph Creek, and then take the railway from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake, on reaching the head of Teslin Lake they would still be a further distance from Dawson City that when starting from Skagway. Can we imagine for a moment that, for the sake of encouraging the Canadian railway, the miners will proceed by that route when they have such a convenient route by way of Skagway. And if I am correctly informed, before three or four months will have elapsed, a tramway will be built from Skagway up to Chilkoot Pass, and instead of its taking from five to fifteen days to cross on account of the difficulties existing at present, miners will be able to cross that pass in one or two days at most. As I have said before, if we are willing to have an all-Canadian route, the only way is to build one route from Edmonton, and if the government is not willing to build the railway at the present moment, there is nothing to prevent them building a wagon road. We have navigation on Peace River, on Nelson River, on the Liard and Pelly Rivers: so that only a few miles comparatively of that road would have to be made to furnish a good wagon road, and as it has been mentioned several times, this road from Edmonton would be the poor man's road, because all those who are going there are not wealthy men. The fact that they are going to earn a living there shows that they are courageous and possess a great deal of energy, but they are lacking in one particular thing—money. We have been told several times in this House that this country was unknown, that the government had received little or no information on that district, and the great reason why they had made an agreement with Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann so detrimental to the interests of this country was on account of urgency. The hon. Secretary of State said that most of the information he had was obtained from the public press. How is it that they are not better informed? How does it happen that the government having several employees there, cannot receive information from that great country? How is it that the government cannot tell us frankly and candidly the reasons which induced them to make that agreement with Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann. I am sure, hon. gentlemen, that all the members of the Senate were, like myself, surprised to see at the beginning of this week that three gentlemen had been sent as delegates from the whole of the miners, I might say, in Dawson City to interview the government. These gentlemen have been here during the last 5 or 6 weeks. Nobody knew it. Nobody was aware that Mr. Landreville, Dr. Wills and Mr. Livernash were here. They admitted to me that they were afraid of approaching the members of this House or the other House fearing that the ministers would say that they were coming down for political purposes, and their presence was kept secret till last Monday. Nobody knew that there was such a delegation waiting to see the ministers. It was my good fortune to meet these delegates yesterday. Every one of them told me that during the last five or six weeks they had done the best they could to obtain interviews with the government, and more particularly with Mr. Sifton, the Minister of the Interior. Day by day they were at his office, and they were treated like mere office boys. It was impossible for them to obtain an interview, and they told me the only gentleman who showed them a little courtesy amongst those they had seen was the hon. Prime Minister, Sir Wilfrid Laurier; but still Sir Wilfrid, not being at the head of the department which had to deal with these questions, found it impossible to do anything for those delegates. The hon. Minister of the Interior could not pretend that he did not know that these three gentlemen were authorized by the whole of the miners in the Yukon district, because he had a petition sent to him, signed by 2,500 odd miners in the Yukon district, stating that the three gentlemen had been chosen by all the miners and were authorized to supplement all that was missing in the petition prepared by the miners there. I see that the Minister of the Interior received the petition of the miners telling them that Messrs. Landreville, Wills and Livernash were the three delegates authorized to speak for them. Accompanying that petition there is a letter written by Mr. Thomas Fawcett, gold commissioner, as follows:

DAWSON, N.W.T., 13th Dec., 1897.

Hon. Minister of the Interior,
Ottawa, Canada.

SIR,—I have the honour to transmit herewith a petition signed by a majority of the miners in this Yukon district. I have not the leisure necessary to examine and report thereon as I could have desired, but as you will doubtless gather from my reports my opinions on the subjects with which it deals. The gentlemen who have been appointed by the miners to accompany it to Ottawa, will be able to give you very full information in reference to the country, mines, methods of mining, and all other points on which you may desire information. Dr. Wills, of the North-west Mounted Police, is himself quite a prospector, and has taken a great interest in mining and the regulations governing it. Mr. Landreville, a Canadian, from Quebec, is a practical miner, and had interests on Glacier Creek before that portion of the country was known to belong to Canada. Mr. Livernash has had a legal training which has been of much assistance to him in collecting information which will in due time be submitted for your consideration.

I have the honour to be,
Your obedient servant,
THOMAS FAWCETT,
Gold Commissioner.

So that the Minister of the Interior was fully aware that Landreville, Wills and Livernash were coming to see the minister privately, and were the spokesmen of a large body of men who should be encouraged as much as possible, because if we have discovered mines in that great Yukon country it is due to the men who are courageous enough, and who have the energy to go and work there and we should endeavour to assist them. But instead of that, those three delegates, whom I consider the representatives of a very important part of this country, were refused admission on one pretext and another. They admitted to me yesterday that before the end of last week they would not say a word in public, though they were the delegates of so great a corporation. And why? They said to me: "what do we care about the colour of the present administration? What do we care if the administration is in the hands of the Liberal or Conservative party? What we want is to have good laws for that country, and we thought it very prudent to come here and see nobody else than the ministers of the present administration." I admitted that I thought it was the best thing, and that discretion was their best course. I may say, en passant, that if I take these three gentlemen as specimens of the miners working there, I think there is brain enough in the Yukon, that we can let them do what they please, without fearing they will starve there. Speaking of starvation, I mentioned that to Landreville yesterday. I said it was stated in both Houses—I do not remember if it was said here, but I remember that it was stated in the other House—that there was danger of starvation. He turned to me and said: "Mr. Bolduc there is brain enough in the miners there that if there was the slightest danger of starvation, every head would have left there last fall and would have reached places where there is plenty of food, and no one ever supposes that there was ever the slightest foundation for the rumour that there would be starvation in the Yukon districts."

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Does not the hon. gentleman know that some 500 or 600 persons were obliged to leave Dawson last fall?

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—That is just what I say.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Forced to leave because there was no food.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—And I say more: if the necessity had been greater a larger number would have left Dawson City and would have come down, but how is it, when we hear every day that it is impossible to have news from that great Yukon district, that the most part of the news we have from that great country comes through the press. It is very easy to explain. When we see deputations of intelligent men like the three named being refused admittance to the office of the Minister of the Interior, we can understand very well why the government are not better informed than they are.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Did they refuse admission to Slavin, the pugilist?

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—And we hear from the Secrtary of State that part of this scheme was only gambling on the part of Mackenzie & Mann. I was surprised to hear such a thing, but I can understand now why Laundreville, Wills and Livernash were refused admittance. From what I heard from the hon. Secretary of State, I understand that it was impossible for Mr. Sifton to receive these gentlemen—and why? Because, if I may use the very expressions used by the Secretary of State, I would say that he was too busy gambling with Mackenzie & Mann.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I made no statement of the kind. I made no statement about their inability to see Sifton.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—I did not say that. I said the hon. gentleman stated it was a gamble on the part of Mackenzie & Mann.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I said the whole thing was a gamble because they could not tell the value of the land, neither could Mackenzie & Mann. They had to take their chances.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that these delegates coming down from Dawson, representing these people, have been here four or five weeks and have not yet had an interview with the Minister of the Interior and could not have it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman is misstating it entirely, I happened to go into the room of the premier some days ago I forget what day it was, and I found those two gentlemen and a number of gentlemen, I think Mr. Blair was there, and Sir Louis Davies, and I think Mr. Tarte also were present. They had for a very considerable time been discussing this matter. They had been there for an hour before I went in, discussing the matters in which miners were interested. I remained for half an hour in the room with them.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—When was that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not recollect the date. It was a few days ago.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—Monday last, was it not.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I never heard of their being here, they never called on me.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—This is all very true. They had an appointment for Monday last, but it was impossible for them to place their case before the hon. gentlemen there. The agreement before us says that the road will be built from either Glenora or Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake. We are told the distance is about 150 miles, but we know very well that in the route where this railway is to be built there will be sinuosities, and it will be very surprising if the road is not double the estimated length, and I say that instead of the contractors receiving four million acres of land, the quantity will be nearer five millions. We know very well, those who have had experience in railway building, that in the most level countries you have to add at least twenty per cent for curvatures, and at least twenty per cent to the length of the line on account of sinuosities of the land. How can we suppose that, in a country like the Yukon region, the road will be so straight that only 150 miles will be required to reach Teslin Lake from Telegraph Creek? It is possible, if this agreement is passed by the Senate, that next year instead of three and three-quarter million acres of of land being granted to Mackenzie & Mann we will have probably between four and and five million acres and perhaps more. I said a little while ago that, by the first intimation we had from the government, a contract had been given to Mackenzie & Mann it looked to be a splendid arrangement. We received the details piece by piece, just a scrap from day to day and still, at this time I think there is yet a good deal suppressed. I asked the Secretary of State if a wagon road was to be built from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake. He said, yes. I asked him who was to pay for that wagon road, for I see no reference to a wagon road in the agreement. He said, "Mackenzie & Mann will pay for it." But in the other House Mr. Sifton, when asked the same question, declined to answer. He refused to tell the members of the Commons who would pay for that wagon road. The Secretary of State said he had but little information about this contract. I do not accuse the hon. gentleman of having tried to deceive this House; I have too much respect for him to say that, but after the admission he has made that he was not well posted on these questions, have we not a right to infer that not only are they giving Mackenzie & Mann four or five million acres of land, but that they will pay extra for building that wagon road. It looks as if the wagon road was not thought of in the first place, but was mentioned by somebody after this agreement was entered into as being necessary for the purpose of taking in supplies for the starving miners. The government were giving everything without knowing the extent of what they were giving. Why? Because they failed to mention anything in the contract about a wagon road. Is it not reasonable to assume that, say 24 or 48 hours after the contract was signed, Mackenzie & Mann were told that a wagon road there would be very important for this season, and that they should build it. Knowing Mackenzie & Mann as I do, by reputation, if the government is going to pay for that wagon road, not only will the contractors receive that immense land grant, but the wagon road will be so built that, after its completion the contractors will only have to lay their rails upon it and have their tramway built. That is my impression of what will happen if this agreement is carried in the Senate. To reach that Telegraph Creek and Teslin road we must go up the Stikine River for a distance of about 150 miles. I thought at first that the best information the government could get had been received, and that they had the satisfaction of knowing that this river was easily navigable. All I have been able to find in the official papers on the subject is a report from Mr. Jennings. In his last report, page 8, addressing himself to the Minister of the Interior, Mr. Jennings says :

SIR,—In reporting on the result of my observations for a railway route between Stikine River and Teslin Lake, B.C., I would, however, first refer to the means of communication between the sea and a suggested point of debarkation on the river, by mentioning that the Stikine has been navigated by steamers to Glenora and Telegraph Creek, a distance of from 140 to 150 miles from the sea, since the early seventies, when the Dease Lake and Cassiar mining excitement was at its height, but while so navigated during the open season, usually between May 1st and October 20th, the journey has almost invariably been considered slow, tedious and not without danger, partly owing to the inferior class of steamers used and partly to the fluctuating state of the water. At times the river is too low for speed with a reasonable cargo, or, the stream may be very high and the riffles difficult to make headway against, with the additional danger of drift trees or snags getting foul of the steering gear or wheel. The latter danger is most to be feared where the channel is contracted such as in Little and Klootchman's cañons, where, if any mishap occurred to the vessel's machinery, she would at once be carried against the rugged rock walls by the swift swirling, disturbed waters, and sunk by having her planking either torn out or stove in. The distance of 96 miles between Wrangel and Little Cañon can be made by a powerful steamer in one day, whereas, by reason of the swift and difficult water above, it takes two days more to reach Telegraph Creek, a further distance of only 54 miles, or 150 miles from the sea; therefore, with these facts before one, it seems reasonable that on a route where safe and speedy transit is contemplated it is advisable to commence the railway section well down the valley at a point to be determined on below the Little Cañon and on the left bank of the river, 96 miles from the sea.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN—What is the date of that report?

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—It is the last report by Mr. Jennings. As you will see, hon. gentlemen, it may be possible to build a railway from Telegraph Creek to Teslin Lake, but what is the use of having an all-Canadian route there if we cannot reach that railway? In the only official report that I could find, Mr. Jennings who has the reputation of being a very clever and intelligent engineer, says that the navigation of that river is practically impossible. How can we imagine that, after having seen these reports and being aware of the difficulties of the navigation of that river, the government decided to give more than a whole province for the sake of saying that they have a railway built altogether in Canada.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—It is a gamble.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—If we examine this bill carefully in connection with the mining regulations at present in existence, it is impossible to come to any other conclusion than that the policy of the government is to give monopolies there—to give the whole Yukon district to this corporation and destroy all chance for the free miner. We have first the obligation of a free miner to take a license, for which he has to pay $10; then he will have to register and pay $15. He has to pay a royalty of 10 per cent on his gross output except on the amount of $2,500, but this exception is made only in the case where the free miner can go and place the royalty in the hands of the bank named by the government or the gold commissioners. In case this money is collected by the police, then he has to pay the royalty on the whole output of his mine. Is it not extraordinary to see the government trying to deprive the miner of his earnings there? Is it not a fact that in any industry a profit of 10 per cent is considerably more than good? As a rule the profits derived from industry run from six to eight per cent, and the government is not satisfied to take 5 or 6 per cent, but will force the poor free miner to pay 10 per cent. Not only that hon. gentlemen, if the free miner, after having located a good claim, a claim which will recoup him his expenses, is unlucky enough to leave that claim for 72 hours, a big corporation like Mackenzie & Mann will come and say "that belongs to us; you have lost all your rights." Then what can the poor miner do against a mighty corporation when the law is against him? So that I say that all the policy of the government is against a free miner, and in favour of monopoly. More than that, hon. gentlemen, in those regulations adopted in January last, the government has decided to give leases to parties who are willing to dredge in rivers. A man has a right to lease 5 miles in length of a river, and has a right at the same time to take 5 other similar leases, in all 30 miles. What have they to pay for that? Only $100 a mile. And they have to pay 10 per cent on the output of their diggings there. But when? When they have succeeded first in recouping themselves their expenses, taken $90,000 worth from their leased claims. Compare that now with the obligations of the free miner. When he gets $2,500 he is obliged to go himself and deliver that money into the hands of the bank, or of the gold commissioner, and failing to do that, he loses his right and a wealthy man who has not gone to the North-west to discover where there was gold, can by paying $100 a mile, lease long distances of the best rivers in that country. At the rate they are going, I think that before three or four months have elapsed there will be more leases given to their friends than there will be rivers to be found in the whole district. In speaking of monopolies that the government is going to create there, it strikes me that the same thing has existed in the parish of St. Francis in the county of Beauce—the county I had the honour to represent in the other House for several years. The first gold which was found in Beauce was in 1846. It was found by pure accident, by a young girl one Sunday morning, crossing a little stream called the Gilbert River. Her attention was attracted by a thing which she thought was a yellow stone. She picked it up and it was taken to Mr. de Leary, and without hesitating one moment Mr. de Leary went to Quebec and obtained letters patent for the exclusive right of mining there to the extent of 72 miles. Of course nothing was said about such a patent existing before large discoveries were made. The farmers looked for gold every summer, and in 1863 Joseph Poulin, John Poulin, F. Poulin and N. Rodrique, in one single day, having struck a place on the Gilbert River where there was only four or five feet of dirt on the bed rock, found with only shovels, picks and common pans seventy-two ounces of gold. As soon as that rich finding was known, there was a stampede, everybody wanted to go and work at the gold mines there. People came from every part of the Dominion, from Europe, from Australia, and from California, but the purchasers of the rights of the lucky gentleman who had succeeded in obtaining from the government letters patent for the exclusive right of mining in that district, saw that it was then the time to make the most of their rights. They made very stringent exactions on the miners there, and a few weeks after all the strangers had disappeared. The next year and the years following the farmers, sometimes on their own farms and sometimes on their neighbours' farms, continued to work for gold. They were left digging as long as they found nothing, but as soon as they discovered something to pay them they were taken by the throat and imprisoned, and it was impossible even for the farmer to work for gold on his own land. What was the result? There was great excitement. The government had to send police there at a very large cost, not to protect the mines, not to develop the mines, but to protect the interests of the parties who had acquired the rights of the happy gentleman who had obtained that concession; and the very men who had been deprived of their right to work on their own farms had to contribute to the payment of the police who had been sent to prevent them from working where they had a natural right to work. Well, it was said then that the government had granted those valuable rights without knowing what they were granting. Can we say the same thing to-day? Can my hon. friend tell me that they have granted so much land to Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann without having some idea of the value of the land? They admit frankly that they have done that without knowing what they were granting, without even knowing the place where the line of railway is to be built and without knowing even if the Americans will not place difficulties in the way of transhipping at Fort Wrangel. The government has acted in exactly the same way as the Quebec government acted when they granted that exclusive right as above stated. It is ten times worse than that, because in 1846 when that patent was granted no one spoke of gold discoveries there. The government was not aware that gold had been discovered there, but to-day the government knows that the great Yukon district is undoubtedly the richest gold district of the world, and with all this information, they did not hesitate a moment and will try to put in the hands of two men land enough to keep under more favourable conditions working and living there a population of at least 1,000,000 souls When I have seen what has occurred in Beauce no possible consideration could induce me to vote for a bill which would entail ten times worse evils than exist there, where I have seen the farmers turned out of their homes and arrested, why? Because the government had failed in its duty, because the government had granted to a single person the right to mine everywhere in that parish. All those who know the difficulties experienced in Beauce, and how the gold miners were ruined there, would not under any consideration, ratify this agreement, and now hon. gentlemen, we know very well that a great number of miners will go there. Lands taken by Mackenzie & Mann will be explored, and imagine the position of a man who has been working a year or two and discovers gold on Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann's property, without knowing that it was theirs, being arrested. The result will be serious difficulties there. The government will have to send a whole army to maintain peace, not to encourage mining development, but to protect Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann. For my own part I will not be responsible for that, and I shall vote unhesitatingly against that measure. I have spoken longer than I had intended. The measure has been ably discussed by gentlemen who can deal with it a great deal better than I can, labouring, as I do, under the disadvantage of speaking in a language which is not mine. However, I thought it was my duty not to give a silent vote. I thought it was my duty to let you know what has happened in Beauce, and to state why I oppose this measure. In opposing this bill, hon. gentlemen, I feel satisfied that I am doing my duty and that my vote will meet with the approval of the great majority of the people of this country.

Hon. Mr. MACALLUM—I would say at the outset that this is a most extraordinary bill that we have before us, and before discussing it, I may have to ask a few questions of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, the leader of this House. In his speech on the address, he told us that if we knew as much as he did we would be sure to pass this bill unanimously. I have waited ever since then to get that knowledge which my hon. friend claims that he possesses, I am sure he has a great deal of knowledge, but he might be kind enough to impart a little of it to the House if he wants to carry this bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is pretty clear that I did not estimate my hon. friend's objections or I would hardly have said so.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I know my hon. friend is wise in his day and generation ; he is considered so. When he is possessed of so much information he might let us have a little of it if he wants to carry this bill. Of course, if he wants to defeat it, then he will not impart his knowledge. We are not going to be carried away with any such chaff as his vague assurance—at least I am not. This contract that we are dealing with is a most monstrous contract, and, if ratified, will do a great injustice to the people of this country, and I would say to the Minister of Justice, that he should, if he wants any support, share his knowledge with us. He has plenty—he is called the sage of Bothwell, he has read a good deal. Can he show me any other contract like this, making such large concessions without getting an equivalent for them, in any legislation in the world ? I have read some, but I can assure hon. gentlemen that in all I have ever heard of I never read of such a monstrous proposition as this. What are we getting in return for this land that we are giving away ? My hon. friend from Lauzon (Mr. Bolduc) said the land grant was five million of acres—I do not think it is so much, but I am satisfied it will be over four millions, because the railway, if we get any benefit from it at all, has got to be 165 miles long. Now, what do we get for all this land we are giving away. If you start to-day to go to Dawson City it will take you 40 days to get there, and you get the privilege of riding a few hours, say ten hours at the most, in this tramway of theirs during that time. For this privilege you are giving away lands three times larger than the province of Prince Edward Island. I don't blame Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann ; they are working for themselves, but I blame the government of this country that has allowed themselves to be mesmerized—I cannot call it anything else but mesmerized—by Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann to make such terms. There never was such a thing in the history of the world as this. People do not realize what we are giving away under this contract. My hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Kirchhoffer) spoke a good deal the other day about the antecedents of Mackenzie & Mann. According to the ruling of the Speaker yesterday, I must be very careful how I say anything about Mackenzie & Mann, who are getting all these favours from the government of the country. I know nothing against Mackenzie & Mann, but if I did know anything about their antecedents and thought they would not carry out this contract honestly, I would state what I knew to the House. So far as I know they are gentlemen. I consider that Mackenzie & Mann are before this House, and whatever their antecedents are, we have a perfect right to discuss them, to see why they have been selected to carry out this contract. The government of this country is practically in the hands of these contractors. They have a chain around this government and can make them do almost what they like. Let us see what we are giving these contractors. The land grant will be at least four million acres. Do hon. gentlemen realize what an extensive country that is? It would make a strip of land a quarter of a mile wide that would go clear around the world—a strip of land 1,330 feet wide to go clean around the earth. Or take it a chain wide, 66 feet, it would go twenty times around the world. That is what we are giving away. The Minister of Justice said the other day that we have lots of territory up there, but he wants to get rid of it too fast. We give Mackenzie & Mann our gold lands and in return we get this tramway. My hon. friend from Lauzon (Mr. Bolduc) has told us that we will have to protect Mackenzie & Mann in their holding. Have you considered what that means? You will have to keep a standing army in that country to protect Mackenzie & Mann. Children yet unborn will be taxed for the protection of Mackenzie & Mann and to help them to hold their property. Is the Senate of Canada ready to do that? We have been told that there is politics in the opposition to this bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I say no. The hon. gentleman boasted here that the other House carried the bill by 39 majority. Yes, they did so under the party whip. You forced them to do it. I am not a prophet, nor the son of a prophet, but I venture to to say that they will butt their heads against a stone wall next time they appeal to the country. But five of the government supporters in the House of Commons could not be whipped into line. It must be something hard that prevented the member from West Elgin swallowing this bill. I read his speech. He said the government were playing poker with the property of the country. The member for South Perth left the government; so did the member for Edmonton, the member for Vancouver, and the member for Frontenac. They say because the party in the Commons swallowed that bill we have a right to do the same thing. I think my hon. friend will find that in the Senate he has caught a tartar. The party whip is not swung here—we have no politics here. I have known a Conservative government try to pass a measure here and it was thrown out. The Senate of Canada is composed of gentlemen who want to do what is right in the interests of the people of this country irrespective of party—at least that is where I stand. I will not be driven by, I will not say a mechanical majority, but a confiding majority under the party whip. When the hon. gentleman tells me that there was a majority of 39 in the other House for the bill, I tell him that is no reason why we should pass it. I know, hon. gentlemen that when the Conservative government was in power, a bill was passed in the other House by 36 majority and sent to us, but this Conservative Senate, as it is called, threw out that bill. I feel satisfied that this measure will be thrown out. I have every confidence in this body that they want to do what is right by the people of this country. I am satisfied that the people are at our back. We are threatened, of course—we have been threatened for a long time, but the government have not threatened us lately; they are coaxing us now, but neither sugar nor salt will prevent the Senate doing what they believe to be their duty. Even many members of the House of Commons, who were driven under the party lash to vote for this measure, will be glad to see it defeated. I have talked with some of them, but I will not mention names. If the government are not satisfied with the action of the Senate, if they think the Senate is here simply to register the decisions of the House of Commons, and are dissatisfied with our actions and make it a question before the people of this country, the people will sustain the Senate. If not we will bow to the inevitable.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does the hon. gentleman know that the boards of trade all over the country have approved of the bill and are supporting it.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—No; I do not know that. I have not a very strong opinion of boards of trade. I have said so before in this House. It does not cost much in many parts of the country to be a member of a board of trade. You can pay a dollar and a half in some places and become a member; in Toronto it may cost ten or twelve dollars. The boards of trade of this country are principally composed of bankers. Every banker belongs to a board of trade; I do not mean to say that every member of a board of trade is a banker, but the bankers influence them, and we know that they look after their own interests. This bill may suit the bankers; some of them are very anxious to have this bill passed and are making great preparations to take advantage of it, but the people of this country to-day, from Halifax to Vancouver, are expressing their thankfulness that we have a Senate in this country to protect their interests, and the sooner hon. gentlemen take note of that the better. The people of Canada are against the bill irrespective of party. It is not a question of politics, it is a question of this government neglecting their duty and giving away the inheritance of the people of Canada without a return. That is the question before us. Let us consider this bill. What are we giving away? I have spoken of the quantity of land that is granted to the contractors. I do not blame them, I blame the government who have failed in their duty. When I come to look at this bill it is a hard matter to discuss it quietly. It is an absurd bill, a monstrous bill, it is a give-away bill of the best interests of this country—giving away four million acres of what is considered the best and richest gold land in the world. There has been a good deal of discussion in this Senate about the routes to that country. I do not intend to say a word on that subject, because it not before the House; there is no route before the Senate except what is referred in to this contract with Mackenzie & Mann. When we get rid of this contract, and I think we will before long, then when any question of route comes up, whether it be this or another, we can consider it. I am not finding fault with this route, but with the monoply created and the amount of land we are giving away. For the next ten years no one but Mackenzie & Mann can do anything in that country, in the building of the railway the government cannot interfere at all. Mackenzie & Mann can do as they please. They do not need to file a book of reference, or a plan or anything else. They have the government fast. What could have induced the government to make such a contract as this in defiance of their pledges? When in opposition, they always advocated that public works should be let by tender to the lowest bidder. I say if they want to build a railway into that country they should advertise now for tenders and let the contract to the lowest tenderer. But they wanted to let this contract privately to their friends, but I think—I cannot say what I think about it, because my mind is a kingdom, I can think what I like as long as I do not think too loud and I do not like to think loud of all I suspect and think about this question. It looks fishy all the way through —it does not look clear. This bill was conceived in iniquity and has been brought forth in sin. That is my individual opinion. I formed it some time ago and I have seen nothing to change my mind since. Look at the arguments advanced in this House in support of this bill. Have we heard one argument yet that would make us think that the contract is right? I trow not. The argument of my hon. friend who spoke yesterday (Mr. King) was all against the bill. And I have to hear from others yet. What am I to do? I must act as I have made up my mind, because the sage of Bothwell——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Oh, no—my hon. friend is the sage.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—No, you are known by that name in the country, and I say you are a wise one. The hon. gentleman may think I am not quoting him correctly. I will read what the hon. gentleman said:

> By the first of September and it will be in the power of the government to send in such men as may be necessary to maintain law and order with the large population which will be mostly foreigners, and to retain that country and to maintain the interests of Canada with it. In fact, there are many things which it would be most desirable to say in our defence which cannot be made public in the public interest but I am satisfied there is not one in this House——

That is talking big, loud talk.

> No matter how strong his feeling may be, no matter how anxious he might be a change of government——

Well, I am not anxious there should be a change of government.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think my hon. friend does not know his own mind in that regard.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—If the hon. gentleman understands himself and his position as well as I do, he will be all right, but that is a matter of opinion, and we disagree in that. With regard to this great disaster, which it is said will take place in this Yukon country if the railway is not built, the people that go into that country are good healthy people, or they should not go there. They know what is wanted. They must take a year's provision, and I do not see why they should suffer. My hon. friend told us there would be 100,000 people going there this year, and his colleague, the Secretary of State, said that 90 per cent of them would be United States citizens.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Foreigners, I said, not all of them from the United States.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Well, possibly. There is nothing certain in this world but death and taxes. The hon. gentlemen say "Oh, what a great benefit it is going to be to this country. It is going to help immigration. It is going to help people to grow peaches and potatoes if we only pass this bill." I say now if people go into that country they take their lives in their hands because they have had fair warning. I have often gone to place where people told me I risked my life, but I went there to accomplish something. These people go there with their eyes open and will not suffer much. They will come out all right. I do not think the people of this country should be taxed, or their property given away to provide for these men in the way proposed. I say that as soon as we ascertain that we have any large amount of mineral wealth in that country, and as soon as we find it is necessary to build a road there, I am ready to consider it. I am ready to do all I can for my country, but I do not like a private contract. I would like every man to have a chance to compete. I understand an offer has been made to do this work for one quarter the amount of land we are giving under this contract. That is the Hamilton Smith offer. If you advertise for tenders, you will get it done for nothing.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Smith is not a Rothschild.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Why have the government of the country the face to send in such a bill and expect that these honest gentlemen of the Senate are going to pass it? I am satisfied that they will not pass it, and I will not vote for it because I know it is against the best interests of the people of this country, and I am not going, with my eyes open, to do anything that I consider will militate against the interests of the country, no matter what it is or what inducement is held out. I must have hard facts, and will not be carried away by what the hon. Minister of Justice tells us he cannot disclose at the present time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend spoke about the monopoly provisions of this contract. Will he tell me what they are?

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Yes, I will endeavour to. In the first place, I suppose the hon. Minister of Justice has read this bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—If he has I think he ought to know what those provisions are, because he is looked upon as being a wise man. Clause four reads:

4. For five years from the 1st September, 1898, no line of railway shall be authorized by parliament to be constructed from Lynn Canal or thereabouts, or from any point at or near the International boundary between Canada and Alaska into the Yukon district, and for five years from said date no aid in land or money shall be granted to any person or company other than the contractors and the contractors' company to assist in building any such railway.

They have got the government by the throat under that clause, and they will squeeze them, but not with my consent or I am satisfied, the consent of the Senate The hon. gentleman says he read the bill but I think if he had he would not ask me to point out these provisions.

Another provision reads:

5. The contractors and the contractors' company shall be entitled to receive in preference to any other person or company during ten years from the said 1st of September, 1898, such aid or assistance in land or money as the government may be authorized.

We will have to take what the government sees fit to grant, and we see what they are granting at present, which is 4,000,000 acres for 150 miles of tramway. The clause continues:

And may see fit to grant in aid of a line of railway from the Stikine River to an ocean port in British Columbia, provided that the contractors or contractors' company are willing to undertake the construction of the same at once and completion thereof within a reasonable time upon receiving notice thereof from the government.

There has been a good deal said about gambling. I do not object to the ministers gambling and playing poker with one another, but when they attempt to gamble away the best interests of the people, I strongly object. I am opposed to it altogether, and the people of the country are opposed to it, but to say that the Senate would allow this bill to pass as it is now, I think is absurd. The Minister of Justice tells us we cannot amend it. You cannot very well improve a rotten egg when the shell is cracked. It smells bad enough, and we do not want to touch it or amend it. If we throw it out entirely, the people of this country will say the Senate have done their duty ; no matter how much the government try to work up popular feeling against the Senate of this country, they are unable to to it. The Senate are going to save this country from a grasping monopoly which is attempted to be fastened upon it by this bill. I am satisfied the government will not be able to accomplish their object, because I have the same confidence in the Senate that I have in myself. I know it will do its duty. I can see the hand writing on the wall that the bill has got to go. I know the government are saying, "Well, we have hopes yet," but they had better make their peace with the people of the country and not try to force the bill through the House, because I know the Senate will reject it. I ask the House to throw it out, to bury it so that the people of this country will know nothing more about it, and I think we will bury it twenty-four feet under ground. They say the frost goes down very deep in the Klondike and I want to bury below the frost limit. I may be too anxious in the interests of my country that we should dispose of this bill. I know the sage from Bothwell feels proud to be in this House and I can assure hon. gentlemen I have the highest opinion of his ability in every respect, but I think he is half-hearted. I think he feels a good deal with me on this occasion.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Unless my hon. friend is concealing his love.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The hon. gentleman spoke half-heartedly on this question. His heart was not in it, or he would have given us a different speech. He may be trying a little harder now. Perhaps his colleagues have found fault with him and said he was a little squeamish about supporting the bill, and they did not approve of that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not in the least.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Do you approve of the bill?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—You say you do accord with this bill?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I tell my hon. friend I approve of the bill ; I believe it is in the public interest ; I believe it will be a calamity to reject it.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I hope the hon. gentleman will explain what the calamity is. The hon. gentleman told us in the beginning that if we knew what he did we would pass the bill but when I ask him for the information he will not give it to us. What am I to do? If I do wrong the hon. gentleman is responsible, not I. As it is now six o'clock, and the House does not wish to sit to-night, I move the adjournment of the debate, and that it be made the first Order of the Day on Monday.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate then adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Monday, 28th March, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'Clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

EQUIPMENT OF THE MILITIA.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved :

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, all papers, letters, telegrams, reports, recommendations, contracts, payments and correspondence, between the Department of Militia and any person or persons whatsoever, and also, all reports and Orders in Council in connection with equipment of the militia force, referring to the Oliver, the Lewis and the Merrian patents.

The motion was agreed to.

DELAYED RETURNS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY rose to Ask the government when, if at all, he may expect the papers to be brought down to the Senate, that he, by Address to His Excellency the Governor General, asked for on the 18th of February last.

He said: In asking this question, I may say that I do so with considerable reluctance. When I first asked for this information, the hon. leader of the House requested me to put a notice on the paper. I did so, but have never had the return brought down. To-day papers asked for on the 18th of March, have been furnished promptly while mine, moved for a month before, have not been produced yet. The delay is a gross insult to the Senate and to the House. I see it announced that since last summer the government have permitted 11,000 gallons of liquor to be taken into the Yukon, contrary to the policy they announced when appealing to the people. They advertised themselves far and near as a prohibition party and here they allow 11,000 gallons of liquor to be taken into the Yukon country, out of which 30,000 or 40,000 gallons will no doubt be made and sold. Everybody knows what the result is likely to be. Nothing incites to crime and debauchery like intoxicating liquor, yet the government permit this large quantity of liquor to be taken into the Yukon country where there is but a small police force to maintain law and order. I say it is a grievous wrong and outrage. I ask the minister am I to have these papers or am I not? Are my questions to be treated with contempt? If so, I shall address a letter to His Excellency to ascertain whether, when the Senate asks for papers, the government shall be permitted to refuse to bring them down.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I can assure the hon. senator that if the return is not already in his hands, it has been through no fault of mine. The notice of the hon. member went through the Secretary of State's office to the department in which those papers are, and I received this memo. a few minutes ago:

The return moved for by the Hon. Mr. Perley and about which he has given notice he will inquire to-day will be brought down to-morrow.

The hon. gentleman must know that at this season of the year the number of returns moved for is very large. In the various departments they are being made out in the order in which they are carried, either in one House or the other, and although I would have been highly pleased if the hon. gentleman's request could have been complied with sooner, I can assure him the delay has not been due to any fault on my part or on the part of my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Scott), nor has there been any disposition to act discourteously towards any member of the House.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to direct the attention of the leader of the House to a paragraph which has been going the rounds of the papers to the effect that the reading of the second reading of the bill now before the House has been delayed to enable the government to correspond with the Imperial authorities in reference to increasing the number of members in this House. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman whether there is any truth in that statement. Of course, we know that many rumours of that kind appear in the newspapers without any authority.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not think there is any authority for that statement.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We also know that very important questions and very important movements of the government are foreshadowed by newspaper paragraphs given at the instance of the ministers, and as this is a very important matter affecting this House, I thought it my duty to call attention to it and ask if there is really any authority for the statement which has been published.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I can say to my hon. friend that there is no authority for the statement which has been made.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is quite satisfactory.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (C) "An Act for the relief of Edwin Heyward."—(Hon. Mr. Clemow.)

Bill (D) "An Act for the relief of James Pearson."—(Hon. Mr. Clemow.)

THE CANADIAN YUKON RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

DEBATE CONTINUED.

The Order of the Day being called,—

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the Second Reading (Bill 6) "An Act to confirm an agreement between Her Majesty and William Mackenzie and Donald D. Mann, and to incorporate the Canadian Yukon Railway Company;" and the motion in amendment of the Honourable Mr. Macdonald (B.C.), that the said bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM said: I was dealing with this important bill last Friday when the House adjourned at six o'clock. In the first place, I take exception to the impression which the Minister of Justice wanted to convey to this House, that Sir Charles Tupper was to a certain extent in favour of this bill. The leader of the opposition in the other House has spoken in favour of the route, but has not said one word in favour of the bill. Can my hon. friend the Minister of Justice show where Sir Charles Tupper said that he was in favour of this contract? We may all be in favour of the route when we get more information, but I do not think you will find a majority in this House in favour of this contract. My hon. friend thinks that those who belonged to the Conservative party before they came into the Senate will be influenced to vote for this measure by stating that Sir Charles Tupper was in favour of the contract. In the first place Sir Charles Tupper did not make any statement that he was in favour of this bill; and in the second place, it would take a good deal of influence to have the hon. gentlemen here do anything but what is right, reasonable and proper, and what they believe to be in the interests of the people of this country. That is what we are here for, and that is what we are going to do, at least what I intend to do. I have always acted in this House irrespective of party, and why should I not do it now when I feel that the country is at our back? I feel that nine-tenths of the people of this country, irrespective of party, are against this bill. This contract before us, I see, is not the bill as originally presented to parliament. It has been amended. Let us see what the amendment is. My hon. friend the other day wanted me to point out what I objected to in the bill, and I asked him if he had read the bill. He said he had. I wonder if he read this:

No member of the House of Commons shall be admitted to any share or part in this contract or to any benefit arising therefrom.

That is what is said in the second arrangement. Why this? Probably my hon. friend the Minister of Justice can tell us. I suppose he will tell us, "On account of the Independence of Parliament Act." I often think, when I look across at my hon. friend, of the days when he used to be in the House of Commons, how he used to thunder forth with eloquence, his breast heaving with indignation, that members of parliament should not accept favours of the Crown. But why was not the Senate included in this amendment? What was it omitted for? It is an invitation to the Senate, "Come in, gentlemen; share with us in this contract, and take some of this gold; if it is not a land flowing with milk and honey, it is a land full of gold." For the life of me, I cannot tell who has a share in this contract or who has not. When the vote is taken, and gentlemen explain themselves, then I can probably form a better idea on the subject. I cannot do it now. But why should my hon. friends, the Minister of Justice and the Secretary of State, have preference in taking stock in this concern and putting it through parliament, and the rest of the government be excluded? It is only because they are in the Senate. When I think over the matter, what about the Minister of the Interior, who laboured so hard to have this brought before parliament? Why is he excluded, the man that concocted and conceived and brought forth this bill—this diabolical bill, I may say? Just look at the trouble he has had, to say nothing of the trouble he had to keep away from Hamilton Smith, so that he could not make him an offer. The Minister of the Interior is excluded from having any share in this contract, but my friends, the Minister of Justice and the Secretary of State, can each have a share. I do not say at all that Mackenzie & Mann have tried that game in this House, but you can read between the lines of this bill any way, and it is clear in my mind that it can be used in that way, and it is done for that intention, no doubt.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The hon. gentleman says "Oh, oh;" if that was not the reason, why do they amend the bill in that way? I think they are excluded by the Independence of Parliament Act. It was to enable them to say to the Senate, you can come in and share with us—and I do not know to-day whether they have a share in it or not. One wealthy man has pronounced in favour of this bill, and I do not know yet how many others there may be. Then look at this question : the government newspapers are down on what they call the Tory Senate. I say the Senate is not here to carry out the wishes of any government; they are here to do what they think is right and proper. When we had a Conservative government in the other House we opposed and defeated some of their measures. This bill before us is a thousand times—yes ten thousand times more iniquitous than the Short Line Railway was. That Short Line Bill came to the Senate from the other House endorsed by 36 of a majority. I remember well the attitude on that occasion of the Globe and other papers which now support the government. They endorsed the action of my hon. friend from Richmond when he moved the six months' hoist to that bill, and I was proud to be here to record my vote with him, as I am proud to be here to-day to record my vote against this bill. As I have said I am surprised at my friend the Minister of Justice who always stood up for the independence of parliament, now opening the door and almost inviting the Senate to come in and share a portion of this contract. But, sir, with all the blandishment and whatever they have used they have not succeeded, not very far yet. Why this change of the Minister of Justice? Why this change of my hon. friend, the Secretary of State? They are mum; they do not say anything about it. Is it because they are shackled with the chains of office and have given up their former professions, shackled with a chain of seven links, each link representing $1,000? That is the only way I can account for it. The hon. gentleman from Toronto (Sir Frank Smith) told us the other day he has plenty of money and did not want any from anybody. The government organs stated that Sir Frank Smith was coming to Ottawa and would fix the Senate—that he had influence and would be able to carry the bill, but when he came here he did not find that the Senate were going in with him. I do not say that Sir Frank Smith has any share in this matter, but the door is open for him. The government of the day invited him to come and share with them—in fact, they invited all the senators to go in with him. I ask my colleagues are you going in with the government and I say if you do, you will be marked men in this country—all who vote for this iniquitous bill will be regarded as having a share in this contract. I want to read to you what a eulogy the Toror to Globe pronounced on Sir Frank Smith when it found that he favoured the bill :

SIR FRANK SMITH AND THE BILL.

The people of Toronto know Sir Frank Smith well, and with all who are acquainted with him the approval of the Yukon Railway contract, which he has publicly expressed, will carry peculiar weight. What renders his opinion especially valuable is his immense and universally admitted executive ability and his wide experience in business matters. No better judge of a business proposition or of the terms of a contract could easily be named among Canadian public men. To his practical sagacity, his strong grasp of affairs, he adds a keen public spirit and conspicuous fairness of mind and independence. He has always been looked upon as a man who could be relied upon to come to his own conclusion upon a matter, and to stick to that conclusion with a tenacity which would be absolutely unshaken by the considerations which ordinarily move a partisan. He stands in public life to-day as a man who has nothing to hope for or to fear. He has won his place in the world of business and of politics, and occupies a position of complete independence, from which he can scrutinize any proposal untouched by the reasons which often appeal so forcibly to the politician who owes or hopes to owe some advantage to other politicians. The opinion of Sir Frank Smith and a few other senators of his calibre on a business arrangement is worth far more than that of all the other Conservative senators put together.

That is the Toronto Globe for you; the Hon. Sir Frank Smith knows it all and we know nothing. I do not think that our colleague from Toronto would go so far as that. I might go on reading from the government press eulogies that they have passed on this government, but I will not make what my hon. friend from Richmond described as a scrap-book speech. Let us look a little more at this tramway. Is there any such thing in the history of the world? They tell you it is an all-Canadian route. From Victoria to the mouth of the Stikine is 800 miles; from the mouth of the Stikine to Glenora, the port of commencement, is 130 miles; from Glenora to Teslin Lake is 165 miles. That is the railway the contractors agree to build. Some put it at 150 miles, but I question if we could get there with 150 miles. From Teslin Lake to Dawson is 450 miles, making in all 1,545 miles from Victoria, of which about 150 miles is this tramway for the construction of which the government give away more than four million acres of land. It is really 4,125,000 acres of land. Until a few days ago these contractors were going to carry this bill through parliament. They thought they could influence the senators by saying to them "Come in and take a share of this. Take a share of all the good things with us," but I do not think the senators will respond to that. I am perfectly sure they will not. They would be committing treason against the people of this country if they passed this bill, and a celebrated British statesman says that treason to the people is more heinous than treason to the Crown. I say to my colleagues stand to your guns; let us throw this bill out. I am not opposed to a railway to the Yukon if they bring in a reasonable bill and give reasonable money or money's worth for it, but I want them in the first place to advertise for tenders over the world and give the contract to the lowest tenderer.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—And I believe that we will get it done cheaply and we should have more information about this route before we adopted it. The gentlemen governing the country have been throwing the country into debt all over and they do not care what they do. Look what a grand corrupt on fund this would be if they passed this bill. Some people are uncharitable enough to say it has been used already. I do not say so but I expect to see some evidence of it brought out in the election cases in the province of Ontario. I am looking for it and think it will come. I fancy I could put my finger on the man that supplied a large amount of that money to corrupt the province of Ontario. I do not say so, as a fact, because, as I said the other day, I am afraid to say all I know, but of course I can think about it if I do not think about it too loudly. I have shown the House in my humble way, what the effect will be if we pass this bill, and I think I have shown why it should not be passed, and it is the most outrageous and diabolical bill ever presented to parliament. I ask the Minister of Justice if he could, with his extensive reading, point me out where there was any bill of this character introduced in any parliament in the world. He may be able to do it, but he has failed to do it so far. The press of the government are trying to make the Senate depart from the path of virtue, but from the letters I have been receiving from day to day, I believe that nine-tenths of the people of this country, irrespective of party, are at our back. We must bury this bill down as low as the frost goes in the Klondike. I said on Friday that I thought the Senate would bury it 24 feet deep but I think now it will go a little deeper.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat has said, the question before the House is an important one, and the action of the Senate upon this measure is likely to be of very serious consequence to the vast number of persons who are interested directly and indirectly in the Canadian Yukon country; it is also such a measure that the way in which we deal with it will be a matter of very great consequence as to the estimation in which the Senate is held throughout Canada. To the government it is not of so much consequence. The government have embodied their policy, with respect to establishing better communication to the Yukon country for the season of 1898 and 1899, in the bill now before us. If the House rejects the bill the government are relieved from responsibility for what may happen between the present time and the summer of 1899, and that responsibility is assumed by this House. It stands to reason therefore that we should deal with the measure with a full sense of the responsibility which attaches to our actions. Whether we pass this bill or not is largely, chiefly, in fact, a business question, and the question should be dealt with from a business point of view.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Business is business.

Hon. Mr. POWER—While I do not deny that the bill has been discussed in that way to a certain extent, I cannot say that it has been exclusively considered in that way. I cannot say that it has been considered with an entire absence of those prejudices and partial affections which we pray every day that our deliberations may be free from. Have we looked at the measure on its own merits alone? I do not think any hon. gentleman can truly say that we have.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I can.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am glad the hon. gentleman's conscience is so clear.

Several Hon. GENTLEMEN—I can, I can. So say we all.

Hon. Mr. POWER—My question is, have we all looked at the measure on its merits alone? The hon. gentleman from Monck illustrates the point which I am trying to make. That hon. gentleman tried to leave the impression on this House that there was, in a clause of the contract before us, an inducement held out to members of this House to be bribed, in fact, to support this measure. The hon. gentleman was not satisfied with making that broad, general statement, but he gave point to his remarks by referring to the action of the hon. senator from Toronto (Sir Frank Smith) who usually supports the opposition, but who has undertaken to support the government on this measure. Could anything show how far—I do not say party feeling, but how far prejudice will carry a member of this House than that—that an upright, honourable man like the hon. gentleman from Monck should dream of accusing the hon. gentleman from Toronto, a man whose character stands as high as that of any gentleman anywhere—

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I did not accuse anybody of anything of the kind. I read an article from the Toronto Globe, and that is all.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman went further than that. Mackenzie & Mann and the government of Canada together have not money enough to bribe the hon. gentleman from Toronto to do what his conscience does not approve of. Look at the effect, if this kind of argument is to be tolerated? What will the effect be of the line of argument adopted by the hon. gentleman from Monck? It will simply be to deter any gentleman here from exercising his independent opinion if that opinion leads him to support this bill. The hon. gentleman tells him distinctly that the finger of scorn will be pointed at him as a man who has been bribed. Is that a proper argument to address to this House? I do not think any one who stops to think will say that it is. Now, what is this clause? I should look at it in a different light altogether from the hon. gentleman from Monck. It might be that the members of the House of Commons were susceptible of being influenced in an improper way, out the government thought the senators would be above that and did not make any provision for it. I wish to direct attention to the fact that in the Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons which contains provisions for the independence of parliament, are provisions made applicable to the House of Commons which are not made applicable to the Senate. For instance, section nine of that Act applies to the House of Commons altogether. There are a number of provisions which do not apply to the Senate. There is just one general section applying to the Senate and that is section 18, which applies to this contract as well as to any other contract. You cannot disqualify a senator except as he is disqualified by the British North America Act. My hon. friend from Monck illustrates the impartial and independent way in which this measure is regarded. Now, take the contractors, Mackenzie & Mann; they are admitted to be, and must be admitted to be, most capable and responsible and reputable contractors, who have carried out previous public contracts in a most satisfactory manner. The Minister of the Interior is a man of ability. I do not think any one denies that; and he is a man against whom no charge of corruption or malfeasance in office has ever been made. One would suppose, under these circumstances, that an agreement made between the government on the one part, and the contractors on the other, would be considered solely on its merits; but it has been far otherwise. We have been regaled here with stories as to the amount of money the contractors may have made on other business transactions, one in the city of Toronto and the other in connection with a railway built by them in the province of Manitoba. The hon. gentleman who referred to this latter matter spoke of it as a deal between the Manitoba government and the contractors, at a time when the present Minister of the Interior was a member of the Manitoba government. He was not the member of the government who had to deal most directly with the contractors. These things have no relevancy to the matter before the House at all. We have to assume, as all the evidence goes to show, that the contractors are reputable men, and that the action of the government is honest and bona fide. With respect to the Lake Dauphin Railway, the hon. gentleman from Brandon was in error. The fact is that this Lake Dauphin Railway received 6,400 acres a mile and a subsidy of $40,000 a year from the late government of the Dominion, and all that the Manitoba government did in the matter, in order to secure the construction of the road, was to guarantee the interest on the bonds; and the probabilities are that the province will not be called upon to pay any of that interest at all. Then, the mining regulations made by the government for the Yukon country have been brought into the discussion. They have no relevance to the merits of this agreement at all. I take the speech made by another hon. gentleman as illustrating the point of view from which this measure is regarded. Take the hon. gentleman from Murray Harbour, as a general thing, a fair and earnest man. The hon. gentleman told us that there was urgency in the spring of 1897—that there was an urgent demand at that time for action by the government; but he wound up by saying there was no urgency for action now. There were a few hundreds of people in the Klondike region in the spring of 1897.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—The hon. gentleman is astray in saying that I considered there was urgency in the spring of 1897. What I meant to say was this, that in the opinion of the government, by their advertisements and public regulations of that date, they must have considered it necessary at that time—there was urgency in their minds at that time.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman took the ground that there was no urgency at the present time and that the people who had got in there, or would go in there, could get out again as best they could; but he maintained that the government should have known there was urgency in the spring of 1897. The hon. gentleman again said that a railway of three feet gauge could not begin to do work between the Klondike region and the outside world, and then he told us in the next breath that no railway at all was necessary. Hon. gentlemen can see that, without intending it, they are all more or less influenced by, shall I say, their party feelings? We are not supposed to have any party feelings in this House, and I shall say prejudices. I propose to look at this contract as a matter of business as far as my party feeling will allow me. This measure was discussed at considerable length during the debate on the address in reply to His Excellency's speech. It seems to me that nearly everything that was necessary to be told about it was stated then. It is a fact the government have introduced a measure, some measure being absolutely necessary. They selected a route which would be a portion of any route into Canada. The bulk of the railway which is proposed to be built under this agreement would be an essential portion of any railway built to connect the Klondike region with Canada, whether it is to connect it with Edmonton, with Ashcroft or with Port Simpson. The work is necessary. The route that has been selected is, on the face of it, the best Canadian route, the best in the interest of Canada, that could be selected, because with respect to the Edmonton route and the Ashcroft route, they could not be available for three years at any rate, and it is necessary there should be something that can be utilized next fall. The grant to the contractors is not an unreasonable consideration. No money is taken out of the pockets of the people of the country. It is true that a very small proportion of lands which are supposed to be mineral lands, of the Yukon country is to be administered and exploited by the contractors and not by the government. I might say here that the hon. gentleman from Murray Harbour (Mr. Prowse) proved to his own satisfaction, and I think to the satisfaction of the House, that a free miner would sooner deal with Mackenzie & Mann than with the government. If that is the case, the more land given to Mackenzie & Mann the better. It just shows how far our prejudices will carry us. The hon gentleman denounced the government for giving so much land to Mackenzie & Mann, and in a few moments he proved that it was better for the free miner that the contractors should exploit those lands.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Why? Because there is one per cent royalty to Mackenzie & Mann as against ten per cent to the government.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am not saying why it was; we are dealing with the agreement as we have it. I do not think really that it ought to be necessary to say very much more, but this question has been enveloped and embarrassed by so many side issues and so many statements which are not accurate, and so many objections have been taken, that it is necessary to deal with it at some little length. I do not think that any hon. gentleman who listened to the speech of the hon. the Minister of Justice when he moved the second reading of the bill can deny that it was the duty of the government, charged as they were with the administration of the public business of this country, to furnish better means of ingress and egress for passengers, and better means of transporting freight into that country, supplies chiefly, than exist at present. We know from the newspapers that there are, at the present time, thousands of people on the shore of the Lynn Canal, that there are at any rate hundreds and I believe thousands of people at Wrangel; and we know from the newspapers, and the best sources, that the trains on the railways going to the west are filled with persons going into the Klondike regions. It was only the other day that the vice-president of one of the largest railway corporations, said that his impression was that this season there would be 150,000 people in that Klondike region. It is all very well for hon. gentlemen to say, as the hon. gentleman from Murray Harbour (Mr. Prowse) said, let them come out as they got in, but we have to make allowances for the weakness of human nature. If people were all perfect, legislation would not be necessary, but we have to legislate with a view to human weakness, and the government would be blamed, and would be justly blamed, if famine and disorder, and possibly rebellion, prevailed next autumn and winter in that country. The government would be censured if they made no serious efforts to prevent that result; and there is another point, hon. gentlemen—supposing people do find gold in that country, the cost of everything, the cost of getting in supplies, the cost of living is so exorbitant at the present time, that unless a man finds a relatively immense quantity of gold, he makes nothing out of it; and it is the duty of the government of this country to take some steps to make the means of living cheaper in that region, to enable people to live there at some reasonable rate. Hon. gentlemen are aware, of course, that in the case of the Irish famine of 1846-47, great fault was found with the Imperial government because they had not made provision to deal with that calamity until the famine had become a fact. In the same way, in our own country, in the case of the North-west rebellion of 1885, fault was found, and justly found, with the government of that day, because they had not taken steps to guard against the result which followed. The old proverb is perfectly true, that "an ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure;" and the government have here given us the ounce of prevention and, possibly, if this bill is rejected, next year we shall have to provide the pound of cure. To illustrate the danger which may arise in that country later on, it is only necessary to call attention to the fact that a boat loaded with supplies for our own police, going up the Yukon River, were held up on the United States territory and the supplies taken out of her. That was a case when there were probably only four or five thousand people in that region. How will it be when the number is increased to fifty or one hundred thousand? Some hon. gentlemen say that the government knew, or ought to have known, last summer that there was urgent need of action, and should have taken that action early enough to have time to advertise for tenders and to make the contract in the way in which such contracts are best made, after giving due advertisement for parties to come in and tender. We all recognize that, if practicable, that is the proper way to give contracts for public works; but we have to consider the circumstances, and I cannot see how any hon. gentleman who has carefully read the speech of the Minister of the Interior on the second reading of this bill in the other House, could fail to find the whole matter explained. The minister stated, in brief, that while it was known that gold was being found in large quantities in that region, and that a considerable number of men were going in, no one had any idea, until late in the summer, that there was going to be such a tremendous influx into the Klodike region as is actually taking place; and when, towards the latter part of the summer, it became clear that thousands of people were going in there, and that a good many more people would be in there this year, the government had to decide upon some line of action. Now, let us see whether the government acted in a business like way in the matter. The Minister of the Interior, the member of the government, perhaps, who was specially charged with the interests of the Yukon country, went out, at the same time Major Walsh went, n the middle of September, and saw for himself the conditions of things on the Lynn Canal and its neighbourhood. Then the engineer employed by the government, Mr. Jennings, started from Glenora on the 25th September. I wish to point out that the government lost no time, once they were satisfied it was necessary to do something, and something out of the ordinary course of business.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—How about the delay from the 5th September up to December?

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the hon. gentleman will pay strict attention I shall satisfy him. Mr. Jennings started from Glenora on the 25th September. He was at Teslin Lake, making a survey of the country between Stikine and Teslin Lake, on the 13th of October. Then he sent Mr. Saint Cyr, one of his subordinate engineers, and Mr. Morley Ogilvie to survey Teslin Lake and Hootalinqua River. That was business like and absolutely necessary. It would have been a most foolish thing to have undertaken to build the railway from the Stikine River to Teslin Lake, if the lake itself, and the Hootalinqua and Lewes Rivers down to Dawson, were not navigable; and Mr. Saint Cyr's duty was to ascertain that fact. Saint Cyr and Ogilvie examined Teslin Lake and found it was navigable for steamers. Then they went down the Hootalinqua River and satisfied themselves that that river and the Lewes River were also navigable for steamers. Mr. Jennings having sent these gentlemen north, came back himself over the route between Teslin Lake and Stikine River, and reached Wrangel on the 25th October. There he was met by the Minister of the Interior. Mr. Saint Cyr's survey began on the 14th October and was completed on the 27th October. That survey was essential. The work could not be undertaken without that report. Mr. Saint Cyr naturally took some time to get from the Hootalinqua River to civilization again, and Mr. Saint Cyr's report was dated on the 6th January, 1898. This report of Mr. Saint Cyr was covered by a report of Mr. Jennings dated 11th January, 1898. The report of Mr. Jennings reached the government here I think on the 13th January, 1898. Hon. gentlemen will see there was not very much time left then to advertise for tenders. It will appear at any rate later on that there was not

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The government did not use Jennings's report at all.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman is quite mistaken. Saint Cyr's report and Jennings's report were essential elements in the bargain; they could not have made a bargain without these reports, because they would have been doing a very foolish thing if they had. Just at this juncture, a very few days after the government had received the report of Mr. Jennings, covering the report of Mr. Saint Cyr, they were engaged, I believe, in negotiations with Mackenzie & Mann, who were on the ground and were capable contractors, and when it has been stated that the government were negotiating in the dark and that the secresy which characterized the transaction was intended to prevent competition. What are the facts? Maitland Kersey made an offer to the government on the 20th December, when he became acquainted with the facts—he was here and talked with the Minister of the Interior. There was no effort made to keep from him the fact that the government were negotiating with Mackenzie & Mann about this matter, and on the 22nd January he wrote to the Minister of the Interior, in which he proposed to consult his principals in England. He was allowed two days for the purpose of doing it, which he thought was ample. My hon. colleague from Halifax probably does not think so. He would probably take longer to deliberate over the matter, as he generally does to make his mind up; but the gentlemen in England, the principals with whom Kersey had been in correspondence did not need any more than that time, and Kersey did not ask any more. And on the 23rd January, Mr. Maitland Kersey declined to tender. His letter is as follows:

OTTAWA, 23rd January, 1898.

SIR,—With reference to the offer which I made to you on behalf of my syndicate in early December, and to the conversation which I had the pleasure of having with you on Friday last, in relation to the construction of a wagon road and railway from Glenora to Teslin Lake, I have to advise you, after consultation with London, that we deem it inadvisable to make a further offer to the government which would of necessity involve the guaranteed completion of the line by the first of September next, and which offer would have to be based on a land grant unaccompanied by any cash subsidy.

Here were people who were in the business of building railways in that country, and who were erecting mills on Teslin Lake and building steam boats on Teslin Lake, gentlemen with unlimited capital, and they were able, but not prepared, to undertake what Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann have undertaken to do. One reason for urgency which I may mention and which has not been referred to till the present time is, that it was deemed to be an essential thing that Mackenzie & Mann should get their plant and their men up the Stikine before the ice broke up in the spring. It has happened this year that the ice has broken up earlier than usual, and although Mackenzie & Mann put their men on the ground immediately, the ice had actually begun to break up in the river and the men had great difficulty indeed in getting up. So hon. gentlemen will see that, as it was essential that this road should be completed, and this new means of access to the Yukon should be opened by the 1st September in order to get supplies in to feed the people there during the winter, and in order that those who were anxious to get out should have an opportunity to get out—it was also essential that no time should be lost, and it was deemed essential that the contractors' men should get up the Stikine River before the ice broke up. So far as to the question of urgency. There is no doubt, if ever there was a clear case of urgency this is the case, and I think the government were perfectly justified in the action which they took. With respect to the offer made by Mr. Hamilton Smith, I do not propose to say very much, but I say this, hon. gentlemen—I may perhaps refer to the terms of the offer later on—but with respect to the dealings between Mr. Hamilton Smith and the government, I think it is perfectly —I do not like to use a word which may not be deemed complimentary to the views held by some of my hon. friends for whom I have great respect—but to suppose a gentleman who represented British capitalists should be here at the time these negotiations were going on and when offers were made by Maitland Kersey and a gentleman from Montreal, J. Wesley Allison, and when Mr. Hamilton Smith knew, as his correspondence and statements show he knew, that the government were considering the matter of making a contract for a railway into the Yukon country, to suppose that he should be here with the capital behind him anxious to construct that road, and that he should never communicate with the government is something that passes belief. It is alleged that he told some third party that he refers to, to tell the government that he was anxious to make an offer, but the third party says that Mr. Hamilton Smith never requested him to do that; but is it not perfectly ridiculous to suppose that a gentleman who was here, prepared to make an offer and anxious to make an offer, should not have done what every sensible man would do, gone to the government and made his offer. Would not that be the common sense line of action. Do hon. gentlemen think it is the duty of the Minister of the Interior, or any other minister, to go hunting around hotels in Ottawa to find a man who is prepared to make an offer? The thing is absurd. So far with respect to the question of urgency. I propose to say something now with reference to the question of route, and my hon. friend from Monck has made a suggestion with regard to this matter that I think it is well to act upon. He referred to the opinion of the leader of the opposition in the other House upon this bill. I am not dealing with the merits of the bill; I am dealing with the question of route; and let us see what Sir Charles Tupper said to the correspondent of the Mail and Empire in January:

> He stated that the route chosen is the best that could have been selected. "When I was in the west," he said, "I made inquiries and I reached the conclusion that Canada ought, at the earliest possible moment, to have communication with the Yukon. I impressed it upon the British Columbia government that it should co-operate with the Dominion government to insure the construction of a link between the Stikine River and Teslin Lake. At Winnipeg I declared that the undertaking was a necessity, and when I returned to Ottawa I went immediately to Mr. Sifton. I impressed upon him the absolute necessity of opening up the route to secure Canadian trade.
>
> As to the arrangements made with Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, Sir Charles Tupper said that they were men who had the capital, resources and energy to carry it out. They were, probably, the only men in Canada who could put the undertaking through in the time that was specified.
>
> Sir Charles considers that the government ought to have acted with more promptness. That much valuable time had been lost, and if his suggestions had been acted upon, the project would be in an advanced state by now.
>
> The fact that a trail was to be put through in six weeks, so that the distance between the Stikine River and Teslin Lake may be covered in three days, is in his judgment, of great importance. He thinks shelters should be erected at suitable places for the accommodation of the flood of traffic that will go in.
>
> The completien of the road by September is slower work than might have been done had the question been grappled with earlier. Still, it will be of the utmost importance to Canadian interests.

Sir Charles gives the government credit for acting with such vigour as it has shown, and asserts that the opening of the Canadian route was strongly urged by him upon both governments interested as the proper course to pursue. He does not anticipate any trouble with the United States in transferring cargoes from the ocean boats to river boats at Wrangel.

If, however, such should happen, Canada has Port Simpson to fall back upon, which will be equally serviceable.

Now, hon. gentlemen, whatever weight the hon. gentleman from Monck and other hon. gentlemen may give the opinion of the Minister of Justice or of the Secretary of State, they are bound to attach some considerable weight to the opinion of their own leader. His opinion was such that he endorsed the government policy completely as regards the route and the urgency. Sir Charles Tupper is not the only business man who has endorsed the route. I find that some two days ago, there was a meeting of the Montreal Board of Trade and that board passed a resolution urging the construction of a railway from Teslin Lake to Port Simpson, and the immediate construction—during the coming season—of the railway from Stikine to Teslin Lake. I understand that the Board of Trade of Toronto have adopted a similar resolution.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Do they approve of the land grant?

Hon. Mr. POWER—They endorsed the route that has been adopted by the government. I am now dealing with the question of route. There have been different routes spoken of here as being preferable to the route adopted by the government. There is the Yukon River route. I do not rest on my own authority with respect to that. I quote from the speech of the Minister of the Interior:

> The Yukon River route involves an ocean passage from a Pacific coast port to St. Michael's at the mouth of the Yukon River, on the coast of Alaska. From St. Michael's by a river steamboat, the passenger goes to Dawson City through the United States territory of Alaska, a distance of about 1,600 miles. The Yukon is a river that, during the early portion of the season, contains sufficient water to float river steamboats carrying freight to the amount of about 500 tons. These steamboats make one trip, fully loaded, from St. Michael's to Dawson City and return. They generally are able to make a second trip, but very seldom fully loaded. That is the information we have from the transportation companies on that river. The boats go up and down twice in the season, and make no more than two trips in the course of the year, and on the second trip, on account of low water, they are not able to take a boat-laod.. There are two companies doing business on that river, the North American Transportation Company and the Alaska Commercial Company; and those are the only companies we can rely on actually to get freight up that river. Other people are building boats and intend to take them up the river next spring, but there is no certainty of those boats reaching Dawson City. The great difficulty arises from—and I need only mention the difficulty to realize the fact that a similar difficulty is met with in navigating all western rivers, and of course it applies to a river 1,600 miles long—the shoals and obstructions, which remove any certainty of boats getting up the river unless conducted by experienced men, knowing fully the navigation of the river. Some of the boats under construction may get up, but there is no assurance that they will get as far as Dawson City next season. There is also the danger connected with that route, as regards getting provisions and supplies up the river, that it may not be made available for Canadian use. There are gold developments on the American side of the line, and these may lead the Americans to use their transportation facilities for the benefit of their own people, and we are liable to be told that the supplies carried are needed for their own settlements, and thus left without any facilities. Now, the combined transportation facilities of the two companies upon the Yukon route, next year, will be about 40,000 tons for all purposes whatever.

Hon. gentlemen, if you do not think the Minister of the Interior is, for all purposes whatever, good authority, I shall quote another authority whom hon. gentlemen would apparently think higher of than one of Her Majesty's ministers for Canada. The work which I am now about to quote from is the little book entitled "An appeal of Yukon miners to the Dominion of Canada," which hon. gentlemen have, perhaps, seen, and I propose to quote what Mr. Livernash says on behalf of himself and his colleagues, on page 68, with respect to the Yukon River:

> Those companies which promise great things as a result of navigation on the Lower Yukon, should be considered in the light of that experience which has shown the Lower Yukon to have as many moods as a woman, and to present problems with which the most skilful river captains are often unable to cope. It may be worth while to remember that more than 800 passengers, whom the Alaska Commercial Company and the North American Trading and Transportation Company undertook to carry to Dawson by way of St. Micheal, fewer than fifty were landed at destination, and that nearly all the efforts of the latter company to get steamers as far up as Dawson signally failed, yet these corporations have for years been studying the Yukon.

Now, apart altogether, hon. gentlemen, from the objection to the Yukon River on the ground that it is an all-United States route there is the evidence given from a gentleman, who is himself a United States citizen, that it is quite unsuitable for the purposes for which it is required.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is not an all-United States route.

Hon. Mr. POWER—As for the Dyea and Skagway routes, I do not propose to discuss those at any length. They have been discussed in the other House, and discussed here by the Minister of Justice, but I may say that there is one objection, an objection made by the hon. Secretary of State, which is still in force, that customs officials on the Dyea and Skagway routes are still collecting the nine dollars a day for conveying persons across the United States territory from Dyea and Skagway or exacting five per cent duty, but no charge is being made at Wrangel on the Stikine.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is a telegram today from the officials of customs at Victoria. The United States authorities are insisting that we are on their territory at the Height and they are protesting against it and wont allow goods to go through unless they are still accompanied by an officer at the expense of the person and on the payment of five per cent—that is the latest advise we have. It is quite contrary to the arrangement made in January last.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They have refused to recognize our officers at the Height and claim they are on United States territory, that is at the passes above Dyea and Skagway.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Five per cent must be in lieu of the nine dollars to which the hon. gentleman refers, because there is no tariff law that imposes a small duty of this kind.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, it is an arbitrary charge.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Then there is the route by Edmonton which has been spoken of favourably by various hon. gentlemen here. If we live long enough we may get a route by Edmonton, but that route will not be got in time to do anything for the hundred thousand or so who will be in the neighbourhood of Dawson City next fall, and the urgency is simply a result of the necessity of doing something to relieve that region in the latter part of the coming season. With respect to the Stikine River, I think it is better to take the evidence of gentlemen who have on the ground than the evidence of gentlemen who have not been there. I turn to the report of Mr. Jennings with respect to the Stikine River. I am not going to trouble the House with many extracts, but I think it is important that we should have some authoritative statement with respect to the matter. At page five of this report I find the following :

> As Mr. Saint Cyr's survey of Teslin Lake and River and Mr. Ogilvie's work, as mentioned above, will form the subject of a later report, I will now only mention that Teslin Lake was found to be 60 miles long and from 2 to 4 wide, generally straight and with good depth of water and teeming with magnificent trout. The Teslin River, from north end of lake continues for 25 miles (to McClintock Portage) in a generally direct N. N. W. course ; it is wide and of ample depth throughout its whole length for passage of steamers to the Lewes River.

Then, at page 7, Mr. Jennings says :

> The Stikine River is usually navigable for powerful steamboats of suitable design to Glenora or Telegraph Creek, a distance of 150 miles, between the 1st of May and a date sometimes well on in October, dependent, of course, on the openness of the season and the amount of rain and snowfall. Its width varies from half a mile on the lower river to 500 feet above. The depth is generally good and the channel is remarkably free from snags, sunken rocks or boulders, but at Little and Klootchman Cañons respectively 96 and 106 miles from the sea, during high water periods when many drift trees are running, it is with considerable risk that the passage through these contracted reaches are made and delays are common, as drift-wood is liable to become foul of the rudders or wheel. The first 50 miles, or to the Great glacier, is very good water with a moderate current not exceeding three miles per hour, while from this point upwards the channel becomes somewhat more tortuous and contracted, with an increasing general rate of current varying from three to eight miles per hour ; however, the exceptionally swift sections are few and usually not over a half mile in length.

Then in his later report, on page 8 of the pamphlet, he said :

> In reporting on the result of my observations for a railway route between Stikine River and Teslin Lake, B.C., I would, however, first refer to the means of communication between the sea and a suggested point of debarkation on the river, by mentioning that the Stikine has been navigated.

And I wish to direct the attention of the hon. member from Victoria (Mr. Macdonald) to this fact, which he must have been familiar with :

> That the Stikine has been navigated by steamers to Glenora and Telegraph Creek, a distance of from 140 to 150 miles from the sea since the early seventies, when the Dease Lake and Cassiar mining excitement was at its height, but while so navigated during the open season, usually between May 1st and October 20th, the journey has almost invariably been considered slow, tedious and not without danger, partly owing to the inferior class of steamers used and partly to the fluctuating state of the water.

I believe no steamer has ever been lost in the Stikine River, and it must be a practicable route.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If it is not deep enough.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is quite true, but the 4,000,000 acres were not given for the purpose of going into that river.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If my hon. friend could keep his mind off the land grant it would be better. The hon. gentleman appears to have a hatred of the route.

Hon Mr. BOULTON—I should like to call attention to a cartoon in the Toronto Globe, which represents a punt being poled up the Stikine River, one man hauling from the shore and the other man in the boat poling it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Hon. gentlemen all appear to be anxious to discredit the Canadian route, On page 13 I read a further extract :

From a miner who spent the winter of 1896-97 on its shores, I learned that Teslin Lake was frozen over on the 27th October, 1896, and opened on the 18th of May, 1897, also that the lake is well stocked with trout, white "Dagolly" pike, and "Aconu" fish, of which I had evidence when there. This is also reported as a good district for moose and cariboo, also for bears, foxes, beaver and other fur-bearing animals.

I think I have nearly done with Mr. Jennings. At page 14 Mr. Jennings says :

The Hootalinqua River which flows out of Teslin Lake is quite a large stream. It varies greatly in width at different parts of its course, expanding sometimes to half a mile, in which case it is partly obstructed by large bars which however leave a deep though sinuous channel; again in places it divides into several channels thus forming large islands where timber of good size and quality, is generally to be found; while in other parts it narrows down to a single channel a few chains in width.

Then on the next page Saint Cyr, talking about the length of time these rivers are open, says :

Up to November 10th, the day on which I left the river, ice had not formed along its margin, nor did I see any floating down, although the thermometer, for several days, registered as low as 44 below zero, but a steady falling of the water, averaging two inches a day, had, however, been observed..

I think there is not much doubt that the Stikine is a fair and good route, and the special feature about the Stikine route is, as I have said, that that is an essential part of any Canadian line, whether you go to Edmonton or to Ashcroft, or to Port Simpson, you must have the railway from Teslin Lake to the Stikine River; so that it is essential and the government cannot make any mistake in going on with it. I have already referred to some authorities in connection with this Stikine route, but I propose to refer to something which appeared in a Montreal paper on Friday.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—What paper?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The Montreal Gazette. I hope the hon. gentleman will be satisfied with that authority. The article reads :

VANCOUVER, March 24.—Puget Sound merchants have stolen another march on Canadians in connection with the Yukon trade. Eight complete stocks for several supply stores have been landed at Wrangel for Glenora and Teslin Lake, consigned to Yankee traders, who will establish themselves at those points. It is remarkable that Canadian merchants did not foresee that all the travel would go by this route on the opening of navigation and forestall the Americans. If the Canadians do not awake to their opportunities in respect to the Yukon trade, the mercantile business of the region will soon be largely monopolized by United States citizens, just as Seattle has got the lion's share of the outfitting business from Vancouver to Victoria.

Probably the Canadian citizens had been reading the Conservative papers and had come to the conclusion that we were not going to have the railway. Another despatch the same day reads :

Vancouver, B.C., March 24.—Latest reports from Wrangel are that many people are returning from Dyea and Skagway to go up the Stikine River to the gold fields. At Wrangel all Canadian outfits are bonded through without delay or expense. It is expected the Stikine will open early this year, probably about the 20th of April. The reports of widespread sickness at Wrangel are utterly unfounded, the health of the town being good. The block at Sheep Camp, on the Dyea trail still continues. The transfer cable is not in operation as advertised in the east, and no work has been done towards its completion for some time. A conservative estimate is that two-thirds of the gold-seekers now there will be unable to get in. The Skagway route is becoming worse with the setting in of warm weather, and is almost impassable. There are 2,700 dead horses on the trail, and when uncovered by the snow, will emit a horrible stench.

I have not laid much stress on the fact that this Stikine route was a Canadian route, and that consideration I am surprised does not seem to weigh much with a number of hon. gentlemen. There are hon. gentlemen who are prepared to advocate a line to Pyramid Harbour, which will give the control of the railway and of the whole business to the United States for all time.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—How many miles?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think probably some thirty miles in United States territory, and the same way with Dyea and Skagway. But, hon. gentlemen, that has not been the attitude of the Conservative party in the past. It is not very long since this country spent a very large sum, some three million dollars, in building a lock at Sault St. Marie, Now that was not nearly as necessary as the Canadian route in the present instance. Because if difficulties arose and Canadian troops or arms bound for the North-west were not allowed to go through the United States lock, it would be a very simple thing to land on the Canadian shore and march to Lake Superior, a very short distance; and still the government of hon. gentlemen opposite did not hesitate, at a time when the treasury was not particularly full to spend $3,000,000.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That lock is open to United States trade the same as it is to our own, and the United States lock is open to us.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Does the hon. gentleman wish to claim for the government which he supported the credit of having spent those $3,000,000 for the purpose of improving United States facilities?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Yes, I do, any traffic—the more traffic the better.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Then there are some hon. members here who supported the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway in the way in which it was constructed, and hon. gentlemen know what care was taken at that time to prevent traffic going through the United States, and how Liberals who suggested that, for the time being at any rate, a route by Sault Ste. Marie might be made use of, were denounced as unpatriotic and as friends and sympathizers with the United States. Then we know that the Intercolonial Railway was built by a very long and comparatively round-about route, so that it would not go near the United States frontier; and now these same gentlemen want us to make a United States route the means of ingress and egress to what they say is a most valuable region, a region where difficulties are very likely to occur, and where it is very important that we should have independent means of access. They want to put that completely in the hands of our neighbours. The hon. gentleman groans. I do not wonder. I think when he looks back and considers what he is and what he used to be he must feel very sad. I had noticed a change on the part of the hon. gentlemen opposite in respect to our neighbours in the United States. I was surprised some little time ago to receive a summons to attend a meeting in a room in this Senate to listen to a United States citizen, a man whose interests were nearly all in the United States, a man who admitted himself that he was the correspondent of the New York Journal, one of the most tail-twisting newspapers in the United States, and of the San Francisco Examiner—we loyal senators were summoned there to listen to this man instructing us that we should vote against this bill.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—No harm in that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And to listen to him telling us that the line indicated by the government was not the proper line to adopt.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Did you go and listen to him?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes. I like to hear what the other side have to say. I am a believer in free speech. It was a spectacle for gods and men, when we think that the hon. gentlemen opposite should have been a party to a transaction of that kind.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Who asked that man to come?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You have quoted from his book.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I thought it was an authority hon. gentlemen opposite would pay some attention to. They would not listen to the Minister of the Interior, but they would to him. My hon. friend from Beauce (Mr. Bolduc) the other day favoured the House with a speeeh which makes us regret that he does not speak oftener, because he speaks well. He laid great stress on Livernash and his associates.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—As you are doing now.

Hon. Mr. POWER—What are the facts with respect to Livernash and his associates? The hon. gentleman told us a story which, I presume, he got from Livernash. Whether the correspondent of the New York Journal and San Francisco Examiner is a gentleman whose unsupported statements ought to be credited by loyal British subjects is a question, but I presume it was from him the hon. gentleman got his information, and he told us the story of the shameful way in which those delegates had been treated by the government of the day.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am glad the hon. gentleman stands by his guns. I have taken pains to ascertain the facts about Livernash and his agent and the government. Those gentlemen arrived here some time in February, and they first went to see the Deputy Minister of the Interior. They said they wished to have an interview with either the minister or the government, I am not sure which. The Deputy Minister told them they could have an interview whenever they pleased—substantially—that they could arrange for it. They stated they were not in a great hurry, but he said to let him know and he would arrange. The interview was arranged for, and took place during a sitting of the House of Commons, in a room which is used occasionally by the Minister of Railways and Canals. The premier, the Minister of Railways and Canals and the Minister of the Interior were present. As soon as those gentlemen asked for the interview they got it. Those gentlemen set forth their case with respect to the mining regulations at considerable length. That is, Mr. Livernash spoke and the others stood by. The statements which they made were all with respect to the mining regulations; and the mining regulations were the only subject with which they had been authorized to deal. The ministers listened to this gentleman for an hour, and the hon. gentleman opposite (Sir Mackenzie Bowell), who has been a minister in the House of Commons, knows very well that an hour during the sitting of the House is a considerable period. The ministers listened to what Mr. Livernash had to say and the delegates were told, in a very friendly way, that they had better put the substance of what they had said in writing, and the premier assured them that he would see that another meeting should be arranged for. The ministers would have an opportunity to consider the memorial and would give them another interview. Would you believe it hon. gentlemen, that written representation was never sent to the premier, nor any other member of the government, and the first intimation, after that interview, which the government had that those gentleman were here at all, was when a notice appeared in the papers to the effect that those gentlemen were to address a meeting in room No. 8 in the Senate. On the same day on which that information appeared—I think it was on Friday—the premier received a letter from Mr. Livernash couched in very vigorous language, complaining of not having had an interview. The premier wrote at once saying that there was some misunderstanding, referring to the understanding on which they parted before, saying that he had received no communication from them and that he would be very happy to meet them at any time that would suit them, and suggested the following Monday. That letter was written either Friday or Saturday, and the following Monday those gentlemen had a meeting with a committee of the Privy Council. They did not then submit a written statement of the miners' grievances, but submitted this little book, which has been distributed to members of the House, a book which did not deal largely with the grievances of the miners, and did deal with the shortcomings of the Stikine route, a subject with which the delegates had nothing to do.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—On Friday last, when I stated what had passed between the three delegates and the government, I said this, that not only Mr. Livernash but the whole three delegates had tried to see the Minister of the Interior at his office several times, that an appointment was made there, that it was agreed they should meet the Minister of the Interior at such a date. They went there and would not be received. After having gone to the department several times, they were told they could meet the minister in the House of Commons here. They came to the House of Commons and were admitted to see three ministers only, when it was so late that it was impossible for them to lay their case before the ministers.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman is abusing my indulgence. If he wants to make a speech he can reply when I sit down. I make the statements which I am making on the authority of the Minister of the Interior and the premier.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC—What I stated was on the authority of the three delegates.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman cannot make another speech now. I stated that the hon. gentleman had probably got his information from Mr. Livernash.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He says he got it from the three.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The statement I make is on the authority of the premier and the Minister of the Interior.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That is two against three.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I wish to call attention to one fact which is important. This is the petition of the miners :

Whereas the government has so amended the mining regulations governing the placers of the Yukon district of the North-west Territories, that a heavy royalty is imposed, based on the gross output of the gold fields ; and that "creek" and "river" claims are limited in length to one hundred feet instead of five hundred feet as heretofore ; and that every alternate claim is reserved from location.

Now, therefore, we the undersigned miners of the Yukon district, do humbly petition as follows :

Their petition is all about mining regulations : there is nothing about a railway, because the railway was not dreamed of at that time. This was the 1st December, 1897. It was claimed that those delegates had an implied right to speak generally on behalf of the miners. It is clear that they had not, because this same petition, which deals altogether with the mining question, says :

In that we may have overlooked some points as to which we should have spoken, and in that we deem it best not to cumber this petition with masses of exact information supporting the general propositions advanced, and in that we are so isolated from Ottawa that we cannot as a body speedily communicate with Your Excellency, we send to you as the bearers of this petition, and as our spokesmen and representatives, three of our number, residents of this district, Messrs. M. Landreville, A. E. Wills, and Edward J. Livernash.

Wherefore, your petitioners humbly pray that until the difficulties which are unavoidable at present have been modified, no artificial burdens be added to the heavy load we Yukon miners are bearing ; and that Your Excellency send into this district a commission of inquiry to report fully on the character of the Yukon gold-fields ; and that, pending such report, Your Excellency restore the regulations displaced by those of which we have ventured to complain ; and that the three bearers of this petition be given an opportunity of making themselves serviceable to Your Excellency in the giving of information possessed by them with reference to the placers of this district. And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

Clearly these gentlemen have no mandate at all to speak about the railway matter. There was a good deal of laughter the other day at the authority quoted by the hon. gentleman from Chatham (Mr. Snowball) with respect to what was stated by Mr. Slavin.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Who is he ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—He is a man quite as respectable as the others.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Is it true he is the heavyweight boxer of the United States ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Whatever he may be he was named as a delegate to come here, and declined to come.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—You have only his own word for that.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is quite clear that the question of transportation was not discussed, and nobody was authorized to speak for the miners on the subject.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—So Livernash has said himself.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Mr. Slavin goes on to speak of the miners wishing to get better access to the country, as they naturally would. If his authority is not quite good—he is an Australian I believe—I have another authority here, from the Ottawa Citizen. It is headed "A Yukon Pioneer." The Ottawa Citizen will not be suspected of being considered disloyal to the interests of Canada or the interests of the Conservative party. What does the Citizen publish :

Mr. T. W. O'Brien, a Yukon pioneer, is in the city. Eleven years ago he went to Forty-mile from the North-west Territories and engaged in trading and mining. Less than a year ago Mr. O'Brien was in Ottawa in connection with certain concessions he was desirous of obtaining from the government, and his descriptions of the Yukon mining district, as contained in interviews published in The Citizen, did much to awaken interest in that country at the time.

Mr. O'Brien rather discounts the marvellous stories of fabulous finds which are being circulated by returned miners. He instances his own case, where it cost him $50,000 to take out $65,000 from a claim on Eldorado Creek.

He believes in the policy of getting early railway communication into the Klondike country, and says the miners at Dawson would not support Messrs. Livernash, Wills and Landreville's protest against the Stikine-Teslin railway project, because if the 5,000 square miles of land grant were given to the contractors, the miners would as soon deal with Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann as with the government, sooner, in fact, for the royalty would be only one per cent, as against ten per cent that must be paid to the government.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—May I ask if that is the same gentleman who took 2,000 gallons of whisky into the Klondike ?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, that is the same gentleman. I may say another gentleman arrived in Ottawa this morning, direct from the Yukon country, who said that the miners were most anxious for railway communication, and that in his opinion if the three gentlemen who were trying to influence the Senate against the Yukon Railway Bill were to return to Dawson City they would probably be treated to a dose of something that would be pretty hot.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He said they were anxious for railway communication, and did not care a rap about the expense.

Hon. Mr. POWER—So far for the Stikine route. I cannot understand the attitude of those members who claim that if any railway should be built it should be a line to the shores of the Lynn Canal—a road whose line for several miles, as well as its terminus, would be in territory occupied by the United States, and a railway which, instead of forming a link in the chain of communication with the Yukon country, would tend to prevent such a chain being built, and would place the trade of this country, even more than it is at present, in the hands of our United States neighbours. I do not find any fault with Mr. Livernash. He is a United States citizen and anxious to do the best he can for the business men of California, Oregon and Washington, and he is doing his duty as a true United States citizen in trying to induce this Senate to throw out a measure which might tend to bring that business to Canadian channels. But I do not think that that is the sort of person to whom Canadians should go for advice as to the route they should select. They did not do that when they were building the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—That is too ridiculous.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do you apply those remarks to the other two gentlemen who accompanied him?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I really did not think that the other two gentlemen counted for very much in the delegation.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You are very much mistaken.

Hon. Mr. POWER—They did not say very much, but I am quite satisfied that neither of them wrote the pamphlet which has been distributed. That bears Mr. Livernash's imprint, you can see his turns of speech all through it. I think, possibly, the hon. leader of the opposition may know rather more about this matter than I do, because Dr. Wills, who was one of the party, I understand, is a very strong Conservative, and belongs to the hon. gentleman's town.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is true.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And putting that fact together with the fact that the hon. gentleman secured the room for the speech made by Mr. Livernash, I think that probably the hon. gentleman had a good deal to do with it. Now, hon. gentlemen, I think it is clear that it was absolutely necessary that some action should be taken to enable people to get in and out, and enable supplies to be taken into the Yukon district, and that these steps should be taken at once. I think that the route adopted by the government is the best route. The hon. gentleman from Victoria said he was in favour of a line to Port Simpson. This railway from Stikine to Teslin Lake is a portion of the Port Simpson route, and it is indicated in the contract that, if necessary, the line will be extended to Port Simpson; and it is an essential part of any line coming into Canada, and we want, if that Yukon country is to continue, if the bottom, as they say, does not drop out of it, and if it continues a great gold producing country, we want the best communication possible with it. Now the hon. gentleman from Victoria (Mr. Macdonald) particularly, who is now not in his place, seems very anxious to know whether the contract commended itself to my approval—that is the whole contract. It has been contended, admitting the urgency and admitting that the best route has been selected, that the details of the agreement are such as to render the agreement unfair to Canada and more than fair to the contractors. Hon. gentleman, I do not propose to take up the time of the House discussing that at any length. There are certain points that have been dwelt on at great length here, and it may perhaps be well to refer to these. Something has been said about the character of the road. It is supposed to be a rather smart thing to call it a tramway. That is supposed to condemn it immediately. It is to be of the same standard as the Kaslo and Slocan Railway. What is the Kaslo and Slocan Railway? It is a road it is true, with a gauge of only three feet; it is a road the rails of which weigh 45 pounds to the yard; and it is a road on which the heaviest grade is only about three per cent. That is a pretty good kind of road; the Minister of the Interior in the other House stated he had travelled over the road and made 31 miles inside an hour; and it is a road which carries the heaviest kind of freight; it carries minerals—

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The Canadian Pacific Railway Company have pulled up the rails along the narrow gauge between Rossland and Trail, and substituted for it a heavier road.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—To suit their own cars.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This is for a temporary road—

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. minister just said, in reply to a question asked by the member from Shell River, that they changed the gauge in order to suit their own cars. I say there is no connection between the Canadian Pacific Railway and that road.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They bring the cars on a steamer down the lake. My hon. friend knows they are building a line from Robson to Nelson. They propose connecting the Crow's Nest road with Nelson. They carry their cars down on boats, down Arrow Lake, I think it is.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL I know they have a road from Revelstoke down to the head of Arrow Lake, and then they tranship on board the boat down to Trail. They will tranship now at Robson.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I discussed this agreement myself on the debate on the address, and it has been discussed by the Secretary of State and the Minister of Justice, and I do not propose to say very much about it. There is one point upon which some stress has been laid, that it is alleged on behalf of the government, and alleged very properly, that the advantage given to Mackenzie & Mann in the matter of selecting mining lands, is not very great. There are already thousands of men in the Yukon district; there are other thousands trying to get in, and these people will all have an opportunity to take up claims before Mackenzie & Mann are in a position to do so. Mackenzie & Mann will not be in a position to take up any claim until they have ten miles completed. They cannot possibly have that completed before the middle of June, at the earliest, and the free miners have all the intervening time to take up claims there everywhere, and when Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann have completed ten miles of road, they are allowed to select in the manner provided in the agreement, which is a very awkward manner for Mackenzie & Mann, because they have to take up a great deal of useless land and land with no minerals, with a small proportion which contains mineral. They will be in a position to take up, after finishing to the satisfaction of the government engineer ten miles of road, five or six square miles of mineral land. That does not seem to be a very serious matter; and they are allowed to take up altogether only about between five and six thousand square miles of land in that country when the whole road is completed, and there are 80,000 square miles of that land in that country, so that five or six thousand square miles are a very small fraction indeed of the whole mineral lands of that country. It is not necessary to elaborate this point, because the hon. gentleman from Murray Harbour (Mr. Prowse) showed us very conclusively the other day that the free miners will really be better off dealing with Mackenzie & Mann than dealing with the government. It all comes to this, that Mackenzie & Mann get three or four million acres of land out of about 100,000,000, and they exploit the minerals in place of having them exploited by the country.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—And become the government of the country.

Hon. Mr. POWER—They do not become the government of the country.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—You prefer the United States.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have read a letter from Mr. Kersey declining to tender for the work, but there is something more in this little pamphlet. Here is an offer of J. Wesley Allison, representing a Canadian and British syndicate for the construction of a railway from Skagway to Dyea to a point on Lake Bennett and thence to Dawson city, a distance of about 540 miles. He says :

That your petitioners propose to immediately construct a wagon road from Glenora to the foot of Teslin Lake and to provide boats and barges for the navigation of Teslin Lake and the Hootalinqua, Lewes and Yukon Rivers, which your petitioners state is the only means of developing the country during the year 1898, and until such time as supplies necessary for the construction of heavier works can be introduced into that country.

He seemed to think that that Stikine route was rather a good one. And then these gentlemen who offered to build the road, as hon. gentlemen will see at page two, demanded that this company or syndicate should obtain patents of alternate sections of 24 miles square for each ten miles of the road constructed. Now instead of getting 25,000 acres a mile, Mr. Wesley Allison wanted 36,000 acres a mile.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—No.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If my hon. friend from Alma will make the calculation——

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—I find it is not the case. I tell the hon. member for Halifax because I know perfectly well it is not.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is 34,000.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—It is not 34,000 nor 30,000.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman can make the calculation himself. The calculation has been made by other people, and in the Surveyor General's office, and it was found that Wesley Allison's people wanted about 10,000 acres more than Mackenzie & Mann.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—Per mile? I know that is wrong.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman says he knows, and that settles it. It is no use discussing it further. Now, hon. gentlemen, I did propose to quote somewhat largely from Mr. Livernash. I like, as a rule, to appeal to the House on the authority of parties who would be recognized generally in Canada, but in the present instance, I think it well to quote to them parties who appear to be particularly pleasing to hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, with respect to the character of the country, it has been represented that it is all gold, and that we are giving away so much solid gold when we are giving those acres to Mackenzie & Mann. Now I read from this little book containing an appeal of the Yukon miners to the Dominion of Canada, as follows :

Grossly exaggerated reports have been published through the newspapers of this Dominion and the United States concerning the wealth of the Klondike and Indian divisions of the Yukon district. Men of this district have gone hence to the centres of the population in this country and the United States, are quoted by the press as authority for assertions either wholly false or grievously misleading. The impression has been given, apparently, that enormously rich claims are the rule, and that gold may be mined with profit, even now, almost anywhere in the vast region about the village of Dawson. That impression is not justified.

Of the three thousand claims reported in this district, not more than two score had been demonstrated to be remarkably rich. The others are either moderately rich, ruling conditions considered, or practically unknown quantities—most of them the latter. The indications are favourable for fair profit from a considerable percentage of these others if no royalty is imposed ; but there is no certainty that a substantial number of the claims will be profitable if heavily taxed. Indeed it is probable that many of them would not be worth working at all.

Then on page six :

In consequence of the costliness of labour and supplies not many of the mines of this district, even in the valleys of the Bonanza and its tributaries, yield much beyond expenses at present, and many that have been well prospected are not rich enough to justify the claim holders to employ miners to assist in working them. In many cases, accordingly, a royalty of ten or twenty per cent of output would be a medium of confiscation.

Then at the bottom of page 11 :

Consider how immense and well nigh inaccessible Alaska and the Yukon district are and that until last year only a few hundred miners were scattered in that great solitude, and that these few hundreds were nearly all new comers there, and that millions and millions of acres of the stream valleys so trippingly on the tongue of late have never been pressed by the foot of a white man and you can readily believe little dependence should be placed on stories pretending to set forth with much of certainty the extent and wealth of the gold fields of those silent lines.

That is Mr. Livernash ; you can read it there, and he is good authority according to some hon. gentlemen. And at page 28, it is stated :

That, excepting a district within a radius of twenty miles of Dawson scarcely anything has been proved except Klondike or Indian divisions of said Yukon district ; and nothing at all beyond a radius of fifty miles.

I could take up the time of the House by reading extracts from pages 34, 37, 53, and so on, but I do not think I shall trouble the House by quoting much more. If hon. gentlemen will take the trouble to look through this valuable work themselves, they will find the information.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I have not read that book. What conclusion would I come to providing I do read it—that is, in your estimation?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not know what conclusion the hon. gentleman would come to. I can judge for myself.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—What conclusion has the hon. gentleman come to from reading it?

Hon. Mr. POWER—There are a great many pearls in this little book, but I am afraid, as it is getting late, the House will have to excuse me from reading any more. I propose just to say a very few words on certain imperfections which have been found in this contract; and one upon which a great deal of stress has been laid, is that this contract involves a monopoly. Hon. gentlemen, what is the character of that monopoly? We should not be led away by words and names. What is the character of that monopoly? The agreement states that for five years after the making of this contract no company shall be incorporated to build a line of railway to the Lynn Canal, or thereabouts. Is not that a perfectly proper thing? Was not a similar stipulation contained in the Canadian Pacific Railway contract—that no person should be allowed to build a railway——

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Did not every one of your party condemn it?

Hon. Mr. POWER—The case was very different. I think it is a perfectly proper thing. There is not a complete monopoly, because last session we chartered two companies—one to build to the Lynn Canal, and one to build to the Taku Inlet, and there is nothing at all to hinder the English company, which is supposed to be composed of very wealthy men from building a road now to the Lynn Canal. There is no monopoly, as far as roads in Canada are concerned. There is nothing to hinder any company from building a road which will have its terminus at Ashcroft, or the bend in the Fraser River or Edmonton.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Was there any clause in the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's charter which prevented the province of Manitoba from building a road?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—There is no law by which our parliament could put such a clause in a railway charter.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, there is, and I am surprised my hon. friend does not understand the history of affairs in his own province better. There was nearly a rebellion at the time.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, a rebellion against the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is simply to prevent the business of the Yukon country going to the United States. There is nothing to hinder it going to British Columbia or the North-west Territories. Then there is the question of royalty, of course, and that has been discussed at length. That rate of 10 per cent royalty for the free miner is too high, and I hope to see it reduced. But that royalty begins only after the miner has got $2,500 out of a claim in one year. I think 5 per cent would be enough; and considering all that Canada has done for that country, there should be some consideration given by the miners. With respect to the Hamilton Smith offer, if the amount of the land grant was rather less than in the present agreement, hon. gentlemen must bear in mind that the road which they were to construct was not so favourable to the interests of Canada and was more favourable to the interest of the United States. In the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway there was a monopoly for twenty years. There was a grant of 25,000,000 acres of land; and the Company for some time allowed those lands to remain unsold until they had been made valuable by the settlement made on the Government sections. Nothing of that kind will happen here. The hon. gentleman from Victoria (Mr. Macdonald) rather complained that Mackenzie & Mann were employing a $25,000 engineer to have these mines developed at once. I say in conclusion that one should look at this thing not as a liberal or conservative, but from the point of view of a senator. I am not talking about our legal rights. We have a legal right to throw out this bill. We have a legal right to reject any measure that comes from the other House, but it is not wise that one should do everything that one can do; and I look at it in this way: the government of this country have been charged by the people with the administration of the affairs of Canada for a certain term, whatever length of time the present parliament may last. If there is one thing which they are more especially charged with, it is the duty of dealing with unforeseen occurrences, anything which happens which could not be reasonably expected. This is a matter almost altogether of that kind. It is an act of administration; the only legislation we may say that is necessary is this authority to the government to grant a portion of the public domain, and that granting of a portion of the domain is not really a matter for this House in the ordinary sense of the term. An unexpected condition of things has arisen in this Yukon country, demanding prompt attention, and the government—I would say this, no matter which side of the House I was on—have given this unforeseen condition of things their attention, and they formulate a plan, the best plan they know for dealing with the existing conditions. This plan, formulated in the discharge of their duties as the administrators of the business of the country, has been endorsed by a majority of the House of Commons, the House which is directly responsible to the people. As far as I am concerned I believe the government plan is a better plan than any which has yet been propounded; yet if I did not think so, I should feel this House was going out of its proper sphere and assuming an uncalled for responsibility in absolutely rejecting the government measure. As I said at the begining, while this is a serious question for the people out in the Yukon country, it is perhaps quite as serious for us. It does not strike me that as far as the government is concerned, it is a serious question at all. The government have done their duty. They have formulated their plan to meet the present difficulty. It has been passed by the House of Commons. It comes here, and if we assume the responsibility of rejecting it, the government are relieved from responsibility. I do not think it is the duty of this House—and I do not think it is a wise policy for this House—to assume any such position as that. We are glad to claim that, in certain cases in the past, we had the people with us. I, myself, have very grave fears—and reports have just arrived from the Yukon country strengthening these fears—that in this case we shall find the people very strongly against us.

It being 6 o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—This matter has been so fully discussed by hon. gentlemen, that it would be presumption on my part to even assume for one moment that I should be able, in any way, to contribute anything new to the debate. I can only reiterate what has been said, and in doing so will endeavour to impress, as far as I possibly can, the views which I take upon this subject, relative to matters already touched upon. My hon. friend the leader of the Senate, in introducing this Bill, very properly appealed to the national sense of this House in regard to carrying out a project which certainly is nothing short of a public undertaking, and pointed out with no small degree of force the sacrifices which, at times, have to be made by a state in entering upon important projects of this kind, and very oftentimes submerging, so to speak, their own individual opinions relative to the wisdom of such a project. To impress upon the House this particular phase of argument which he addressed to the chamber, he alluded to public undertakings which in the past had been entered upon by this Dominion. I fully concur in all that was said by my hon. friend in regard to this phase of the subject. I quite concur—and I am sure that this House will concur—in the proposition that there are times when a State is called upon to carry out large public works, to assume undertakings which may not appeal with very great force to the judgment and to the sentiments of the people, and yet the few are called upon to submit their opinions and their judgment to the majority. So far as the carrying out of the public works of the Dominion of Canada is concerned, I will venture the opinion that there is no country in the civilized world with the same population and the same resources that has shown the enterprise and the energy and the national sacrifices, if you like to use the term, in entering upon and carrying to a successful completion great public undertakings in this Dominion. It reflects a very great deal of credit upon the governments which have carried out those undertakings to know that in nearly all of them they have received the endorsation of public opinion but there were great underlying principles in regard to those undertakings which it is well for us to consider in regard to the one now under our consideration. There was never a public undertaking entered upon by the Dominion of Canada but two great underlying prinicples applied to that particular project. In the first place the government was called upon to satisfy itself that it was actually necessary, and, in the second place, to submit to the people of the Dominion such a measure of information upon the subject as would satisfy public demands and would secure that public approval which is so essential to the carrying out of such an enterprise. It has always been necessary to consider in regard to the expenditure of public money as to whether that expenditure is going to enure to the entire or almost entire advantage of the country making the expenditure. Such public work cannot be said to be a public work for the advantage of this Dominion if it is not going to enure almost entirely to the benefit of the people of the Dominion. I challenge my hon. friend to point out any public undertaking that has been entered upon by any former government of this Dominion upon which the fullest information was not secured and which, after being secured, was not submitted to parliament for the full and independent expression of parliament, and then submitted to public tender for the purpose of that contract being let in such a way as would appeal to the confidence of the people. I doubt if my hon. friend with his long parliamentary experience can refer to any particular enterprise coming within the class of cases which we are dealing with now in which steps of that particular character were not taken for the purpose of securing public confidence. There are two propositions which I would submit to this House, and to which I would invite the consideration of the House relative to this particular question. As I have said, in the first instance, we must satisfy ourselves before making a public expenditure, particularly one of the magnitude now before us for our consideration, that such an expenditure is going to result to our advantage, and, in the second place, it is necessary for us to satisfy ourselves that such a work necessitates public assistance, or, in other words, that such a work cannot possibly be carried out without the assistance of the state. The first proposition to which I have alluded was evidently fully recognized by the government, because they had no sooner introduced this particular bill that they labelled it "an all-Canadian route." The hon. gentleman, the leader of this House, at once recognized the importance of impressing this on the public mind, and if my hon. friend and his colleagues and the party to which he belongs, can succeed in impressing on the people of Canada that this is an all-Canadian route, that it is for the entire advantage of the people of Canada, he will certainly succeed in creating an impression on the subject which, I will venture to say up to the present time has not been impressed on the public mind. I say with the greatest degree of confidence that there was never a greater misnomer than to designate this road an all-Canadian route. I say never did any falsity masquerade more fully in false colours than in this route parading itself before the people of Canada as an all-Canadian route. Now, in connection with this particular phase of the subject my hon. friend and his associates, and particularly the Liberal press found it very necessary to raise a cry of loyalty on behalf of the present government, so that the warm and loyal sentiments of the people of this Dominion should be so exercised as to cause them to lose sight of their good judgment in this matter, and simply upon feelings of loyalty enter upon an undertaking of the magnitude calculated to alienate four million acres of land. While on the other hand we find the members of this chamber and the members of the other House who have exercised their free and independent judgment sufficiently frankly as to express themselves opposed to this bill at once attacked as being disloyal to the constitution, and disloyal to the empire. My hon. friend has pointed out in a very serious and in a very grave manner the possible absorption of this vast country by the United States in the event of our not acceding to the proposition which he has laid down that this is an all-Canadian route and absolutely necessary for the purpose of not only developing the Yukon country but of retaining it to the British Crown. Now in connection with this view of the subject I would desire to point out to the House for a moment wherein this is not an all-Canadian route, wherein this is not a Canadian enterprise, wherein the carrying out of this enterprise will enure to the benefit of the United States in fact in the same ratio that their population exceeds ours. Have hon. gentlemen taken into consideration the disparity in population between the Dominion of Canada and the United States to the south of us? They have a population fourteen times as great as ours. Their merchant marine is the second in the world, representing about two and a quarter million tonnnage; their railway or transportation systems we know to be the greatest in the world. There is scarcely a section of country in the United States that is not honeycombed by railways and subject to all the powerful influences brought to bear upon it by various transportation companies. Their capital and enterprise for some years we know to have been forging steadily ahead from the eastern states to the western states, and very largely concentreing upon the Pacific coast; and I need not tell hon. gentlemen that the Pacific coast to-day is the basis for almost the greatest commercial operations that are being carried out upon this continent. We find there great cities, large manufacturing institutions, the railway terminals of every transcontinental system within the United States. We find all those influences, the aggregation, so to speak, of capital and enterprise, being brought to bear at one base. I say we find all those factors entering into and building up an immense trade in the Yukon country by the way, practically, of the very route which the government of to-day is thinking to build up at the expense of the people of Canada.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If I understand my hon. friend's contention it is that any railway leading to the Yukon country constructed near the Pacific coast in British Columbia, is a route that would inure to the benefit of the United States rather than to Canada in proportion as the population exceeds ours?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Yes, that is a fact.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, that is the proposition which I lay down, and I lay this down, that such a road must not be built by the people of Canada to inure to the advantage of the people of the United States.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And it must not be west of the Rocky Mountains then?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—No, I do not take that position. I intend to lay down the proposition that that road will be built without the government of Canada spending a dollar or alienating an acre of land. I say the investment will appeal to capitalists as of such commercial value that there will be no hesitation on the part of capitalists in building that road. Now, returning for one moment to that phase of the subject with which I was dealing, namely, as to the aggregation of influences which we find brought to bear by the United States on the Pacific coast in regard to securing the trade of the Yukon country I would point out this very important fact that almost every mining field upon the continent of America, has been pioneered by United States miners. That my hon. friend freely concedes that fact is patent when he states that over 90 per cent of those who have already gone into that country are United States citizens. It is not an exaggeration to say also that 90 per cent of the trade which has gone into that country at the present time is United States trade. We very well know that when the Yukon district was discovered to be a paying gold mining field, almost every city upon the Pacific coast belched forth its population in filling up the district which already has received world wide notoriety and is so populated by citizens of the United States. In addition to that we find that every city on the Pacific coast is alive—a busy hive of commerce, outfitting goldseekers for the Yukon district. There is scarcely a boat obtainable on the Pacific coast or the interior that has not been commissioned by United States capital for the purpose of joining in the transportation trade between the United States and the Alaska coast during the coming season. I might almost safely say that 90 per cent of the supplies which leave Victoria, Vancouver and other Canadian cities on the Pacific coast are United States products. Now, all these will be unloaded at the United States port of Wrangel and go in via Teslin Lake notwithstanding the fact that you build that road from Observatory Inlet. I have been waiting vainly for hon. gentlemen on the government benches to point out to this House—I have been waiting patently for the Liberal press to point out to the people of Canada wherein we can possibly prevent the people of the United States in doing their carrying trade over the very route which it is proposed to build and of taking advantage of the large expenditure about to be made by the people of Canada. I have not heard one suggestion made by the supporters of the government—I have not seen anything in the Liberal press, ingenious as the arguments have been to satisfy me or to even attempt to grapple with the proposition that that road must necessarily be as free to the carrying trade of the United States as to the carrying trade of the transportation companies of the Dominion of Canada.

Mon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is true.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—So much for the consideration of the particular proposition which I have laid down, that it would be impolitic and unwise for the Dominion of Canada at an immense expenditure to alienate our resources in money or land for the purpose of building a route which of necessity must be taken advantage of by the transportation systems of the United States. The next proposition which I will submit to the House is this: Is this such an undertaking as would appeal to capitalists so as to warrant our concluding that it is a road which will be built without public assistance. I submit with the greatest confidence to this House that it is such an undertaking, and if the government to-morrow would pursue a wise policy in which they would invite the assistance of capital, numerous propositions would be received by the government whereby without any difficulty the government would secure the building of this road without, as I have stated before, the expenditure of a dollar in cash or the alienation of an acre of land. I might say from the very inception of this question the government has wilfully blundered or has egregiously erred. The people of Canada some time ago did congratulate themselves on having a government of all the business talents, of having, so to speak, a monopoly of the business ability, of statesmanship, in the government now governing the destinies of the Dominion. One would fancy that such a government, entering upon so important a project as this, would adopt the most elementary principles of dealing with a subject of such moment. One would have fancied that they would have secured information on the subject; one would have fancied they would have learned the existing conditions investing the subject, and that having obtained information and having considered the conditions, they would then consider as to whether this road should not be built with the greatest possible economy to the people of this Dominion. I want to say here that I don't for one moment take the position that a road will not be built from a port on the Alaska coast, or even from a port in the interior of British Columbia. I know this, that when conditions invest a certain state of facts, no matter what they may be, we always find, particularly in commercial life, a sufficient amount of capital to take advantage of those conditions, and if it can be shown that there will be a fair return for the capital, capital will immediately become enlisted in catering to the public and carrying out whatever demands trade and commerce make upon it. Now, what are the existing conditions we find surrounding this particular subject? Can any one deduce anything from what I have stated in regard to the immense trade which is about to go into this country other than the deduction which we must all certainly make that capital will be forthcoming to meet those conditions, which with the liberty of the House I should like now to enumerate. As I have said before there is not a steamboat, on the Pacific coast or within the interior if by any possibility it can be enlisted in the Yukon trade, which has not been either enlisted or will be commissioned. We find to-day even by the admissions made by my hon. friend the leader of the House fully 100,000 people, or will be within a very short time, upon the move for the purpose of going into the Yukon district. We find every wharf and dock on the Pacific coast practically laden with goods destined for the Yukon district. Mr. Mann, one of the contractors when interviewed a short time ago in either Victoria or Vancouver, stated that there would be at least 250,000 tons of freight shipped to the Yukon country this coming season and in fact that amount was already in sight. We find it stated by the Globe newspaper—the oracle of the Liberal party, and hence we will not dispute for the purposes of this argument—the accuracy of the statement made by that paper—that if the Senate rejected this bill $100,000,000 of trade would be lost to the people of Canada. That one hundred million dollars of trade is destined to go into the Yukon district and I fancy gentlemen on the other side of the House will not dispute so excellent an authority as the Globe for so startling a statement. Now then let us again take into consideration what this vast volume of trade means. Every railway in the United States is to-day and I might say in the Dominion of Canada, pressed to its utmost capacity for the purpose of meeting the carrying demands of the Yukon trade. Every steamboat that can be pressed into Yukon trade upon the Pacific coast, every dockyard, every boat-building establishment upon the Pacific coast we find working 24 hours out of every 24, building boats for this particular trade; and we need not confine ourselves to the Pacific coast, we know that in the city of Toronto and the city of Montreal and the manufacturing centres throughout the Dominion of Canada the capacity of those manufactories are exercised to their utmost extent for the purpose of carrying out the great demands made upon them by transportation companies for the purpose of engaging in this trade. These being the existing conditions which present themselves to our mind in regard to this business does it not appear to hon. gentlemen a most extraordinary thing that the present government should not have taken into consideration this fact, that this immense aggregation of capital represented by transportation companies, by steamboat companies, represented by manufacturers, by merchants, by commercial life of all kinds, would not instantly come to a standstill by reason of 150 miles of land not being railed extending from the Stikine River to Teslin Lake, and yet that is the position taken by the government to-day. They say that one hundred millions of trade is to be lost to the people of Canada, and I will undertake to say that if the Dominion of Canada would supply one hundred millions of trade to the Yukon district the United States would supply ten times that; then is this trade to become paralyzed, to stand stockstill at port Wrangel or on the Stikine River because forsooth the government of Canada will not expend four million acres of land in building a tramway 150 miles long. Hon. gentlemen must certainly have a very limited idea of the business capacity not only of the people of the United States but of the people of the Dominion of Canada of the legislators in both branches of parliament if they think that conditions of this kind will not warrant us in concluding without any hesitation whatever that such a road would be at once built by capital which would be volunteered more quickly than my hon. friend and his colleagues could consider offers if the government had proceeded in a business like way to invite capital to make proposals for the building of this route. Now the answer doubtless of the government to this proposition is this. We received no propositions. The only people in view who could enter upon this vast undertaking were Mackenzie & Mann, and the urgency of the case and the emergency of the circumstances warranted us at once closing a contract with those gentlemen entirely irrespective of what capital on the outside might have been anxious to do. Now my answer to the answer of the government is simply this: the government immediately they determined on building this road determined upon giving it to Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann entirely, irrespective of what outside capital was prepared to do. I do not think there is an hon. gentleman in this House, or a thinking man in this Dominion of Canada, who has followed this discussion from its inception down to the present time, will believe that the government ever had any other intention than to close this contract out with the Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, irrespective of all other capitalists and all other contractors who might desire to tender for it. I am forced to this belief from the circumstances which invest the case, and I think no other hon. gentleman can come to any other conclusion. What did the government do? Did they invite tenders? Did they adopt that wise and salutory principle which has become almost a constitutional right in this Dominion, that the public ought to be invited to tender for the carrying out of public works, especially public works of this description, which should be let in the light of noonday, and thus stamped with public confidence? No; these gentlemen did not do so; they at once closed their doors and shut up their departments, so that other contractors and capitalists could not possibly have access. They sent for Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, and we find them entering into a contract with Mackenzie & Mann entirely irrespective of what public opinion would say or what other contractors would do. I can remember when these same gentlemen lifted their voices upon high in the event of the fullest opportunity not having been given by the late government to contractors to tender for our public undertakings. Who will not remember the assaults which from time to time were made upon the late government by those same hon. gentlemen because as long a time as they thought desirable was not given to contractors when tenders were invited. But as I have said I have challenged my hon. friends to point to any public work that has been carried out by the Dominion of Canada of any magnitude in which every opportunity was not given to the public to tender and thus to inspire public confidence in the letting of those contracts. This is not an isolated case with those hon. gentlemen. At the risk of going out of my beaten path for a moment I would remind hon. gentlemen of a circumstance which took place last session of Parliament when the Minister of Public Works had appropriated to his department a very substantial sum for the purpose of purchasing an electric light for the parliament buildings. That gentleman from the floor of parliament assured the House over and over again because the House seemingly was a doubting House and the Minister of Public Works assured that House three or four times that he would invite tenders for the purchase of the plant. Notwithstanding the fact that my hon. friend who is not in his seat now but who sits to the left of the leader of the House (Mr. Cox) a supporter of the government is a director of one of the largest electric light plant manufacturers on the continent of America—I understand it is the fourth largest in the world and it is a Canadian institution—yet we find the Minister of Public Works entirely regardless of the promises which he had made to the House of Commons last session, regardless of the principles of the Liberal party in regard to the letting of contracts, regardless of the preservation of the public funds of the country, giving to a firm of American contractors a contract for the purpose of supplying an electric light plant made in the United States of America at the expense of our own institutions.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Without tender?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes; without tender, and I might also say, as my hon. friend to my rignt can bear me out, that in the matter of much of the Indian supplies in the North-west the principle of tendering is entirely cast to the winds, and the friends of the government in open daylight are asked to put in their own price, regardless entirely that contracts could be let to other parties at a very much lower figure were tenders invited.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Those statements should be made in the presence of the hon. minister.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They should be made in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—In connection with this view of the case, let us consider for a moment to what extent did those gentlemen do violence to that very salutory principle with which we have been dealing, namely, inviting the public to tender for public works. A great deal has been said in regard to Hamilton Smith—very much more, I fancy, than that gentleman would care to have said about him—but we find from the facts of the case that Mr. Hamilton Smith, representing well known capitalists, some of the largest capitalists in England, came purposely to Ottawa to discuss the proposal of building a road into this same Yukon district with the Government. He secured the services of Sir William Van Horne, who apparently, while he mentioned the matter to the hon. Minister of the Interior that Mr. Hamilton Smith was here for that purpose, yet did not make such a deep impression on the mind of the hon. minister as to induce that hon. gentleman to have sent for Mr. Smith. My impression is that it was not so much the fault of Sir William Van Horne as the position taken by the Minister of the Interior himself who was determined not to discuss this matter with others who were desirous of tendering for the carrying out of this work. I must express my belief that at the time Mr. Hamilton Smith was in Ottawa that contract was already in the pockets of Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann. True the contract does not bear date till the 25th of January. As a matter of precaution before making a statement as to my belief I asked my hon. friend to lay upon the table of the House such correspondence and communications or other documentary evidence as might be in their possession so that we might be able to determine what really took place anterior to the 25th day of January between the government and Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann, I found a return to the address placed upon the table of the House today in which it is stated that there is no correspondence whatever—no documents. It seems incredible that the government who have not entirely dispensed with the red tapeism and the sealing wax and documents which characterize most governments, that this government should have entered into the largest contract with which they probably will have to deal during their term of office without having a scrap of paper without having a line to submit to parliament for the purpose of assuring parliament that everything was done that could reasonably have been done in the best interests of the country to secure a favourable contract. But hon. gentlemen we do not find as I say a scrap of paper, we do not find a line of correspondence why? Because as I have already said there could be little doubt about the subject that this contract was long since determined upon.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—And entered into by the Minister of the Interior and Mackenzie & Mann entirely irrespective of securing information in the best interests of the country.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is not so.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is absolutely untrue.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I accept this statement of my hon. friend.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Why do you not produce the evidence?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Permit me to say that when the government of the country will enter into a contract so recklessly, a contract dealing with so large and momentous an undertaking as this without having upon the departmental files a document, a scrap of paper, a scintilla of evidence to show anything was done to protect the best interests of the country, then they certainly cannot find very great fault with the public and members of this House for forming an impression very unfavourable to the alleged bona fides of the transaction which they have submitted to the House.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—What does my hon. friend show on that letter of Mr. Kersey?

Hon Mr. LOUGHEED—As my hon. friend asks me what I have to say I will tell him. I find that on the 20th of December, 1897, the first letter in which a proposition was made by Mr. H. Maitland Kersey, for the building of this particular road. I find that there was no correspondence, no information no data by which Mr. Kersey or anybody else could possibly make an intelligent offer to the Dominion government for the purpose of carrying out that undertaking. I say the government was wilfully negligent when they determined on building this road in not having such information in their hands as would permit contractors to make an intelligent offer for the carrying out of this undertaking. I find letter No. 4 on page 5 in which these same gentlemen seem to get down to business somewhat closely, but in which Mr. Sifton positively refused more than two days to Mr. Kersey for the purpose of carrying on a most important matter of business with his principals in London, Eng. And why? Either it was determined to close that bargain with Mackenzie & Mann two days after that or it had been closed before and there had to be some semblance of giving to this gentleman an opportunity to make his offer. But as that hon. gentleman has asked me about it I will tell my hon. friends that the agent of Mr. Kersey has told me that he went over and over again to the Minister of the Interior for the purpose of getting such information as would permit him and his principals to make an intelligent offer for the carrying out of this undertaking, and the Minister of the Interior was not able to interview him, let alone give him the information which he required for the purpose of communicating to his principal in London. I hope that this will be satisfactory to my hon. friends. He possibly may say: Why, then, is Mr. Maitland Kersey's last letter couched in such very courteous terms? I think Mr. Kersey must have written letter No. 5, thanking the minister more by way of irony than seriousness, and by way of contrast to the way in which Mr. Kersey and his agent had been treated by the Minister of the Interior and his government.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I hear the Minister of Justice say hear, hear, he will be the first to designate as an outrage that a firm of financiers, representing capitalists as these gentlemen did, should be given only forty-eight hours to conclude an immense financial contract with their friends in London one of the days being Saturday, a day when we know in London it is impossible to do business. I was going on to deal with Hamilton Smith when my hon. friend asked me the question with regard to Mr. Kersey. Mr. Hamilton Smith was apparently extremely audacious. Mr. Hamilton Smith was so unfortunate as to make the proposition that he would build this road for 75 per cent less of land than Mackenzie & Mann, and to demonstrate his financial abilitiy to do it. Mr. Smith, upon making that offer, was regarded as an interloper.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That was after the contract had been let.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—After he knew it had been let.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why did not my hon. friend leave Hamilton Smith alone at that time?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—After the contract had been signed?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, it pleased these gentlemen to pursue Mr. Hamilton Smith after he made a bona fide offer to the government.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He knew the contract had been let.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Certainly he knew it, but did not regard it as a finality, nor do we regard it as a finality until it has passed parliament. Mr. Hamilton Smith no sooner made this proposition to the government than the government at once cabled to England to ascertain the truth of the statement which he himself made most plainly in the letter which he sent to the government. He stated he did not represent the Rothschilds. The premier at once cabled to England to know if he did represent the Rothschilds. He received word he did not represent the Rothschilds, as Hamilton Smith had already stated that he did not and then this is flaunted throughout the whole country for the purpose of discrediting Mr. Smith, because he himself had stated what they actually ascertained by cable from the high commissioner.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—From what all the press said he did represent Rothschilds. Where did they get the information?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—And further, Hamilton Smith unfortunately imagined he was doing business with a government accustomed to business methods. Mr. Smith had been accustomed to dealing with colonial governments, large financiers, and with the English government, which the premier of the country assumes to copy even in all its details. But why Mr. Smith should have aroused the ire and the antagonism of the government because he made a bona fide offer even though perhaps it was late in the day to build the road for 75 per cent less than Mackenzie & Mann is certainly past my understanding and does violence to one's conceptions of what is in the interests of the conservation of public rights. Hence, in view of this fact we cannot think for one moment that the government were anxious to secure any tenders or any propositions from financiers or from capitalists or contractors no matter what their ability might be. Hence I say that under these circumstances the government has been culpably negligent of protecting the very best interests of the country in not endeavouring to secure a contract which they could easily have secured for the purpose of carrying out this undertaking to a successful consummation and without very much, if any, cost to the country.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman ignores the fact that the correspondence with Kersey commenced on the 20th of December.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—So much the worse for you.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He declined unless he got a money subsidy and he wanted also a subsidy from British Columbia.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will my hon. friend not inform us why the other contractors of the Dominion, the capitalists of Great Britain or of the United States as the case might be were not invited to tender for this undertaking? My hon. friend is silent, I fancy it would be rather difficult for the government to give an answer to such a question. Another proposition which I would desire to lay down is that if the government desires to establish an all-Canadian route it would not have required very great fertility of mind for them to have understood the way to have accomplished it. A very great deal has been said about buiding the Edmonton route, and as indicating the public desire for the building of that route I might point out the fact that various Boards of Trades of the Dominion, the Boards of Trade of Toronto, of Montreal, of Hamilton, of Ottawa, and I think of some other cities waited upon the government in the beginning of this session and impressed upon this government not only the desirability, but the absolute necessity of opening up this route for the purpose of securing the trade to Canada with the Yukon district for Canadian products. This was a question for statesmanship this was a question with which those gentlemen could have grappled with the very best results in the interest of the whole Dominion. Now a railway to carry the products and manufactures of Canada from the town of Edmonton would certainly have precluded trade from going into the Yukon coming from the United States. Assuming for a moment that a road was not built from the Pacific coast, and a road had been built from Edmonton running through that magnificent arable tract of country lying south of Peace River district—running through auriferous lands, skirting streams that are rich in placer diggings running through a district of country rich in mineral wealth; in forest, in mines, in stream, opening up a vast tract of country not only for the miners but for the settler, a tract of country which could have produced sufficient to keep a mining population of many thousands. This is, I say, such a question as could have been carried out to a very desirable consummation and one of the best schemes the Dominion of Canada could have entered upon for the purpose of opening up the Yukon district. I say this scheme could have been carried out almost as quickly as the project now under consideration. There are water stretches between Edmonton and the Pelly banks which could have been utilized for the purpose of transhipping and transporting all the products and food supplies necessary for that country for the next year. My hon. friend the leader of the House, as well as the Secretary of State has appealed to us upon the ground of starvation in the Yukon that it was necessary in the public interest that a road should be built into that country for the purpose of shipping food supplies into the Yukon. My recollection is that my hon. friend, the Secretary of State told us the other night that no less than $45,000,000, or $50,000,000 of goods were lying upon the wharfs and docks and in the warehouses waiting to be shipped into the Yukon district.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There must be some mistake.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is what my hon. friend said.

Hon Mr. SCOTT—I think the figures must be excessive.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Will my hon. friend say now how much?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No one could tell.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend did venture on a figure and that is the figure which I recollect.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think that figure would be rather high myself. If I made the statement it would be exaggerated, I think.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend will concede the fact that the government considered it would be necessary to send into that district at least 50,000 tons of supplies for the next season. I would direct his attention to the fact that this Teslin Lake road which is to be built at the enormous expense already mentioned by him has only a carrying capacity of 9,000 tons. If hon. gentlemen will look at Mr. Jennings's report on page 24, they will see that the estimate of Mr. Jennings as to the carrying capacity of that road during the coming season is limited to that quantity. We are told that it is absolutely necessary that at least 40,000 or 50,000 tons of food supplies should be shipped into that country during the coming season. Will my hon. friend the Secretary of State tell us how the balance is to be shipped? My hon. friend has already appealed to the government and the government have appealed to the people of Canada that it is necessary to build and equip a railway for the purpose of carrying over 50,000 to 100,000 people to the Yukon district this coming season. I find on looking at Mr. Jennings's report upon which this whole scheme is based, and so far as I can understand it is the only guarantee that the government has that the scheme can be carried out, that Mr Jennings calculates that the outside carrying capacity of this road for the coming season will be 12,000 passengers. Will my hon. friend the Secretary of State tell us how the other 30,000 or 40,000 or, accepting the figures of the Minister of the Interior, the other 100,000 passengers would get into the Yukon district?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think what I said was that the persons might go in and their food supplies could be sent in afterwards by rail. So long as it got to the waterway it could be easily got to Dawson.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I will take that statement. We have the statement that the minimum passenger traffic into the Yukon district this coming summer will be 50,000. My hon. friend the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Power) I think ventured the assertion this afternoon that at least 150,000 would go in there.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I gave my authority. My authority was the vice-president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That is an excellent authority. Well, take the authority of the vice-president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company that 150,000 people will go in there this coming season. I am very sorry that my hon. friend the Minister of Justice is not in his place because I intend to submit for him a problem which I should like him to attempt to solve on this occasion. I find from Mr. Jennings's report that the carrying capacity of this road for the coming season will be only 12,000 passengers and I find from that report also that for each passenger it is necessary to take in three-quarters of a ton of freight. That being the case I would ask any hon. gentleman on the other side who is advocating this measure how they intend to get in the other 100,000 of passengers, and other 100,000 odd tons of freight.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—How many trains a day did Mr. Jennings count upon? The carrying capacity of a railroad all depends on the number of trains.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If the hon. gentleman will look at Mr. Jennings's report, page 24, he will find all the particulars necessary for him to arrive at that conclusion, and outside of that report I say most emphatically the government is not warranted in going. Mr. Jennings was sent out there for the purpose of reporting to the government on the building of the Stikine route. He drafted the report, and upon that report brought down to this House the government make this most exorbitant demand, viz., that we should alienate nearly 4,000,000 acres of public lands for the purpose of building this road. They have stated this publicly and given their authority as to the volume of the freight which it is necessary to carry into that country this coming season. They have given us their authority and their figures, the number of passengers and the tonnage of freight which will have to be provided for. Yet we find under this report—mind you, the only authentic information we have on the subject—provision for not one-tenth the volume of freight and passenger traffic which will go into the Yukon district during the coming season? I ask my hon. friend what his answer to that is. How he intends, if this road is only possessed of the capacity I have indicated, the government of the Dominion, to rise to the emergency of carrying nine-tenths more passengers and freight than apparently they are providing for by this bill? I was referring a moment ago to the desirability of the Edmonton route I charge the government with showing a gross indifference in regard to obtaining information upon this all-important route, upon a route which has received the endorsation of the commercial men of the Dominion through the Boards of Trade of the Dominion, of almost every man of common sense of the Dominion, because I say in no other way can you open up so large a tract of country suitable for settlement; in no other way can there be developed the varied resources which are to be found through that district of country—one of the richest districts throughout the whole Dominion. In no other way can you secure for the people of Eastern Canada a market for their products and manufactures than by going through the route which I have indicated, namely, from Edmonton to Pelly banks, and then down the Yukon to Dawson City. I was about to say that such a road, if it had been entered upon in the early part of the season, would have received the endorsation of the people of the whole Dominion. It would have received the endorsation of both Houses of parliament. I say, with confidence, that the building of a route of that character would have been a national work of the highest importance, and would have received the strongest approval of the people of Canada irrespective of the districts in which they lived. It would have appealed to them as a national undertaking, as one that would have secured to that country the trade of Canada, and not one which was opened up at the expense of the people of the Dominion for the purpose of accommodating United States supplies and United States products bound for that far northern country.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman is aware we sent an expedition ; that was in September. We have never heard of them since but once. That is six months ago.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am glad my hon. friend reminded me of that expedition. As I took the liberty of expressing myself rather warmly the other night in controverting the statement made by my hon. friend, I must again do so to-night, but perhaps not with so much warmth. I say positively that the government did not send an exploration party into that district for the purpose of determining on a question of route ; I say that the government sent into that district a small party of police, and that the member for Alberta appealed to the Minister of the Interior that there should accompany that party a surveyor or engineer, a man capable of determining a route, of reporting upon the physical features of the country and giving such information to the government as would be of service ; but the government refused to make any appropriation or to permit any surveyor in the service of the government to enter upon that undertaking. I charge the government with endeavouring to handicap in every possible way the obtaining of information of that route. I charge the government with culpability——

Hon. Mr. POWER—Did not two engineers from the Military College go with that expedition ?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I am very well pleased that my hon. friend has suggested that to me, the question of sending these two young men. They were two young men graduates of the Kingston Military College, and I regret to say were not surveyors and not engineers.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They would have to be both.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Upon the solicitation of their friends they secured a position with this small police detachment enjoying and receiving the magnificent remuneration of one dollar a day. Does my hon. friend from Halifax think he can secure surveyors and engineers at the rate of one dollar a day to proceed to the Klondike and endure the rigours of an Arctic winter ? I think the very fact that these two young men were willing to accept a dollar a day must indicate as the fact is that they are neither engineers nor surveyors.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I dare say there are engineers who would be glad to go with a party without pay at all.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend has a very limited and restricted view of what engineers and surveyors are worth, if he thinks engineers would be only too glad to go into that country for the remuneration he mentions.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—Except when they go to the Yukon on account of the attraction the gold has for them.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Perhaps so, but these young gentlemen are not engineers and not surveyors. I was about to say that there are engineers and surveyors in the government employ, men who are not busily engaged, men, who in the present time, in the district in which I live are in the service of the government and drawing magnificent salaries, who could have been easily spared to have gone on that expedition, men who have traversed almost every acre of that western country, and whose knowledge of climatic, geographic, physical, and all other conditions incidents to travel in that country, would be of the greatest advantage to the government. The member for Alberta importuned the government to send men of the character I have mentioned, but they refused to send such a man to make an exploration of that route, such a man as could furnish all information to the government, and which, if furnished, I am sure public opinion would demand action upon it. Now I am satisfied, hon gentlemen, that a road from Edmondton, opening up a vast expanse of country, could be built for the subsidy that is being given the contractors in the bill. I shall have something to say in a moment of the financial possibilities of the immense grant that has been made to those gentlemen, I say, with the greatest confidence that if the government had applied business principles and sagacious statesmanship to the handling of this question, a sufficient amount of money could have been raised upon the land grant which they proposed to alienate to Mann & Mackenzie, not only to build the Edmonton route but a satisfactory route from the coast to Dawson City, and thus to open up the Yukon district from both points. But we find the government entering upon an undertaking based upon the information which I read from this report and adopting the Teslin Lake route. I should like to know, hon. gentlemen, and I have no doubt the question has occurred to many, at whose instance was this Teslin route opened? I do not find that any information was in the possession of the government previous to Mr. Jennings having been sent out to Teslin Lake for the purpose of preparing his report. Can my hon. friend tell me who inspired the Teslin Lake route?

Hon. Mr. POWER—Geography.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If hon. gentlemen will look at the report of Mr. Jennings they will find that the first mention of going into that country by Teslin Lake is to be found in Mr. Jennings's report on page 31; and I would point out this peculiarity to my hon. friend, the Minister of Justice; it may not have occurred to him before; why did the government tie themselves down to the Teslin Lake route, a route upon which they had no information, a route of which they knew nothing because my hon friend, in introducing this bill, was sufficiently candid to say that the government obtained no information from Mr. Ogilvie, or Mr. Dawson, by which they could determine upon any line of action in regard to the route which was to be adopted by them. My hon. friend was candid enough to make that statement and yet we find on the 15th December Mr. Jennings writing as follows:—

> SIR,—In accordance with your desire for an interim report covering the examination of country made by me for a highway or railway route between the Stikine River and Teslin Lake, B.C., I have the honour to report——

We find Mr. Jennings reporting on the 15th December, 1897. Now then I say in conjunction with this fact that it was not until late in the fall that Mr. Jennings received instruction to go out to Teslin Lake for the purpose of making this survey, leads me to the conclusion that before Mr. Jennings went there the government had determined to enter into this contract of building the Teslin Lake road. Was it in pursuance of the report made by Mr. Jennings that this road was built? I believe my hon. friend would say that it would not be logical for him to state that it is in pursuance of that report, because no other alterative was giving to Mr. Jennings. The government tied themselves down to send in Mr. Jennings to report upon the route.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What does the hon. gentleman think were the reasons that ought to govern in the choice of a route? He does not suppose that we wanted to build a route that would be controlled by the Americans through the United States. I indicated the other day when I introduced this bill the possible routes in Canadian territory and the governing consideration at the present time and at the time this contract was entered into was the expeditious construction of a railway into the country at the earliest possible moment and this route suggested advantages far beyond that of any other route that was possible.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I will point out to my hon. friend that the government at this time must have thought of building a road from Dyea or Skagway, so that the building of the route from the Lynn Canal did not present the serious obstacles to my hon. friend at that time that it does now.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If my hon. friend will look at Mr. Jennings's report he will find Mr. Jennings apologizing for not visiting Dyea and Skagway, and the government finds it necessary to embody in this contract that no route should be built from the Lynn Canal within five years. The government must have had under consideration the building of a road from that point. If any hon. gentleman of this House will ask Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann their opinion of the route they will, in all probability, tell him the only practical route would be from Lynn Canal, and my hon. friend knows it, and the public know, that the only practical route which should be adopted is the route running from the Lynn Canal. If my hon. friend is so opposed to the adoption of the route from the Lynn Canal why has his government given power to Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann under this bill to build this road? My hon. friend has not prohibited the building of this road from the Lynn Canal?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They can only build by the permission of the government. They would have found it probably a much easier route, but they were prohibited from doing it except by Order in Council. If any other company did build then it would be only fair to them to be permitted to build, but in event of no other company building then they would not be permitted to build.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—We will see what the contract says. Sections 1 and 2 provide that the company may, by the consent of the Governor in Council, build from the Lynn Canal. I ask if this is the meaning, and is it not intended that Mann & Mackenzie shall have the right to build from Lynn Canal, if not why has this provision been made——

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is as my hon. friend knows, a charter already in existence. If any other railway did build then there would be no object in excluding them from the right of building.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Why was the government last session not struck with the same alarm? Why was it not animated by the same patriotism so to speak, when it granted to two companies the right to build practically from the Lynn Canal? This is quite a sudden conversion of the government to the fact that the building of a road from the Lynn Canal would prove of very serious moment, but I would point out in this connection that the building of a road from Lynn Canal is the only road that can be built of advantage to the government of Canada and with advantage to the people of Canada as a practical railway enterprise if you are going to the enormous expense of building a road from an Alaskan port.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend says hear, hear. My hon. friend knows perfectly well that the opinion of all parties at least the opinion of the best experts who have gone over that country, is that the most feasible road is from the Lynn Canal, that in the interest of commerce the road should be built from the Lynn Canal that in the interest of the Dominion of Canada if a road is to be built the best road should be built. It is an argument that certainly should prevail without any amplification. If you are going to make a public expenditure of an immense sum such as is involved in this project the best possible route ought to be adopted, the greatest facilities possible should be given to the trade of our country.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Not the trade of our country, the trade of the United States.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is precisely the same trade that will go over the Teslin Lake route. Will my hon. friend say that the difficulties of securing bonding privileges at the Lynn Canal are more serious than the difficulties which threaten us at Wrangel.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—There are no embarrassments whatever at Wrangel. We have a treaty right to use the navigation of that river; as an incident to that right we have the right to tranship, load and unload. We have no such rights in the Lynn Inlet or any railway constructed from it. The United States government are under no obligation to concede to us any bonding privilege, nor are they likely to do so in that country if the effect would be that we would take any steps to exclude United States trade from our own territories, or to confer any advantage upon our own people.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED — The political phases of this bill never apparently struck the government until they committed themselves to the bill now before us, and to the policy which has been initiated regarding this measure. The government found, upon introducing this bill, that the monopoly clause calculated to shut out outside transportation companies from reaching the Yukon district immediately aroused the hostility of the United States, resulting in the legislation which was introduced into the American Senate, and known as an amendment to the Homestead Laws, providing for the right of way for railroads in the district of Alaska. For this hostile legislation the government of Canada is directly responsible by reason of the monopoly clause in the bill. My hon. friend has over and over again gone over the rights which we enjoy under the Washington treaty. No one will question that certain rights have been given to us under that convention, but it is folly to say that the United States cannot impose hostile regulations, customs barriers and other difficulties, so as practically to prevent our having access to the Stikine River. My hon. friend will no sooner build this road and commence to operate it than he will find confronting him at Wrangel the very vexatious customs regulations which have already been indicated in the legislation which has lately been introduced into the American Senate, and this legislation is directed solely to the port of Wrangel. Hon. gentlemen will doubtless have observed that it does not extend to any other ports on the Alaska coast, but simply to Wrangel. My hon. friend may sail up there in Canadian vessels with Canadian goods, and at the port of Wrangel he may say to the collector of customs or those in charge at that point—possibly American soldiers—" My dear sirs, we come in here by right of treaty. The Washington convention has insured to us the right of navigation of this stream. It was passed in 1871, and we desire at once to go up Stikine regardless of all impediments which you may throw in our way." It may happen that those who approach the port of Wrangel may not be able to make as learned a desertation on the treaty rights of the convention of Washington as the Minister of Justice. But notwithstanding their protest the probabilities are they will remain at the port of Wrangel, and indulge simply in protestations without making any headway.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is a very unpatriotic suggestion.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That may be but we are dealing in commercial and business facts now and not in patriotism. We are dealing with the alienation of 4,000,000 acres of land for a railway which when built, unless you make your peace with the United States, whether by convention or otherwise, it will be impossible for you to use, except you submit to all the vexatious regulations which they may impose, I say the government were culpable in not having an understanding with the United States government in the first instance, or in drafting a bill which would not have excited the hostility which we find.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—We were culpable in not suggesting doubts where there is no room for doubts.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—So far as there being no doubts, if my hon. friend will follow the trend of American legislation on this subject he may find the doubts very formidable. But the government is responsible for introducing the policy under which they have built up along the 141st meridian and on the Alaska coast a Chinese wall by which they have actually forbidden American transportation companies or even Canadian companies having access to the Yukon country by any other route than by the Teslin Lake route and then by the grace of this firm of contractors. While a policy of that kind is enunciated by the government—a policy not only injurious to the people of Canada, but a policy hostile to vested interests in the United States already having dealings with that country--then the Canadian government must take the consequences which naturally attach to such a policy. I do not for one moment disparage the desirability of our having access to that country by a route entirely free from American influences but certainly the government of Canada is charged with the very important duty of introducing such a bill as will result in the building of a road by which we will have an assurance that that trade will be carried on without any of those difficulties confronting us which now threaten. I need not say very much about the physical difficulties which present themselves in regard to this same route, except that I might supplement what has been said by the senior member for Halifax in regard to the feasibility, so to speak, of those rivers by referring to page 15 of Mr. Jennings report in which I think it must be shown to the satisfaction of whoever reads it that it would be almost impossible to navigate the Hootalinqua River. On page 15 we find the following :—

> They further explain that they nearly made the same blunder mistaking the waters of the Hootalinqua River which are a dirty brown colour for those of a slough or marshy water.

If hon. gentlemen fancy that they can navigate a river which presents no other appearance than that of a slough or marshy water in conjunction with a line of steamboats such as anticipated in the contract I think they will find themselves very much mistaken in the physical difficulties they have calculated to grapple.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The Misscuri is a very muddy river.
